House of Commons Debates

SECOND SESSION, SIXTH PARLIAMENT.—51 VIC.

Vol. XX.

Ottawa, Wednesday, March 14, 1888.

No. 15.

NOTICE TO MEMBERS.

Necessary corrections to Members' Speeches, for the bound edition, must be forwarded to the Debates Office within twenty-four hours after the printed copies of the speeches have been circulated, as after that time the contractors may print the copies for the bound edition without further delay.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 14th March, 1888.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

MANITOBA LAW.

Mr. THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 41) respecting the application of certain laws, therein mentioned, to the Province of Manitoba. He said: A question has arisen as to the applicability of a large portion of the modern law of England to the Province of Manitoba. Under a constitutional principle which is well established and widely known, the provisions of the Statute Law of the Mother Country extend to the Colonies as far as they are intended to apply down to the period when a Legislative Assembly is organised in a Colony. The case of the Province of Manitoba has been somewhat peculiar. It existed as a mere territory under the control of the Hudson's Bay Company down to the date of the Order in Council which transferred it to the Dominion of Canada on the 15th July, 1870; and when the Legislature was organised, it was provided by a Statute of that Legislature that the law of England, as far as it was capable of being applied to the colony and as far as it existed on the 15th July, 1870, should be the law of the Province of Manitoba in regard to such matters as were within the control of the Provincial Legislature; but in other matters, such, for example, as the law of interest and the law relating to promissory notes, the Statute of the Province would be ineffectual, and the question has arisen as to what portion of the English law is in force in regard to matters which have not been expressly legislated upon by the Dominion, and are outside of the jurisdiction of the Provincial Legislature. Doubts have arisen as to what portion of the English law is in force subsequent to 1670, the date of the charter of the Hudson's Bay Company. In that charter, the language is substantially that the company is authorised to establish Courts of civil and criminal jurisdiction in its territory, and that these Courts shall administer the laws of England, those being presumably and probably the laws which were then in force, so that the laws of England in regard to subsequent matters, such as promissory notes and interest, have been left without any application to the Province of Manitoba, or, at any rate, in the opinion of the jurists who have had to pronounce on the subject, that is the case. This Bill proposes to make applicable to the Province of Manitoba the English law which existed on the 15th July, 1870, and to make special provisions in relation to interest and promissory notes. The 3rd clause of the Bill provides that the 1st clause shall not apply to existing litigation, but, as to matters of interest, the law will apply to existing proceedings as well as to those which have not yet been commenced.

Mr. MILLS. I think this is a very necessary measure. There is no doubt of the correctness of the admissions made by the Minister of Justice that so far as the legislation of the Province of Manitoba is concerned, it could not affect any other rights than those that are within the exclusive jurisdiction of the province. This territory, I have no doubt, was, historically, a portion of the territory ceded by France to Great Britain in 1764. The old maps that the Commissioners at that time had before them, show that the whole country as far west as the Rocky Mountains, was in the possession of France; in fact the later Governors who were sent out by France to govern this country extended their jurisdiction over that territory, and at the time Canada was surrendered to Great Britain, there were French troops as well as French trading posts established in that country. The French Governor of Canada issued licenses for that country; and as soon as Canada was ceded to Great Britain, the whole country as far westward as the Mississippi River, and the whole country north of the Mississippi River, indefinitely westward as far as it was the property of the king of France, became a portion of the territories of the king of England; so that whether the common law of England would extend to that country at all, previous to 1764, is a matter of great doubt. Then the Minister of Justice knows that, according to the recognised rules of public law, whether the English law would be extended to that country, or the law of France, which was in force over the entire country at the time of the surrender, would depend upon the determination of the king himself. If he expressed no opinion upon the subject then, of course, the law which was in force prior to the conquest would continue to be in force after the conquest was consummated. I may say, however, that I believe that territory at the time of the surrender was a part of the territory of the king of France, and that subsequent to the Quebec Act, when Upper Canada was established in 1791, it was intended to be embraced, and was embraced as a part of the Province of Upper Canada. No doubt the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, in dealing with the question as to the limits of the Province of Ontario, did not pretend to say that that territory now known as the Province of Ontario and the North-West Territory, was not included in the Province of Upper Canada when it was established; but the subsequent establishment there of a government by the Hudson's Bay Company, as a matter of fact, which was not contested, or actively opposed, by the Government of the Province of Ontario, led to the loss of the territories by the principle of acquiescence. So when they undertook to ascertain what were the western boundaries of Ontario, as they now exist, they declared that as the Province of Assiniboia did not extend eastward of the Winnipeg River, the Province of Ontario continues to hold the territory as far westward as it had been embraced in the old Province of Quebec under the Act of 1774. So that what particular law is in force in that country, apart from our legislative declaration, would be a matter of extreme doubt, whether it would be the old law of France, or the common law of England; and whether it was the law of England in 1774 or 1791, is also a matter of doubt. Therefore it seems to me that the proposed legislation by the Minister of Justice is highly necessary to remove all doubt, and determine what law does govern the people in that country within the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

BAR AT PINETTE HARBOR.

Mr. WELSH asked, Is it the intention of the Government to have the bar at Pinette Harbor, Prince Edward Island, dredged during the coming summer?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am informed that there are about 10 feet of water over that bar at Pinette Harbor, in high water; and it is found that the bar is of rock. My chief engineer says that before we undertake this, we must have a survey in order to ascertain all the facts.

WOOD ISLAND HARBOR.

Mr. WELSH asked, Is it the intention of the Government to have the dredging at Wood Island Harbor performed this year, so as to make that harbor available for shipping purposes?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Perhaps the hon. gentleman knows that some years ago an attempt was made to dredge Wood Island Harbor, and the work was given up. I understand that it was likely to cost too much money. Since that time there have been many petitions to the same effect, but their request was refused for the same reason. It is not likely we could undertake this work unless stronger reasons are given for it than have yet been presented to us.

OVERLOADING OF VESSELS.

Mr. GUILLET asked, Is it the intention of the Government to introduce a measure to prevent the overloading of vessels trading on our inland waters?

Mr. FOSTER. In reply to that question, I would say that the matter is engaging the attention of the Government at the present time.

COMPENSATION TO GENERAL STRANGE.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, Whether the Government have compensated, or intend to compensate General Strange, for the loss of his pension derived from the British Government during the period while General Strange was engaged in assisting to suppress the rebellion in the North-West?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. In answer to the hon. gentleman I beg to state that Major General Strange, from the 28th of March to the 17th September, 1885, 174 days, received $2,117. It is not the intention of the Government to compensate Major General Strange for the loss of his pension.

QUAI A HADLOW COVE.

M. GUAY: Le gouvernement a-t-il pris en considération, depuis la dernière session, les pétitions des citoyens de Saint-David, de L'Auberivière et de Saint-Télesphore, demandant de faire allonger le quai du gouvernement à Hadlow Cove jusqu'à eau profonde? Si oui, se propose-t-il de faire commencer les travaux prochainement?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN: M. l'Orateur, j'ai fait examiner cette question par mes officiers afin de savoir si nous avons quelque ouvrage de ce genre à L'Auberivière. Le quai qu'il y a là est la propriété d'un particulier, et les pétitions qui ont été présentées ont pour but de faire allonger le quai afin d'en faire le terminus d'une traverse ou d'un passage d'eau entre les deux rives. Je regrette d'avoir à dire à l'honorable député que ce sujet là est absolument local et ne tombe pas sous la juridiction du gouvernement.

CHARLES LEDUC.

M. TURCOTTE (pour M. DESSAINT): Charles Leduc, écrivain, de Hull, est-il employé dans le service civil? Si oui, depuis quand, dans quel ministère, quelle est la nature de ses fonctions et quel est son salaire?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN: Ce monsieur n'est pas employé dans le service civil.

PRÉPARATION DU VACCIN.

M. Fiset: Est-ce l'intention du gouvernement d'accorder un subside au Dr Edmond Gauvreau, de Québec, afin de venir en aide à son établissement pour la préparation du vaccin?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN: Je dois informer l'honorable député que ce n'est pas l'intention du gouvernement.

TERMS OF UNION WITH PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Mr. DAVIES asked, Is it the intention of the Government, during the present Session, to submit any proposition to Parliament with the view of meeting the complaints of the Government of Prince Edward Island respecting the alleged non-compliance by the Dominion Government with the Terms of Union respecting steam communication with that Province, or with reference to the suggestions for a settlement of the claims made upon the Dominion by Prince Edward Island, contained in Earl Granville's despatch to His Excellency the Governor General, dated 31st March, 1886?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is not the intention of the Government.

THE NORTHERN LIGHT.

Mr. DAVIES asked, Is it the intention of the Government to have another steamer built this season to assist the Northern Light in keeping up communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland in the winter season? If not, how is it proposed that such communication shall be maintained during next winter, so as to comply with that article of the Terms of Union between Prince Edward Island and the Dominion, stipulating that an efficient steam service for the conveyance of mails and passengers is to be established and maintained between the Island and the Dominion, winter and summer, thus placing the Island in continuous communication with the Intercolonial Railway and the Railway system of the Dominion?

Mr. FOSTER. The subject-matter of the hon. gentleman's question is under consideration.

THE LAW OF LIBEL.

Mr. INNES asked, Is it the intention of the Government during the present Session to introduce a Bill to amend the Law of Libel?

Mr. THOMPSON. I cannot answer the question more definitely to-day than to say that the subject is now being considered.

GREAT NORTH-WEST CENTRAL RAILWAY.

Mr. EDGAR asked, Were the applicants for the charter of the Great North-West Central Railway Company required by the Government to make a deposit prior to the granting thereof? If such deposit was required, what amount was demanded, and was the deposit made? If made, was it in money, in bank deposit receipts or cheques on a charter bank? If in cheques, whose cheques were given, on what bank, and were they duly marked as good or accepted by the bank?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The applicants for this charter were required to make a deposit prior to the granting thereof; $50,000 were required, and the deposit was made. It was made in bank deposit receipts and cheques; the cheques were given on the Union Bank of Lower Canada and were marked good.

Mr. EDGAR asked, Is the Government aware whether the Great North West Central Railway Company have, since their incorporation on 22nd July, 1886, effected their permanent organisation by subscribing for $500,000 of stock and paying up 10 per cent. thereof?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes.

Mr. EDGAR asked, Have the incorporators named in the charter of the Great North-West Central Railway Company been changed by resignation or otherwise? And if changes have been made, who have taken the places of those who have gone out?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The incorporators named in the charter of this company have been changed; the name of R. J. Devlin has been submitted for that of C. T. Bate, who resigned.

COST OF CANADIAN RAILWAYS.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, What is the nominal cost, as given to 1st January, 1888, of all railways in the Dominion of Canada?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I must ask the hon. gentleman to repeat that question on another day.

THE FISHERIES TREATY—PAPERS.

Mr. DAVIES. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to direct the attention of the Government to an omission in the papers furnished to the House in connection with the Fisheries Conference that took place in Washington a short time ago between the two Governments. It will be remembered that a number of questions were asked from this side of the House as to the propositions made by the respective plenipotentiaries of each Government to the other, and after consultation had taken place several times in the House, it was understood that in addition to the papers first submitted there would be other papers containing—as we understood at least—a full account of all the several negotiations and propositions made on either side. Now, in the papers which were circulated and laid on the table of each member the other day I find the only additional memorandum is a letter which Mr. Bayard wrote on 31st May to Sir Charles Tupper, and the answer of Sir Charles Tupper to Mr. Bayard; but in the propositions which appear to have been made by Sir Charles Tupper on the 3rd December, 1887, and the reply of the United States plenipotentiaries on the 7th December, it appears in the reply of the United States plenipotentiaries that, previous to Sir Charles submitting his proposal, they had submitted a proposal to him, and his proposition was a reply to that which emanated from them in the first instance. The House will see by looking at the papers that the United States plenipotentiaries commenced their reply as follows:

“While continuing their proposal heretofore submitted—on the 30th ultimo,—and fully sharing the desire of Her Britannic Majesty's plenipotentiaries to remove all causes of difference in connection with the fisheries, the American plenipotentiaries are constrained, after careful consideration.”

Now, the proposal which was submitted by the United States plenipotentiaries, and on which Sir Charles Tupper made his proposition of December 3rd, has never yet been communicated to the House. The House will see how very important it is on the eve of the present discussion, and also in view of the discussion on the Fisheries question, that hon. members should be placed in full possession of the proposals which emanated from the American plenipotentiaries as well as those which emanated from the Canadian Commissioner. I call the attention of the First Minister to this point in the hope that we may have the proposal laid before the House at an early day.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I regret that the absence of the Minister of Finance through illness prevents his giving a full answer to the hon. gentleman. I may say now that it was understood at the meeting of the conference that the results only should be embodied in the protocols. The same arrangement was made, I may say, at the time of the Washington treaty; it was found absolutely necessary, from the political circumstances of the day, that this should be the case. No statement of what occurred during the negotiations can be submitted either to the Congress of the United States or the Parliament of Canada that has not been mutually agreed upon. Sir Charles obtained the consent of Mr. Bayard to the submission of the correspondence to which the hon. gentleman has referred. If any further papers are wanted, including the papers to which he now refers, Sir Charles, when he is able to resume his place in the House, which will be in a few days, will communicate with the British Ambassador at Washington, and if Mr. Bayard consents, there will be no objection to the papers being brought down.

Mr. LAURIER. I submit that this statement is very disappointing and very unsatisfactory. This is contrary to all the precedents on which we have proceeded. I cannot do better than to refer the hon. gentleman to the Treaty of Washington itself, in which case the whole of the proceedings were brought down to the House and full information was communicated, not only to the members of this Legislature, but to all parties concerned and interested. Naturally in this legislation all parties concerned are interested, and it seems to me that the plenipotentiaries have pursued a different course from what has ever been pursued before. We have nothing but a summary of the protocols. It appears, however—and I take the statements of the hon. gentlemen themselves, that it was agreed upon by those plenipotentiaries that nothing but summaries of the protocols should be distributed to accompany the treaty,—the hon. gentleman and his Government were kind enough some time ago to ask the assent of Mr. Bayard to have certain proposals which they made—which, rather, the plenipotentiaries had made—submitted to Parliament. It seems to me they might have asked the assent of Mr. Bayard to submit also the other proposals which were made on the part of the American plenipotentiaries. It certainly seems to me that it is not treating the House with that proper respect to which the House is entitled, to submit one part of those proposals and not the other. I think the House is entitled to everything that occurred, not only the proposals made by the British plenipotentiaries, but the proposals made by the American plenipotentiaries as well, all the more so because the proposals made by our plenipotentiaries are in answer to the proposals made by the American plenipotentiaries. Under such circumstances I hope that the hon. gentleman will follow the precedent which took place not more than three weeks ago, during the illness of Sir Charles Tupper. He, himself, communicated with Mr. Bayard to have his assent to this proposal being submitted to the House, and during the present unfortunate illness of the Minister of Finance I hope he will again ask the assent of Mr. Bayard to have the proposals of the American plenipotentiaries laid before us.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I can only say that if the doctrine of the hon. gentleman is maintained, it will be impossible ever to make a treaty with any country.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The First Minister will see, if he looks at the papers brought down, that when we were discussing the Treaty of Washington the various propositions made by the plenipotentiaries or joint high commissioners on each side were given to Parliament. It is true the arguments by which they were supported were not given, but the proposals themselves were given. Now, what objection does the hon. gentleman see to saying what the propositions were which the British commissioners submitted and what were the counter propositions submitted by the commissioners of the United States. To submit the arguments that were presented in support of those propositions is one thing, to submit the propositions themselves is a totally different thing. It does seem to me that the hon. gentleman recognises the principle of responsible government; he admits that he and his Government are responsible to Parliament. Surely in vindication of this it is right that Parliament should know what was done by those acting on its behalf, and supposed to enjoy its confidence. It does seem to me that the proposition which the hon. gentleman now makes is one wholly different from that made in 1872 when we were put in possession of all the propositions and counter propositions submitted before the joint high commission, and when we had also the Order in Council protesting against the course of the Imperial Government brought down.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No doubt, as full information was given in 1871 as could properly be given. I can assure the hon. gentleman that there was due discrimination observed at that time as to what was sent to Parliament and what was withheld.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is all very well in the interests of the Government for the gentleman who leads this House to make a statement of that kind and to take upon himself to say that all has been given that can be given in the interests of the Government of the country.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I did not say so.

Mr. MITCHELL. But if the treaty is complete and this House is asked, as Congress has been asked, to assent to it, this House as well as Congress has a right to the fullest information as to how those gentlemen arrived at the conclusions at which they have arrived. I find, on looking at the papers distributed to the members of this House the other day, that this proposition in relation to more extended commercial relations did not arise—as the organs of this Government have taken the credit of saying it did—with the representative of the Canadian Government, the present Minister of Finance (Sir Charles Tupper), but that it arose, first, so far as I can find them on the records of the papers, in a letter addressed by Mr. Bayard on the 31st of May to Sir Charles Tupper. This is the first evidence of any correspondence on the point which is laid before the House. One paragraph of this letter reads as follows:—

"It is evident that the commercial intercourse between the inhabitants of Canada and those of the United States has grown into too vast proportions to be exposed much longer to this wordy triangular duel, and more direct and responsible methods should be resorted to."

In a previous part of this letter he goes on to point out the difficulties in which our colonial position places us in dealing with the neighboring country. He tells us the whole correspondence has to be made to England, and through England to the Governor General of this country and his Council; that all this matter has to be answered, first to England and then to the United States again before an answer can be got, and that unnecessary time and delay is taken up in that way. Mr. Bayard has evidently made a distinct proposition in relation to the manner in which this difficulty about the fishery troubles could be practically settled, and that he points out to be, first, more extended commercial intercourse between the two countries. Now, Sir, when the treaty is complete, and when a Bill has been laid before this House by the Government to ask this House to assent to that treaty, I hold it to be the right of this House—no matter what the convenience of the Cabinet may be to hide what they have done and refused to do—I hold it to be the right of this House that everything in the shape of a proposition which was made, whether from Mr. Bayard to Sir Charles Tupper, or from Sir Charles Tupper, representing this Government, to the commissioners, should be laid before this House for our action, our consideration, and for the exercise of our judgment as to whether those gentlemen have done their duty or not. This position, I think, this House will sustain. I for one am not prepared to accept the ipse dixit of the hon. gentleman opposite, who says in his judgment it is not for the convenience of the Cabinet that only conclusions should be laid before us, and that the propositions upon which conclusions were not based should be ignored. I could understand, Sir, if he refused to lay the arguments before the House, although even there I think common candor to the people of Canada ought to dictate that the arguments, as well as the propositions, should be laid before the House; but without question the propositions ought to be laid on the Table, and I think it is the duty of this House to insist that the Government shall do so.

Mr. CASEY. The right hon. gentleman the Prime Minister does not seem to agree with the Minister of Finance in regard to what ought to be or what ought not to be brought down. He has told us that if those documents asked for were brought down it would be impossible to make a treaty with any country. His Minister of Finance told us, a few days ago, that he hoped and expected and intended that those very papers should be brought down. Here is a difference of opinion between the chief and his first lieutenant. I think the right hon. the Premier should explain that difference, or else he must remain responsible for the utterances of his second in command, who offered and intended to bring those matters before the House. The right hon. gentleman says that even at the time of the Washington Treaty, although there was more brought down than now, that he did not tell us everything even then, and that he used his judgment as to what statements of fact should be brought down and what left behind. I find that a treaty is made specially subject to the action of this House. It is not proper that one party to the case—the Government who are on trial before this House—should be allowed to make their own case, and retain what suits them. It is evident that by submitting certain facts and retaining others a falsehood may practically be told to the House, and that the whole thing may be put in a false shape. In the case of the British Parliament it is quite different. A treaty does not come before that parliament at all; but precedents that apply in England do not apply to this case. It is not necessary to tell the British Parliament everything that the Ministers have done in regard to a treaty, because parliament is not asked to ratify that treaty. Here, by special agreement, we are asked to ratify this treaty, and we ought to know; and if we have respect for ourselves we would know, before we ratify the treaty, what our representatives have done.

Mr. MULOCK. If I correctly understood the First Minister he has stated to the House that nothing further would be presented.

Mr. SPEAKER. If a question of order were raised, it was my intention to call the attention of the House to the irregularity of the proceedings which have now taken place, and to warn the House that if we allowed this kind of proceedings, which has taken place several times already, there will be no use of our having rules of practice to direct the proceedings of this House. The rule is that questions may be asked of Ministers about the production of papers or the conduct or state of the business of the House; but I think it is the duty of the Chair not to allow a question to drift into a discussion, because when it comes to a discussion it is clearly out of order. Therefore, if hon. gentlemen wish to argue against the conduct of the Government or anything else, they must put a motion before the House. I think it would be clearly an inconvenience if these discussions were allowed every time we call the Orders of the Day.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. First Minister, if I understood him, has stated to the House that he will not give to the House or the country any further information on this subject.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I certainly said nothing of the kind.

Mr. MULOCK. I wish to know exactly what the hon. First Minister—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. MULOCK. Yes, I shall be glad if you will endeavour to press on the hon. gentleman to attend more to his correspondence.

Mr. SPEAKER. I hope no comment will be made on my effort to maintain order.

Mr. MULOCK. I think I am in order now in addressing the House, and in consequence of the low tone in which the hon. First Minister spoke, I desire to know to what extent the House and the country are to be informed as to the proposals and counter-proposals which passed between the plenipotentiaries. I would like to know whether he proposes to live up to the agreement made by the hon. Finance Minister on the 1st of March last. The hon. Minister of Finance then stated, in order to procure an adjournment of a certain debate, that the formal protocols would contain every proposal and counter-proposal made at Washington, and he expressed his great surprise that the communications which had been forwarded by the protocolists did not contain those proposals and counter-proposals. If the hon. First Minister wishes to know what he said, I will refer him to Hansard, page 73:

"The question was, as I understood, practically settled when I left Washington, that the arguments were not to be embraced, that is to say, the reasoning upon the two sides would not be necessary; but it was a question as to how far the various papers put in, in support of the proposals or in opposition to the proposals, should form a part of the protocols; and when I was asked the question by telegraph to assent to the protocols being purely formal, I assumed and took it for granted that what was termed a formal protocol would contain the proposals and counter-proposals—that that, at all events, would be a part of it."

Mr. MITCHELL. And the answer.

"Sir CHARLES TUPPER. And I assented to it. Yes, the proposals and the answers. A proposal is put in and an answer is put in in relation to it; and I assumed that those protocols, what were termed formal protocols, would, at all events, contain the proposals and the replies on both sides."

That was the attitude taken by Sir Charles Tupper; that was what he considered would be laid before this House, and if the hon. First Minister or any other member of this Administration now proposes to give to the House less than the hon. Minister of Finance proposed to give, then they must be considering something other than the public interest. There cannot be an honest and full discussion of this question if the Government hold back part of the evidence. It must be clear to the mind of every man who read the letter of Mr. Bayard to Sir Charles Tupper, that the American Government courted larger trade relations between Canada and the United States, and it is perfectly evident that the failure on the part of our Government to promote those relations has been the outcome of the negotiations and correspondence, and perhaps debates as well. They have had the effect of militating against the highest interest of Canada. If there is nothing to conceal, why not bring down the whole record? If, however, the Government have something to conceal, if they have tied the hands of Sir Charles Tupper, or if the Imperial authorities have interfered with the negotiators, let Canada know it. We have a right to know whose interests were consulted—whether the doctrine of the First Minister of Canada first, Canada for the Canadians, was lived up to, or whether on this occasion, as on others, Imperial interests were preferred to those of Canada. For my part, I am sent here to represent the interests of Canada, and any Government at Ottawa who collude with other statesmen against the interests of Canada, are traitors to the country they represent. For these reasons, in order that this question may be discussed fully and fairly, I think they have a duty to perform, and they can only be trying to burk parliamentary enquiry by withholding what the hon. Finance Minister deemed to be due to Canada.

Mr. CASGRAIN. In withdrawing my motion to adjourn, I think the Premier is altogether in error in not carrying out the promise made by his plenipotentiary in this House. If he would give some good reason, pro bono publico, why those papers should be withheld, I would certainly yield, but he has not given any reason to justify the course he has now taken.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). It seems to me that the object of the hon. the Minister of Fisheries in bringing down these papers is to show what had taken place in regard to the commercial relations between the two countries. Now, we find that whilst Sir Charles Tupper on the 13th December made a proposal, a very important matter is left out. The American reply is not fully before this House, because reference is made to the proposals submitted on the 30th, and it seems to me that in order to complete the papers, that document should be submitted as well as the proposals of Sir Charles Tupper.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I regret that the hon. Minister of Fisheries is not in his place, so that this conversation would not have been called for. Sir Charles Tupper left Washington before the protocols were formally settled. They were settled there in the manner he told us, by agreement between the plenipotentiaries on both sides as to what should go to the public. As those who were not plenipotentiaries are not in the secret, we cannot say what portion has been omitted and what portion has been included in those protocols; but they were sent according to the arrangements made between the representatives of the two nations. Sir Charles Tupper has expressed his disappointment that they were not so full in statement as he thought they would be; and after the discussion which took place here, he telegraphed to Washington for permission to lay the statement and counter-statement, so far as it related to trade, before the House, and he got the consent of the plenipotentiaries on the other side. That was to have been communicated to this House. As regards the point now raised, there is a statement of another proposition. Well, I have no doubt Sir Charles Tupper will communicate and ask permission to get that also, but without permission it cannot be given.

RECIPROCITY WITH THE UNITED STATES.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved :

That it is highly desirable that the largest possible freedom of commercial intercourse should obtain between the Dominion of Canada and the United States, and that it is expedient that all articles manufactured in, or the natural products of either of the said countries should be admitted free of duty into the ports of the other, (articles subject to duties of excise or of internal revenue alone excepted).

That it is further expedient that the Government of the Dominion should take steps at an early date to ascertain on what terms and conditions arrangements can be effected with the United States for the purpose of securing full and unrestricted reciprocity of trade therewith.

He said : I am not greatly given to indulging in conventional formalities, but it is not in the spirit of conventionality that I rise on this occasion to address this House, under a sense of grave and weighty responsibility. It is true that I am fortified and encouraged in bringing forward this motion by the knowledge that in so doing I only voice the opinions of the representatives of the Liberal party in this Parliament; and furthermore that I have every reason a man can have for believing that when I give utterance to their opinions, I also give utterance to the opinions of the vast majority of those who support us and of a very important section, to say the least of it, of those who, on other questions, have differed from us very widely. Were I called upon at present to produce evidence of that, I think it might be found in the fact that within a very few months, but not until after this question had been considerably agitated throughout the Dominion, we found the leading statesmen of the several Provincial Governments, who met at Quebec—all, I think, the more important Governments in Canada—uniting, without exception, in approving substantially of the proposition which I now submit to this House. Nevertheless I cannot conceal from myself that this motion is one which is liable to raise issues of very great moment, not only to the people of Canada, but it may well be to other peoples also. There is no doubt that this motion is one which proposes, in some considerable degree, a new departure; there is no doubt whatever that if this proposition were assented to by the two countries chiefly concerned, very important changes would, beyond all question, take place in the mode of administering our public and commercial affairs, and therefore it is equally clear that this is a question which requires the most mature consideration and the utmost discussion at our hands. I am very glad indeed that the Government have recognised the importance of this matter, and I think it is to their credit that they raised no objection to my proposal to set apart a special day for its discussion, and also that the discussion once begun, it be carried on de die in diem. Sir, I believe it will be found that this is emphatically a question which will not down; I believe it to be a question which must be faced; I believe that it is a question which possibly, if it suits their purpose, hon. gentlemen opposite may evade or may delay, but on which, sooner or later, and in my judgment rather sooner than later, they will be required to take, and their friends in the House of Commons and out of it will be required to take a distinct and plain stand. This is a case in which nature is too strong for us; and although it is my intention on the present occasion to abstain from a great many things which might theoretically strengthen my argument, but which would undoubtedly open a way to irrelevant discussion, still I think I may be pardoned in taking this opportunity to say that we will all do well to remember that we are now discussing a problem which affects the present interests of Canada to-day. We are not called upon to consider how or in what way we might have dealt with this proposal, had it been submitted to us under totally different conditions, twenty or even ten years ago. The question is, what is best for the people of Canada in the year 1888, and not what may have been thought best for them in 1867 or in 1877. As for the charge of inconsistency, which has been levelled at some of us for supposed previous utterances on this question, I am in no wise concerned to waste time in justifying myself. Were I so disposed, it would be easy for me to show that I, at any rate, have been perfectly consistent to the root idea which underlies this whole proposition. But I do not intend to waste time over that. I may say this, however, that every man who studies the subject, knows that I am speaking simply the truth when I say that within the last twenty years or the last ten years, there have been very great economic and even social changes in the position of Canada, and that therefore it might very well be the case that propositions deserve discussion to-day which we would not have thought it prudent to discuss some ten or twenty years ago. Now, I propose to-day to confine myself chiefly to bringing the attention of this House and, so far as I can, the people of Canada to certain patent and salient facts, which, I think, nobody who studies the matter is able to deny, and also to pointing out what appear to me the inevitable consequences which will result from those facts. I may differ from hon. gentlemen opposite on that point, but it appears to me it is idle to shut our eyes to these plain facts, and equally idle for us to say that our present position is in all respects satisfactory. I will take two facts alone which appear to me, and I think will appear to this House, to be of very great importance in this connection; and of which I have here as absolute evidence as it is possible for any man to have. I will take the movement of the population in this country in the last quarter of a century, beginning in the year 1861 and going down to the year 1886, which is the last moment for which I have absolutely accurate statistical information. What are these facts? Sir, they are facts which I state with pain. But I say that we have here incontestable evidence that in these twenty-five years, one in every four of the native born population of Canada has been compelled to seek a home in a foreign country, and that of all the immigrants whom we have imported at great cost, three out of four have been compelled to follow in the track of that fraction of the native born population. Now I say, no man who properly appreciates what these facts involve can deny that if I make good my case, if I am able to show this House that there is a great deal of substantial and a great deal of presumptive evidence to support it, if I can show this House that I am rather under than above the mark in making those statements, no man who understands what those facts mean, can doubt for one moment that I and those gentlemen who think with me are amply justified in saying this is a case which requires our most earnest and serious consideration. Now, I will take those two statements respectively, and, first of all, I address myself to the statement which I made and to which I think I heard some murmurs of dissent on the other side, that in the last five-and-twenty years Canada has lost one out of every four of her native born population. In the first place, I have here, if any hon. gentlemen desire that the authority be produced, the formal reports of the United States, which show that in the year 1860 there were 249,000 men of Canadian birth in the United States; that in ten years they had grown to 430,000 souls, and that in 1880, there were 707,000 Canadians in the United States. Now, it must be remembered that that by no means represents the total exodus of our people, because, when you come to deal with such large numbers as these, you must allow for the death rate which prevailed in the twenty years from 1860 to 1880. That death rate, after careful examination, I believe to have been about 74,000 in the first decade, and 120,000 in the second, in all equal to 194,000. It is clear therefore, it is clear to demonstration, it is as clear as any fact can be, that between 1860 and 1880, for some cause or other, which it is not my present purpose to analyse, at least 650,000 Canadians found homes in the United States. Now, up to that point, we go upon absolutely certain ground. We have the United States returns backed in the strongest possible fashion by our own census returns, which I have under my hand. The question is, how many have we lost since then, how many have gone from this country to the United States in the interval between 1880 and 1886? Now, we have here pretty clear evidence of the movement of population at any rate in the great Province of Ontario. We know what the increase in the Province of Ontario, according to natural laws, should have been; we know what the increase in Ontario is. We know from these hon. gentlemen's own returns what a mass of immigrants they alleged to have been poured into this country in those six years to which I have alluded; and we find in brief that, according to our municipal statistics, which are likely rather to err, as experience has shown, in increasing than in diminishing the average population, all Ontario in these six years has to show is an increase of 128,000 souls. We find a huge gap here. We find that in those six years the natural growth alone of Ontario ought to have been 250,000 souls. We find that, even if you take my estimate that out of every four immigrants you pay for and bring to this country, you keep but one, there is the strongest ground for believing that at least 80,000 souls should have been added to the Province from that source alone, and after deducting the 120,000 Ontarions, whom the returns from Manitoba and the North-West show to have settled in that country, you still find 180,000 unaccounted for from that source alone. I need not appeal to this audience as to the fact that Ontario of necessity, putting out of question the North-West and Manitoba, always has and must absorb the vast bulk of our immigration. I think my hon. friends from Prince Edward Island, my hon. friends from Nova Scotia, my hon. friends from New Brunswick, and my hon. friends from the Province of Quebec on both sides of this House will all admit that no very large proportion of immigrants have settled in those respective Provinces within the last six years; and, if any of them doubt the statement or think I err in that, it is open to them now and here to correct me, and I challenge the correction. If we admit that, and I see no possible ground on which those positions can be disputed, you have this result, that, allowing a moderate proportion for the emigration that we know is going on of native born Canadians from the other Provinces, at least 900,000 of our population are to-day inhabitants of the United States, and in all probability rather over than under 1,000,000. So I submit that the first statement that I have made is up to the year 1880 absolutely true, and, as regards the period of six years which has since elapsed, is as nearly absolutely proved as it is possible at present for any such statement to be. More than that, you have only to look, if you dispute the United States statistics, to our own statistics, to our own census returns, to see, I regret to say, the strongest possible evidence of the substantial accuracy of my calculations. We find that in 1861 the population in those Provinces which now form the Dominion of Canada was as nearly as possible 3,250,000 souls. We find that in 1871, they had grown to 3,690,000, and in 1881, to 4,324,000 souls; while, if you like to take the four old Provinces, you find that they had in round numbers grown from 3,000,000 to 4,000,000 in a period of 20 years. Now, as our returns allege and profess to prove, we imported in those 20 years about 500,000 immigrants. I would like hon. gentlemen on both sides to compare for one moment the rate of progress manifested in those 20 years with the rate of progress manifested in the previous 20 years of our history. From 1841 to 1861, the old Province of Canada grew from 1,129,000 souls to 2,500,000. Thus the House will see that during the first 20 years, the growth of old Canada was at the rate of 115 per cent., while in these later 20 years it has shrunk to 30 per cent. Now I proceed to discuss the other position, I proceed to discuss not our success in what I deem a vastly more important class, not our success in keeping our own people in our own territory, but our success in keeping the foreign immigration which, at vast cost, we have brought into this country. I made the statement a few minutes ago that, of the foreign population which we have brought in, three out of four have left this country and sought homes in the United States. I now proceed to give you the evidence, as I believe the incontrovertible evidence of the substantial accuracy of that statement, the absolute accuracy for the first period of 20 years and the substantial accuracy for the last period of five or six years. I find that the foreign population in Canada in 1861 amounted to 665,000 souls, and that in 1881 that foreign population had shrunk to 570,000 souls. In other words, we lost 95,000 souls in those 20 years, altogether we had brought into the country during that interval 531,000 immigrants, according to the returns which have been laid on our Table by the hon. the Minister of Agriculture. Now, I will allow, as I did in the case of the emigrants to the United States from Canada, for a very large death rate. I will deduct 220,000 from the original foreign born population in Canada in 1861, and it is as clear as anything can be, that deducting 15,000 for settlers in British Columbia and Manitoba, of the 505,000 who remain, who came to this country in that interval, the uttermost who can by possibility have remained in Canada are 125,000, so that 380,000 had made Canada a mere place of transit at our expense. So there again you will find that up to 1881 the case is absolutely proven that three out of four of all the multitude of immigrants that we brought to this country, we were unable to retain. How has it been in the interval between 1881 and 1886? Well, Sir, I find that in that interval 477,168 immigrants are alleged to have come to Canada as settlers. I turn to the census returns of north-western Manitoba, and I find that the uttermost who can be accounted for there, amount to 25,000; so that there remain 452,000 to be accounted for still. I have just pointed out to this House that the great Province of Ontario, which has always absorbed the vast bulk of all the foreign immigrants, not merely does not show that it has absorbed 452,000 immigrants, but it shows that its total increase is barely one-half its natural increase. Again, I ask my hon. friends in the Maritime Provinces, again I ask my hon. friends in Quebec, do they suppose that any considerable proportion of this 452,000 can have strayed into Prince Edward Island, or New Brunswick, or Nova Scotia, or Quebec, without their knowledge? Is it not a patent fact that the vast bulk of these, if they are to be found at all, must be found in the Province of Ontario? and is it not a patent fact that if the increase of Ontario be no larger than I have stated, the vast bulk of these immigrants must, as I have said, have sought homes in the United States. There is, Sir, but one alternative to that—let hon. gentlemen take which one they choose. It is, of course, theoretically possible, though practically impossible, that these immigrants may have stayed in Ontario and have displaced an immensely larger number of the native population than I have supposed possible. But I do not think that argument is likely to be advanced in this discussion by any resident of Ontario. Now, Sir, I could bring forward numerous details all tending in a very high degree to corroborate these statements. I confine myself, for the present, to these two: I point out, Sir, that we, who are accused of misrepresenting the number of the people who have left this country, on the contrary, as the Hansard record will show, gravely under-estimated the loss of population in Manitoba and the North-West. At the worst, when we were accused of making most pessimistic statements, we never imagined for one moment that the population of the North-West and the population of Manitoba would have sunk to anything like the low ebb which these returns, lately laid on the Table, in 1885 and 1886, prove to have been the case. I will call the attention of the House to another significant fact. Time and again, knowing, as I well know, that the chiefs of the Roman Catholic clergy in the Province of Quebec were admirably well informed as to the movement of the Catholic population of that Province, time and again I have challenged hon. gentlemen opposite, if they ventured to dispute my statement on that point, to obtain from those gentlemen a statement of what the real facts of the case were in regard to that population. Time and again, that challenge was refused, and I say, therefore, that we have every ground that men can have for believing that in the statement I have made, I am stating but the simple and literal truth. Now, Sir, as regards the bulk of these facts and figures, you may just as well contradict the multiplication table as contradict them. They are there, with the sign-manual of the hon. gentlemen opposite attached to them, and if they be inaccurate, on their heads, and not on mine, the blame must rest. Now, what has been done in this matter, up to the present moment, may be thus defined. First, I am sorry to say, they have attempted to break the force of these arguments by desperate misrepresentations, of which I will give this House a proof, drawn from their own official reports. Sir, I have beside me the returns of the Department of Agriculture, and I call the attention of the House to them. Those returns state that in 1881, 2,200 settled in Manitoba and the North-West. They are particular, you will observe, up to the very last unit. In 1882, there were 58,751; in 1883, 42,722; in 1884, 24,440; in 1885, for reasons which I will not distress hon. gentlemen by referring to, 7,240. Now, Sir, that was the measure of success of the immigration policy of the Government, of their liberal land and railway policy, they only succeeded in inducing, so they state, 155,154 persons to settle in Manitoba between 1881 and 1886. But, Sir, when we come to count noses by actual census, I am very sorry to say the 155,154 settlers, duly certified to us by the Department of Agriculture, had shrunk into 43,000; 16,000 in the North-West, and 27,000 in Manitoba. There, Sir, are their own returns, there are their own facts, there, out of their own mouths, are the proofs that we under-estimated very gravely the extraordinary loss which their misgovernment has brought about in that country. I might add that with respect to the 16,000 souls from Ontario and from foreign countries, whom alone they were able to settle in those magnificent provinces in the North-West, there is clear evidence that at least one-third are supported by Government, are pensioners or employees of the Government, and are paid out of the taxes of the people of this country, and are in no proper sense or shape settlers at all. Then, Sir, beaten at that ground, they dare to tell us that this is of no consequence, that it is of no consequence to the people of Canada that they have lost, in 25 years, well nigh two millions of British subjects, one million of native born Canadians, and three-fourths of a million of British subjects, whom they had induced to come to this country with the intention of settling here. Now, I have no right to put a money value on my own countrymen, or upon the immigrants whom we bring to this country; but I will point to this merely, that if you are to accept the customary standard laid down in the United States, if you can venture to hold that every able-bodied man who comes to North America is worth, when he lands on the dock, $1,000 to the State, then, Sir, whatever may be the cause, the result of all this is, that in losing these 2,000,000 of people we have lost 500,000 of able-bodied men, or thereabouts, and we have lost an equivalent, according to that calculation, to $500,000,000. Certainly had they been here, it is clear that both our debt and our taxes would have been substantially reduced, because we would have had so many more valuable settlers to share the burthen with us. But there is another argument brought forward by men who ought to know better. They tell us that we need take no concern of this, because substantially the same thing is going on in the great State of New York alongside of us. Sir, I demur to that argument. In the first place I point out that when an American citizen leaves the State of New York for any reason, he does not leave the United States; he transfers himself from one part of his own country to another. Does the hon. gentleman suppose we are so ignorant as some of those hon. gentlemen appear to be of the history of North America? Do we not know that nearly 200 years ago New York State was settled, that in the days of William and Mary New York was a prosperous and important colony? Sir, the comparison is preposterous. We, when we lose anybody, and we know this to our cost, we lose them, not to go to another part of the Dominion, but to transfer their allegiance to another country. Now, I take issue most strongly with those hon. gentlemen, that is to say, with those of them who, admitting my facts, venture to contend that this is a matter of no consequence. I say that even if we had under our control no territory beyond the four original Provinces of old Canada, this would be a serious calamity to us, because the four Provinces of old Canada, well administered, are abundantly capable of supporting a population two or three times as great as that they now contain. But when we remember that we have well nigh half a continent at our disposal, that the First Minister himself has risen in his place to tell us that we have 400,000 square miles yet unoccupied of the most fertile territory that the sun ever shone on, [what shall I say of the folly of supposing that it is anything but a great misfortune, a great calamity, a great injury to the people of the country that so huge a portion not only of those who come to settle in Canada, but of those who belong to us, of those who are our own flesh and blood, our own kinsmen, have been obliged for lack of opportunity to leave Canada and seek a home elsewhere? I say that this is proof positive that we are in a state of retrogression.] I say that as regards the four old Provinces of Canada our population is either in a stationary condition, relatively speaking, or, at all events, falls vastly short of increasing according to the laws of natural growth. And I say—although I am not going to enlarge on that subject at this present moment—that I have around me, I see on both sides of the House, if only hon. gentlemen will have the courage of their convictions and speak out what they know, many men intimately acquainted with the state of the agricultural population who could and who, before this debate closes, I hope will bear their testimony to the fact, that all over the four Provinces there has been a very large and formidable reduction in the actual selling value of farm lands and a still more formidable reduction in the price which farmers can obtain for the products they raise. Apply another test. If you choose to turn to the report of Trade and Navigation, which the Minister of Customs with commendable promptitude has laid on the Table, there you will find evidence which ought to convince this House that within the last 14 or 15 years, although there has been a considerable increase of population—but far inferior to that we ought to have had—there has been, and it is a noteworthy fact, a very large reduction in the total volume of trade. Here is the hon. gentleman's own blue book laid within these last few days on the Table of the House, and from that I see that in 1873, 15 years ago, the total volume of trade was $217,500,000, with a population of 3,750,000, that to-day with a population which hon. gentlemen opposite estimate, though incorrectly, at 4,800,000, our total volume of trade and exports is $202,000,000, being $15,000,000 less than it was 15 years ago, although we have 1,000,000 of people or thereabouts more. Sir, apply another test. I find in 1873 the average per head of exports and imports amounted to $38 000; according to the hon. gentleman's own statement the average per head of exports and imports to-day is $41.50; in other words, the total volume of trade measured per head, the proper way of measuring, has declined nearly 50 per cent. I will allow for the reduced values of certain of those articles, but no man can contend that there is not proof of very serious retrogression in one of those indexes which, far more than many of those which have been alluded to here, go to mark the progress of a nation's prosperity. But it would be unjust to hon. gentlemen opposite to suppose they have been idle all this time. They could not keep our people here, they could not keep the emigrants they brought here, they could not raise the value of farm lands, nor the prices of farmers' products; but what they could do they did. In these twenty years they have trebled our debt, in these twenty years they have trebled our taxes, and when the Budget comes to be brought down I think the House will find that the liabilities of the people of this country are very far indeed from being fully discharged or measured even by our present enormous debt. Sir, again I say for the moment I suspend my remarks on their failure to create an important inter-provincial trade. That is a question which requires a little more discussion than it suits me to give it at the moment; and here again I ask my friends from the Maritime Provinces, when the time comes, to contribute for the information of the House their views as to the success which has attended our efforts to create a trade in that direction. Nor will I dwell just now further on the lamentable failure, after the expenditure of over $100,000,000 of public money, to produce or obtain any adequate settlement of the North-West. But I will say a word or two as to the utter failure to obtain any adequate return from our great public works. Sir, the Public Accounts are here, and those Public Accounts show that the people of Canada have expended well nigh $200,000,000 in the construction of railways and canals and divers other improvements. Time was when we hoped those would give us something like an adequate return directly or indirectly, but the time has now arrived when we find these expectations very bitterly disappointed. How now stands the case? I take the Public Accounts for 1887, and I find, all told, a charge of $3,970,000 for the expenses of operating those public works, and that is the nominal charge. The real charge, if our accounts were kept as any other country on earth would keep them, would be nearer $4,500,000, or, at all events, $4,250,000 than $3,970,000. Well, Sir, what do we get as a return? We get a total income of $3,270,000. Not only do we not receive one farthing of interest on the outlay of $200,000,000, but there is a dead annual loss of $700,000 a year, not to speak of the various important items which under our most vicious system of book-keeping are charged to capital account. Sir, again I pass to the question of our failure to keep immigrants, and again I pass for the moment from the question of why it is that we in Canada with 400,000 square miles of the most fertile territory, cannot even keep our own people in our own country. But I have the right, the House and the country has the right, to ask, Why is this? Is it because of the severity of our climate? I think not. The climate of Canada is in part most rigorous, but it is eminently healthy and calculated to develop a vigorous and thrifty offspring. Is it the fault of our soil? Why, has not this House echoed and re-echoed again with declarations of hon. gentlemen opposite that no country on earth possesses a region of such unexcelled fertility as we do possess.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I agree with my friends opposite to a very great extent. Then, Sir, I ask, is it the fault of the people? Well, in part it is the fault of our people for being too credulous and too trusting to the promises of the hon. gentlemen opposite. Anybody who knows how our people conduct themselves when they leave our shores; any one who knows what distinguished positions the immense percentage of that million of Canadians, whose absence I deplore, have obtained in the neighbouring Republic; who knows that they have shown themselves able to fight, and compete with, aye and even to beat our American friends with their own weapons, anybody who knows that will say that it is hardly the fault of the people of Canada if those things are so. But I think we may ask, if it is not the fault of the climate, if it is not the fault of the soil, and if it is not the fault of the people, whose fault then can it be? What am I to say of the threatened collapse of our federal constitution which has become so patent and so manifest in these later days? Have we not seen almost every year and day the very fundamental principles upon which federation depends torn into fragments and afterwards pinned together with bribes, as in the case of Nova Scotia? Do we not know and does not the hon. the First Minister know, if he thinks for a moment, and I trust that he may, and take a second and a wiser thought, that he runs the most imminent risk if he persists in the tyrannical course heretofore pursued by him towards the young and rising Province of Manitoba, that he will have to take the responsibility of that tyranny and that he will have the choice offered to him, to recede from the tyranny or see the Manitobans assert their just rights at any cost.

Mr. MITCHELL. A third rebellion, I suppose.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I trust not.

Mr. MITCHELL. I hope not too.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I believe and I hope that whatever the faults of the First Minister may be he will avoid that third and most fatal mistake. Sir, to a very great extent, as the enormous increase of our debt shows, we have during all this time been living on our credit, and a most mischievous policy it is. We may get temporary advantage from it, we may get temporary assistance, but every man knows, and more than all men who have studied the early history of the United States know, that a young country in our position cannot pursue a more fatal course than to allow its debt to be increased with unexampled rapidity as ours has been increased during the period to which I have alluded. Now what shall we say of the condition of that great interest upon which all other interests in this country depend? Who is there who does not know that there has been, within the last few years, an immense fall in the profits of our farmers, and at the same time a very great increase in the burdens laid upon them? Who does not know, who has studied the history of the world, that at the self-same moment that you are heaping burdens and burdens upon our farmers, at that self-same moment they are being exposed to a totally unexpected and most intense competition in the market which they have hitherto controlled? Who does not know, Sir, that if this kind of thing goes on our population, at least our farming population, may perhaps exist, but it certainly cannot be said to live, at any rate in anything like the comfort it has hitherto enjoyed. More than that, I say distinctly, that I do not believe, unless we put a speedy check to it, that this system can last very long. In twenty years we have trebled our debt, we have trebled our taxes, and we have added 30 per cent. to our population. Suppose we go on for another twenty years, or even for another ten years—and I can tell the House that there are very serious signs that unless such a check as I spoke of is put we will go on in the same headlong, reckless course—why, Sir, in twenty years at the same rate of increase of population, and the same rate of increase of debt and taxation, we will find ourselves with a population of six millions and an annual taxation of ninety millions of dollars. If we pursue the course in the future we will have done nothing more than we have succeeded in doing in the twenty years between 1867 and 1887.

Mr. MITCHELL. The money would be all gone before that time.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps so. Unhappily, all history shows that those evil precedents do not of necessity prepare the way for better. Even were the Government honestly disposed to amend their ways it is scarcely possible for them under ordinary circumstances to put a stop to this practice of intense, insane expense. More than that, they will do well to remember that if I am correct in the statement I have made (and I challenge the strictest scrutiny), if I am correct in saying that a million or thereabouts of the native born population of Canada have sought homes elsewhere, they must remember that the tendency of that is altogether to increase. Who are the men who leave us? Everyone who pays attention to the character of that emigration knows that I am stating the simple literal fact when I say that in a most unusual proportion they are the very pick and flower and choicest portion of our population. Everybody knows, Sir, that the men who leave us are just the men whom wise statesmen would desire to retain in Canada. Now were our position such as that which formerly used to obtain between Scotland and England I could not complain so much, because if the same rule applied between ourselves and the United States as between Scotland and England we would still have the satisfaction of knowing that when our friends left us they went to swell the strength of the Empire, or the Dominion, as the case might be, in some other part of it. But, unfortunately, here the case is precisely the reverse. They are a double loss to us, because they go to swell the strength of our nearest neighbor, rival and competitor. Now, Sir, a matter of consideration which perhaps is more important than all, is, what possible available remedies are there for such a state of things? So far as I can see these remedies are four. In the first place I think that a very great improvement might be made by reforming our present most oppressive and unjust system of taxation. I say that an immense improvement might be made by so revising our constitution in the manner which we have pressed from this side of the House time and again, and in the manner which we have seen our friends—not our friends but the friends of the Government—in conference assembled have lately likewise proposed; and by so altering the constitution that this tyrannical conduct on the part of the Federal authorities towards the rights and privileges of the Local Legislatures should be put an end to forever. On the other hand that which is equally important is that this system of bribes, and all those frequent and incessant forays by various Provincial Governments on the Dominion Treasury, whenever they have been extravagant and got into a scrape, may likewise be put a stop to; and for a third remedy, Sir, that this most mischievous railway monopoly which has barred our progress up to the present time, and which has barred the settlement and prosperity of north-western Manitoba, should likewise be put an end to. But most of all and most important of all, do I believe would be the success in the obtaining of the proposition which I ask the Government to try and obtain in the resolution now in your hands, the obtaining of perfect free trade with the people of the United States. I say, Sir, that that is worth all the rest. Give us that and railway monopolies will cease to vex and harass you; give us that, Sir, and the federal relations will speedily adjust themselves as federal relations ought to do and as federal relations were intended to do; give us that, and the sting would be taken out of those tariff combines, more particularly if the United States, as there is now a good hope that it will do, proceeds to emancipate itself from the trade fetters it most foolishly put on. It may be said that this is an heroic remedy. Well, all I can say is that if it be, never in the history of this country, at any rate, was a heroic remedy more needed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Now, I am not disposed to go further with this proposition without being prepared to say that it is in the highest degree advantageous to both countries. I am very sorry for many reasons that the hon. Minister of Finance is not in his place to-day; but I dare say the House will remember how, in a fine glow of patriotic enthusiasm, that hon. gentleman, about a year ago, went the length of declaring that, if we only knew it, we in Canada possess the best half of this continent. Well, I will not venture to go quite that length, but I will say that we are able, man for man, dollar for dollar, to give a full and perfect equivalent to the United States for all we ask them to give us. I desire that it should be so. I do not believe this proposition or any other for mutual trade, can be successfully carried out unless we are able to give as much as we get; and, while I say that, while such trade would undoubtedly, in my judgment, enrich four or five million Canadians, quite as much enrichment would come to four or five million, or it may be to eight or ten million Americans. Sir, the advantages to Canada are very obvious, but I will come to those presently. In the meantime, I take this opportunity to point out that free trade with Canada would give to the United States an extremely valuable market at their very doors—that free trade with Canada would open up to American enterprise vast new areas, equal to at least a dozen new States; and, Sir, in such a case as I suppose, I have no doubt whatever that the growth of Canada would be so rapid that we should become within an extremely short time, in all probability, the most valuable customer the United States possessed.

Mr. HESSON. Hewers of wood and drawers of water for the Americans.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Hewers of wood and drawers of water! Sir, I have a better opinion, and I may say the Americans have a better opinion, of the ability and capacity of our fellow-countrymen than to suppose that they would consent to be hewers of wood and drawers of water. Does not my hon. friend, whose heart is better than his head in these matters—does he not know of his own experience that the Canadians who, unfortunately for us, leave this country, do not subside into hewers of wood and drawers of water on the other side of the border? But, as I have said, they take the highest places amongst the best citizens of the United States. Sir, we have, to say the least of it, enormous stores of raw material of great value to the industries of the United States, and these are very thoroughly appreciated, let me tell the hon. gentleman opposite, by American economists of very high degree. I have quoted the passage before—it may be said to be a hackneyed passage—but, nevertheless I will take the liberty of quoting again in this connection the language in which one of the most eminent living authorities on political economy, in North America, at any rate, and perhaps in the world, has described the advantages which Canada has to offer, if it is allowed to obtain free trade with the United States. This is the passage, Sir, and I make no apology for repeating it to a Canadian audience:

"North of Lakes Erie and Ontario, and of the River St. Lawrence, and east of Lake Huron, south of the 45th parallel of latitude, and included mainly in the present Dominion of Canada, there is as fair a country as exists on the American continent, nearly as large in area as New York, Pennsylvania and Ohio combined, and equal, if not superior, as a whole, to those States in agricultural capability. It is the natural habitation on this continent of the combing-wool sheep. It is the land where grows the finest barley, which the brewing interest of the United States must have if it ever expects to rival Great Britain in its annual export of eleven millions sterling of malt products. It raises and grazes the finest cattle, with qualities specially desirable to make good the deterioration of stock in other sections, and its climatic conditions, created by an almost encirclement of the great lakes, especially fit to grow men. Such a country is one of the greatest gifts of Providence to the human race; better than bonanzas of silver or rivers whose sands run gold."

Now, Sir, in all that you will find nothing of the vast virgin wheat fields of Manitoba; you will find nothing of the vast treasure troves which still exist scarcely scratched on the slopes of the Rocky Mountains, west and north of our side of Lake Superior, and within the gorges of British Columbia. And, Sir, I would not duplicate, but I could produce twenty testimonies like this from Americans who know the value of Canada to the American people, in support of my contention that Canada most assuredly will be able to give a fair equivalent for all that, under my proposition, Canada is likely to ask the United States to give her. Does any hon. gentleman opposite choose to gainsay this proposition? Then, Sir, as it is with all the absurdity of two hostile tariffs stretching for two thousand miles between the two countries, let hon. gentlemen consider what we have done already in the way of mutual trade and intercourse. Of the $202,000,000 which represents our total volume of trade, over $80,000,000, in spite of all foolish artificial legislation, or nearly one-half, and that the most profitable half, is with the United States. Sir, it is an interesting question, but it is a question on which I hardly dare to offer an opinion, if, with all these obstacles deliberately put in our way, such is the force of nature that it will overleap all these artificial obstacles and secure us a trade of over $80,000,000, what might we not obtain if perfect unrestricted free trade were obtained? I will venture to say that it is well within the bounds of possibility that with unrestricted intercourse with the United States that $80,000,000 might within a very few years swell to $300,000,000; and if any hon. gentleman thinks that an exaggerated or unreasonable statement, I advise him to look carefully at that remarkable portion of Mr. Nimmo's report of the Trade and Navigation Returns of the United States of 1884, in which he treats of the value of the United States internal trade, of which, on my hypothesis, Canada would share an equal part per capita. Sir, it is an extremely curious thing that Mr. Nimmo, who is a high authority on these matters, estimates the internal or inter-state trade of the United States at six or seven times the total volume of its export and import trade. Mr. Nimmo holds that the inter-state trade amounts to ten thousand millions of dollars. That is his calculation, not mine; and, Sir, if that were the case in 1883, when Mr. Nimmo wrote, you may depend upon it that the inter-state trade is vastly larger to-day; and if there be any sort of foundation for the statement he makes, I, in naming $300,000,000 as the possible figure to which the trade of Canada with the United States might attain, am vastly within the mark. Sir, it appears to me that the House, in its anxiety to promote certain manufactures at home, has wholly and entirely lost sight of the enormous extent to which, under a better system, export and import trade have grown elsewhere. I took the trouble the other day to see how our export and import trade compared with the trade of Australasia—the Australian Colonies and New Zealand. The facts are worthy the attention of the House, for whereas we have, according to these hon. gentlemen, 4,800,000 souls, and, according to my calculation, 4,600,000 souls, and whereas Australasia has 3,421,000 souls, I find the total export and import trade of Australasia amounted last year to £105,000,000 sterling, equal to $525,000,000, for a population of three and a half millions, against an export and import trade of $202,000,000 for our population of 4,600,000 or 4,800,000. Why, if our export and import trade compared per capita with that of Australasia, instead of being $200,000,000 it would be $730,000,000, according to the statement of hon. gentlemen opposite themselves. It is, I believe, scarcely necessary for me to insist on the enormous advantage which unrestricted trade with the United States would be to us. Who does not know that for an immense number of the products of the people of this country, the United States is not merely the best market, but substantially the only market. Now, I do not blame the Government much in that they have tried, at all hazards, to force trade among the various Provinces of this Dominion. I have always myself regarded it as very uphill work, about as profitable indeed as an attempt to make water run up hill, and the history of the Intercolonial Railway goes very far to show that I have been right in that contention. But I am going to give the House a curious practical test of the results which have attended the efforts made, I do not doubt, in all good faith, to promote inter-provincial trade among the several Provinces of the Dominion. Hon. gentlemen know very well that where there is much trade between different States or countries, you have one very good practical test where the climate and conditions of life are the same, and that test is the intermixture which takes place among the various peoples trading together. Now, I have here the census return for 1881, and I have to call the attention of this House to a few very simple facts which these returns expose. I find that in 1881, there were of natives of Ontario, 105 settled in Prince Edward Island, 310 in New Brunswick, and 333 in Nova Scotia; in all 748 natives of Ontario, settled in the Maritime Provinces. I find much the same state of things in Quebec, with the exception of two counties which border on certain counties in New Brunswick, where the population on both sides are essentially of the same origin. I find, and it may interest hon. gentlemen to know it, that at that same hour and day there were, of persons of United States birth, 609 in Prince Edward Island, 5,108 in New Brunswick, 3,004 in Nova Scotia, or, in rough terms, about thirteen times as many natives of the United States in the Maritime Provinces as there are natives of Ontario. Lest any hon. gentleman should say that the natural course of immigration is westward, I took the trouble to go back a few years, and I found that, twenty-five years ago, in 1861, when we were not confederated together, when we had no Intercolonial Railway, 7,600 natives of the Maritime Provinces had taken up their quarters in Ontario; while in 1881, after fifteen years of Confederation, and knowing more about us, I suppose, only 7,200 were found there. The number had positively reduced by several hundred. Take the census returns. Turn to the Province of Lower Canada, and you will see eight or ten large, populous counties with a population of 150,000 or 200,000 souls, and not one representative of my hon. friends from the Maritime Provinces is to be found there. It is almost phenomenal, and what is a very curious fact, which appears in the census returns, is that there was far more immigration in the decade from 1851 to 1861 than from 1861 to 1881, in spite of the official connection. Is it not idle to deny such facts as these? Is it not idle to fight against evidence? Must we not admit that, no matter how the Government may strive, no matter how the people may strive, you cannot establish any great inter-provincial trade from which any great profit can redound to the people of this country. What is the history of the Intercolonial Railway? It is contained here in our Public Accounts. We find that on the 30th of June, 1887, the Intercolonial Railway stood as an asset in the books of Canada for $46,431,000; we find that the total expenses of the Intercolonial Railway for that year were $2,828,000, and their total receipts $2,596,000. Not only did the Intercolonial Railway not pay one copper of interest on its cost, but there is an admitted loss of $231,000 in the running of that road for one single year, and a real loss, if we properly charge up the accounts, of $400,000 or $500,000; and in addition to that, every single year since I have had a seat in this House, a million dollars at least of extra expenditure has been charged to the capital account. Take the whole together, the interest and sinking fund, and they represent a dead annual loss of $2,070,000, and the loss on running it must at least be $400,000 or $500,000, while we spend a million dollars on capital account every year besides, which we will continue to do for many years yet to come. Do hon. gentlemen venture to tell us there is any hope of improvement here? Does the House remember that a few weeks ago I put the question across the floor as to the result of the first seven months' running? And does the House remember that for this current year 1888, the Intercolonial Railway has cost us just $340,000 in seven months more than we received from it? Just $340,000 dead loss on seven months running of the Intercolonial Railway, and I may add, as if that were not enough, that we have recently been called on to subsidize a so-called short line for the express purpose of cutting through and destroying the value of the same Intercolonial Railway which has cost us $50,000,000, thus probably doubling the huge deficit that now exists. I think, Sir, that every hon. gentleman will admit I have shown conclusively that, do what you will, trade will seek, in spite of all your legislation, for its natural market. Who does not know, who dares deny, that the trade of Halifax naturally seeks Boston, that the trade of Toronto naturally seeks New York, that the trade of Winnipeg seeks St. Paul and the country south of it, and that the trade of Victoria naturally seeks San Francisco and the rest of the Pacific coast? There is an old saying, and I think a true saying in part, that trade follows the flag; but I tell this House that it is still more true that trade follows the people, and we have unhappily already sent out about two millions of missionaries to cultivate friendly trade relations with the United States. More than that, it is well to remember that great economic changes are in progress, that there has been a very material alteration in our position as regards the markets of the world. It is quite clear that, in older Canada, at any rate, grain production is on the wane, and that the only cereal which we can depend upon as likely to continue to be raised in large quantities is the article of barley, for which we have practically no market except in the United States. That is also true in a very high degree of the more important of our other agricultural productions, with perhaps the solitary exception of the important article of cheese. Now, I contend that for almost everything which our farmers have to sell, the United States, if only we had free and unrestricted trade with them, would afford us absolutely the best market; and I contend further that, besides being the best market, it is literally the only market for a great many important articles which we produce. See, in spite of all artificial obstacles, how huge a percentage of the total volume of our trade is the volume of our trade with the United States. Out of a total volume of trade of $202,000,000, the United States supply the trade of $83,000,000. Out of $81,000,000 of exports of our own produce, we sell to the United States, or sold last year over $36,000,000, or very nearly one-half. Out of a total of goods entered for consumption of $ 05,000,000, we bought $15,000,000 from the United States. And to come to details, which is necessary in order to lay the case fairly before the House, what do we find as to an enormous number of articles produced by agriculturists in this country? These figures are instructive in a very high degree. We find that, of 18,779 horses which we sold, the United States bought 18,275. We find that, of 443,000 sheep, the United States bought from us 363,000. We find that, of 116,000 cattle, in spite of all tariff restrictions, they bought from us 45,000 head. Of $107,000 worth of poultry, the United States bought $99,000 worth. Of about $2,000,000 worth of eggs—$1,850,000, to be accurate—the United States bought all. Of $593,000 worth of hides, the United States bought $413,000 worth. Of 527,000 tons of coal, the United States bought 404,000. Of 140,000 tons of gypsum, the United States bought all. Of iron ore, the United States bought all. Of salt, all that we sold, the United States bought from us. Of stone and marble, all that we sold, the United States bought from us. In spite of fishery disputes, and taxes I suppose, of $6,875,000 worth of fish that we sold, the United States was our best customer and bought $2,717,000 worth. Of $20,485,000 worth of lumber, the United States bought as nearly as possible one half, $9,353,000. Of 1,416,000 pounds of wool, the United States bought 1,300,000 pounds. Of 9,456,000 bushels of barley, the United States again bought all. Of $743,000 worth of hay, the United States bought $670,000. Of $439,000 worth of potatoes, the United States bought $328,000. Of $83,000 worth of general vegetables, they bought $75,000 worth. Of $254,000 worth of miscellaneous agricultural products, the United States bought $249,000 worth, without speaking of innumerable smaller articles, such as apples, flax and a great variety of other things; and, if the duties were once removed, no one who has ever been in Manitoba and the North-West but knows that the United States would become by all odds our best customer for a great deal of our high class wheat. Why, in the mere article of manufactures, the United States, out of a total of $3,079,000, bought $1,289,000 worth, and of miscellaneous articles the United States bought $559,000 worth out of a total of $644,000. There are two things to which I want to call the attention of all the members of this House. One is that, for very obvious reasons, our exports to the United States are largely undervalued. They do not at all fairly represent the amount we sell. So long as they maintain a high tariff, it is the obvious interest of every Canadian seller to underestimate the value of the articles he has to sell, and, as everyone knows, the thing is habitually and constantly done. In another respect it is very important that the House should know that in the case of an enormous number of the articles to which I have called specific attention, there is room for well nigh unlimited expansion. Given free trade, given unrestricted intercourse, and that trade might assume nearly unlimited proportions in regard to a great many of those articles; and these are two facts which should be borne in mind when we are considering the possible development of our American trade. Now, not only have I shown that, even fettered and thwarted and hampered as it is, our trade with the United States forms an immense proportion of our total trade with all the world, but I ask the House to consider what sort of a market it is that these resolutions of mine propose to open to the people of Canada. Why, look for one moment at the host of great and growing cities which stud our southern frontier alone—Chicago, Detroit, Cleveland, Buffalo, Boston and New York. Those cities alone which I have named, with their environs, contain a population of something like five millions of people who are the very best customers on the face of the earth. Consider how conveniently they are situated to our markets. There is hardly one of all those I have named which is more than twelve hours distant from a Canadian market. The Canadian seller might talk over a telephone with the American buyer in almost every one of those cities. Then look at our railway system. I speak more particularly of the railway system of the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec. Look at the huge sums we have expended upon it, and the small returns up to date which that large outlay has brought. The returns show that we have about 12,000 miles of railway all over the Dominion, a very large percentage of which is centred in Ontario and Quebec. These railways are alleged to have cost $653,000,000, and, although I believe a considerable amount of that is water—as it is technically called—I believe our system of railways represents an outlay, or would be worth at any rate about $500,000,000. Now, to-day the gross earnings of those roads are put down at about $33,000,000, the expense of operating them at over $24,000,000, and it is known that the amount returned as the expense of operating them does not include all that ought properly to be charged to that account. That $653,000,000 of nominal cost, therefore, does not to-day on the average pay 1½ per cent. on the nominal expenditure. Give us unrestricted intercourse with the United States, and I tell you that, as far at all events as the central Provinces are concerned, you will double the gross earnings and treble or quadruple the net profits of these railways, and from a very poor property convert these vast amounts, which have been largely supplied from abroad, into a very good, paying, profitable investment, to the great advantage of the people of Canada as well as to that of the men who originally supplied the money. Then another point. Let us consider how our population is distributed. We all know the natural impediments which arise to inter-provincial trade. We all know how conveniently the Maritime Provinces, Manitoba and British Columbia are situated for trade with the United States; and how exceedingly inconveniently they are placed for trade with the central Provinces. I apprehend that no man on either side will dispute my position that to the Maritime Provinces, at any rate, to Manitoba, to the North-West Territory, to British Columbia, free and unrestricted trade with the United States is of the most enormous importance. But, Mr. Speaker, I am coming to the country I know best—old Canada, from Quebec to Sarnia—how is the population distributed there? Why, Sir, it is known to every man here that nineteen-twentieths of the population of these two great Provinces is so centred that it is literally within five hours rail, on the average, to the American frontier. Then consider the advantages of such a market. Remember that it is one of the most rapidly growing markets in the world. Within the last twenty-five years the American market has grown from 30,000,000 to over 60,000,000 of consumers, and it has not stopped growing. In all human probability before the next census is taken in 1890, the statisticians of the United States compute that the population will have grown to something like 64,000,000 or 65,000,000. More than that, the population, especially the population of the great cities I have alluded to, is one of the very richest populations on the earth. There is no population in the world, keen bargainers though the Americans are, no doubt, with whom it is so desirable to establish free trade relations for the agriculturists of any country, as it is with the population of the great American cities. It is perfectly well known to all who are familiar with that people, that there is no market, I repeat, on the face of the earth, where the man who has a first-rate article, particularly of food, to sell, is half so sure of obtaining a first-rate price for it, as in the United States. Nowhere have I known men who spend so lavishly on their own personal living and for their own personal comfort, as the great millionaires, and for that matter the great bulk of the population of the great cities of the United States. And these, Sir, are reasons which make it more and more desirable to us that we should obtain free and unrestricted intercourse with them, so that we can take advantage of the very great facilities which our natural position, in Ontario and Quebec more especially, gives for trading with those great centres. They are at our very door. We do not require to make long journeys in order to make the acquaintance of our American customers. As I said before, we can literally talk to them from the telephone. At the worst, a few hours' journey by rail will bring us face to face with them. We have no middlemen to fear in dealing with the United States. We can thoroughly understand the market, or it is our own fault if we do not. Every merchant, every man of business, knows what an enormous advantage it is to any country that the men who sell should understand thoroughly what the purchaser wants to buy. But, Sir, I do not know that it would be necessary for our people to give themselves the slightest trouble. I remember, and I dare say there are plenty of gentlemen who remember, what habitually took place under the old Reciprocity treaty, when Canada prospered more than she has ever done since. Why, Sir, when we had something approaching to free intercourse with the United States there was this curious peculiarity, that the buyer sought the sellers and not the seller the buyer. It was a matter of everyday occurrence, particularly in the Province of Ontario, that our farmers, during the existence of the Reciprocity treaty, were visited daily, and almost hourly, by American purchasers who were ready to buy the apple off the tree, the crop on the ground, even the ungrown food, if the farmer was willing to sell it. Again, I repeat that there is no market where a man who has got a good article to sell has anything like as good a chance of selling it as the people of Canada, and particularly of Ontario and Quebec, have in dealing with the American people. Sir, I have been taken to task on more than one occasion for venturing to say, what I now repeat, that in my poor judgment, one native born Canadian was worth more to this country than any half-dozen imported immigrants, and I say that without, in the slightest degree, desiring to reflect on the many good, worthy and industrious men who, in time past, have cast in their lot with us. My opinion always has been that as a taxpayer, and as contributing to the development of the country, one native born Canadian is worth half-a-dozen of any other nationality. Sir, in the same way, one United States customer is worth to us in Canada, half-dozen English customers, and half-a-dozen customers of any other nationality. And what is true of them to us, is true of us to them. I say that to the United States the trade of Canada is worth a great deal more than our present numbers would indicate; I say that our trade is worth that of many times such populations as those with which the Americans are now attempting to open up trade relations in Mexico, or in South America, or any other of those countries which extend below them, more especially if we prosper largely. Now, it is a curious thing—I do not know whether it has attracted the attention of any members of this House—that after all we have talked, after all we have said about the desirability of extending our trade with foreign countries, these same trade returns that I have here, go to show in a very remarkable way that we have practically only two customers, after all said and done—one of these customers are the people of England and her colonies, and the other are the people of the United States. I do not know whether hon. gentlemen have considered that fact, but if they will look at the returns for 1887 they will see that of our own produce, Canada, in all, exported $30,960,000, of which she sent to the United States, $35,250,000; to Great Britain, $38,750,000; to the British Colonies, about $3,000,000, and to all the rest of the world, $3,800,000—$77,000,000 to the United States, to Great Britain and her colonies, and less than $4,000,000 to all the rest of the world put together. In 1873, to show that this is no mere casual accident, I find that an identically similar state of things prevailed. Then our total exports amounted to $76,500,000. The United States bought $36,755,000; Great Britain bought $31,421,000; the British Colonies bought $3,953,000; all others put together bought $4,500,000. So when we trace the course of our commerce down for these 15 years, we find that it is literally true, for practical purposes, that we have but two customers, as yet, of any importance in the world, one the United States and the other the people of Great Britain and her colonies. And what is true of exports is true likewise of imports. Take 1887; we imported a total for consumption of $105,639,000 worth. We bought from the United States, $45,107,000 worth; we bought from Great Britain, $44,962,000. Of $145,000,000 worth, $90,000,000 were purchased from our two chief customers. In 1873 we purchased $47,750,000 worth from the United States, from Great Britain $78,500,000 worth, or $115,000,000 out of $127,000,000. That I contend is a matter of first-rate importance, for this reason: I have shown the House, that, say what we will, we have but two great customers, Great Britain and the United States. One admits our productions without the slightest let or hindrance: we and all the nations of the world in common with us have a perfectly free entrance to British markets; in the other case, partly by our own doings and partly by the action of the United States, the most formidable artificial restrictions are imposed on our commerce. But still the fact remains that we have but those two customers. Which of the two is likely to be more important to us? Well, there is an easy test. Twenty years ago the British population was about 30,000,000; to-day the British population is about 35,000,000. Twenty or twenty-five years ago the American population was 30,000,000; to-day the American population is 60,000,000 or 61,000,000. Judge, then, for yourselves which of those two countries, situated as they are, is likely to afford the greatest possible benefit to Canadian trade.

It being six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, it will, I do not doubt, be a relief to the House, as it certainly is to myself, to be able to inform them that I do not think I will require to tax their attention with any great array of figures from this time out. I cannot but feel that I am indebted to both sides of the House for the uncommon patience with which they listened to the somewhat protracted array of statistics which it was my necessary duty to inflict upon them before dinner, Sir, when we separated I had just completed explaining to the House upon what grounds I based my statement relative to the movement of the population, on what grounds it was that I held that unrestricted trade with the United States would be likely to develop an enormous volume of trade between this country and that. I had also taken the opportunity of calling the attention of the House to the unfortunate failure, from causes which are patent to all of us, of our attempts to create any great inter-provincial trade; and I had pointed out a fact, which, I think, has not always been borne in mind, the great and growing character of the American market, and the plain and obvious fact that we in Canada, from our geographical position, are to a very great extent shut in practically to two markets only, the markets of England and her colonies, and the markets of the United States. Now, Sir, it becomes my duty to consider, first of all, what classes of our population are likely to benefit by free and unrestricted trade with the United States; or possibly I should say, what classes of our population are not likely to be immensely benefited by free and unrestricted trade in that quarter. I will then have to consider the objections which have been urged from time to time in the press and elsewhere against propositions more or less analogous to that which I have placed in your hands, Mr. Speaker, and then I may have a few general remarks to make on the position in which we find ourselves to-day; but, as I have said, I trust to be able to spare the House for the most part from a repetition of those necessary but somewhat tedious statistics which occupied the major portion of the previous discussion. Sir, I think all the House will agree with me in saying that, whoever may or may not be benefited by this proposition, there can really be no ground for doubting that the whole great agricultural class from one end of the Dominion to the other will be enormous gainers if the markets of the United States are thrown open to them. I think, Sir, that no man will gainsay, least of all the gentlemen from the Maritime Provinces, that the fishermen of those Provinces will gain enormously from access to the United States markets. Surely no man will gainsay, and least of all my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Charlton), that the lumbermen of Canada and all the vast interests connected with them will gain enormously from access to the United States markets. The miners will gain enormously, the whole vast number of persons and the whole interests representing, as I have pointed out, $500,000,000 or $600,000,000 of capital, largely connected with the railroad and transportation service generally of this country, will also all gain enormously by free trade with the United States. Not only that but all those great classes collectively representing the great producing classes of this Dominion and including the vast majority of manufacturers who have gained their living practically by ministering to and serving the classes I have named, must of necessity obtain great increase of prosperity if you increase the prosperity of the class I have named. More than that I believe that although a great deal has been said—foolishly, I think—as to the risk the manufacturers of Canada will run in the event of our establishing unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, I believe that there is good grounds for saying that all manufacturers who deserve to flourish in Canada on account of pluck, and capital, and energy, will prosper likewise enormously if that great market be opened to them. It is due, I think, to the Mail newspaper to say that the energy and enterprise which that newspaper, in common with others, has displayed, in interviewing the great employers of labor throughout this country, has resulted at least in showing that those who are the best and stand highest in the opinion of the people as manufacturers are quite prepared, if you give them the United States market, to take their manufacturing existence in their hands and have no doubt of the successful result. Who do the classes I have named represent, together with the classes who are dependent upon them? They represent nineteen-twentieths of the whole people of this country; I might with truth say ninety-nine-hundredths of the people of this country, and they will, beyond all dispute, be greatly benefited if you can obtain free and unrestricted reciprocity with the United States. Now, another side of the question to be considered, is, who are the parties who are likely to lose if we establish free trade with the United States? I do not deny that when you introduce any great measure into this country that there will be considerable economic disturbance and that some industries may be injured which we would like to preserve. That fact I do not deny. No great change ever has occurred or ever will occur without inconvenience in some way. No great change in machinery, for instance, can be introduced without rendering much existing machinery worthless, and without injuring a certain portion of the community, but I doubt if any great measure was ever proposed which was so little likely to injure those classes of the community whom the best minds in the community would desire to save, as this present one. I can see that certain interests will be injured, no doubt. I can see, for instance, that those worthy gentlemen whose proceedings are now being investigated by the committee presided over by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), those gentlemen who are, as I may say, pushing the protective doctrine to its legitimate development and evolution—I can well conceive that the combines and trusts will have their troubles considerably increased, even if they escape the hon. gentleman's committee, by free and unrestricted trade with the United States. I can conceive, I honestly confess, that there are other industries, not very numerous but important, and some of them possibly dear to hon. members of this House, which may be injuriously affected if this policy should be carried into practical effect. There can be no doubt of one thing and that is that if this policy be carried into effect it will mean for a considerable time to come the enforcement of a much needed economy. I see, for instance, that devoted and most industrious band of public servants who act from time to time as missionaries on the Government's behalf in disputed elections, may suffer. They may be dismounted and obliged to go a-foot, and it may be barefoot too. I say also that there is a danger, and I do not wish to gainsay it, that the electioneering cornucopia may run dry, and that if you adopt the system it will enforce, in your own despite, a rigorous economy. You will have to carry your bye-elections, or not to carry them, as the case may be, without promises of piers, and harbours, and post offices, and railway grants. There is danger, and a serious danger, too, that the subscriptions of the manufacturers' association to certain peculiar funds will grow smaller by degrees and beautifully less and may vanish altogether. It is possible, and it is a serious thing, that the monopolists may find that their occupation is gone, and the worship of the great goddess of monopoly brought to naught. It is possible that the trade profits and emoluments of that valuable class of men, known as practical politicians, may be very greatly interfered with. All those things I see are possible if this measure be put in force, and if, as I stated, strict economy become, as it inevitably will in such a case become, the order of the day. Now, I do not deny—I never have denied—that, looking at the way in which the Government has been administered in this country for many a long day, those are grave and serious charges, almost of a revolutionary character, and I can well understand that the venerable leader and father of this House, like the Duke of Wellington on a similar occasion, may shake his reverend locks and murmur to himself that he does not see how the Queen's Government in Canada is going to be carried on any longer in his own peculiar fashion. Knowing as I do how excellently well affected this House has always shown itself to vested interests, it may be—having regard to the fact that although those interests are few that they are very important and very dear to many hon. and estimable members—that the House may say that it is better that the ninety-nine-hundredths should go on and toil and moil, and, as the reports of the Labor Commission which so lately sat in Montreal show, may starve, and suffer, and die, for the benefit of those righteous men who earn cent per cent. dividends, and who supply the money to keep this best of all possible Governments in power. Those, Sir, are the state of things which exist, as I am enabled, in a hurried analysis, to judge. This, Sir, is a tolerably correct statement of the men, and of the classes, who profit, and who will lose, by unrestricted reciprocity and free trade with the United States. The House will remember, I dare say, how I showed that there is ground for expecting an unprecedented and enormous increase of the whole volume of our trade, from one end of this country to the other, enriching all save the classes that I have excepted. And now comes the question, what is it that forbids the banns? What are the objections? What are the reasons which can fairly be urged by any hon. gentleman against this proposition? If I am correct or even approximately correct in my views as to the benefits which would result to the people of Canada from the adoption of this policy, what are the objections which can be urged for the purpose of keeping asunder two countries which—I say it in no spirit of irreverence—God has joined for purposes of mutual benefit? Sir, I have heard some hon. gentlemen, or the organs of some hon. gentlemen, contend that, forsooth, however desirable this thing may be, the consequences of our own folly during the past ten or twenty years have been such that we cannot afford to have it; we will lose revenue—we have been bled so much that we cannot afford to be cured; for that is the argument. Sir, the case is bad, I grant; but the case is not so bad as that. But briefly their argument is this: they admit, or some of them admit, that this thing in itself, per se, would be very desirable; but they tell us that we cannot afford to lose all the income which we derive from the customs duties that we obtain from the American imports. Now, Sir, I do not suppose there is any man in Canada, certainly not one man on the floor of this House, who appreciates more thoroughly than I do, or who has declared from his place more emphatically than I, how very grievously the whole future of Canada has been injured and damaged and mortgaged by what I have repeatedly called the insane folly that has beset the people and the Government of Canada in heaping up their debt and taxation at the moment when their great rival is reducing both. Sir, I am in the judgment of this House when I say that no man ever strove harder than did my hon. friend, Mr. Mackenzie, when he was Prime Minister of Canada, to put a check to that extravagance and folly, and his efforts were crowned with a good measure of success; and it is well to take this opportunity of reminding this House and the people of Canada that, if this be a desirable thing and if all that stands in our way is the financial difficulty, had Mr. Mackenzie's policy been maintained, and his Administration been continued in office, and had the people of Canada desired to make an alliance with the United States, there would have been no financial difficulty to grapple with. I say, and I speak with knowledge, that I could have done it had I been left in office. I say it would have been an easy task for an honest and intelligent Administration to have kept down the total expenditure of Canada to $26,000,000 or $27,000,000 at the uttermost, and the total taxation of Canada to $20,000,000 at the uttermost, and withal to have placed half a million of the best settlers in the world in Manitoba, to their great profit and ours. Now, Sir, I wish to face this question squarely and fairly. I do not, for my part at all, pretend to tell this House that if we obtain immediately free and unrestricted intercourse with the United States, there might not be some temporary inconvenience accruing to us in the matter of the revenue; but Sir, I have this to point out: This proposition of mine does not involve the addition of one cent or one farthing to the burdens of the people, but much the contrary. We do not purpose, Sir, as some have proposed in discussing schemes for the future of Canada, to add many millions a year to our annual expenditure. We are not talking, Sir, at this present moment of raising $37,000,000 in place of $30,000,000. We are simply talking of raising $30,000,000, by a small alteration in the mode of taxation and by a readjustment of taxation in general. I repeat, it is possible, though not by any manner of means inevitable or necessary, that you may have to alter your mode of collection. It is not necessary in the slightest degree that you should add one penny to the total aggregate burdens of the people, but the contrary. Sir, allow me to say that this dread, whether it be real or pretended, of a possible recourse for our revenue to direct taxation, has always struck me as a most exceedingly weak argument in a case like this. In the first place, Sir, non constat that you will require to have any direct taxation at all; let the House remember that. There is enormous room for judicious economy in our present administration of the revenue. I do not say hon. gentlemen opposite can economise; but, Sir, I think I could put my hand on members of this House who could some economy. While we did economise, we got small thanks for it; but perhaps the people are wiser now. Nay, most assuredly the people are wiser now; and could we appeal to the people on a fair division of the constituencies, with honest returning officers and deputy returning officers, without the scale weighted against us with grants for piers, harbors and bridges and railway branches, and every form of political influence, then, Sir, I think hon. gentlemen opposite would find that the results—I speak for my own Province, at least—will be as correctly reflected in the Parliament at Ottawa as they are in the Parliament at Toronto. However, Sir, we will pass over a point on which I can hardly expect those hon. gentlemen to agree with me. I desire to point out that the fundamental fact, for fact it is, on which this whole argument is based, is this: Give us free and unrestricted intercourse with the United States, and by that act you enormously increase the whole income of the vast majority of the people of Canada. You will enable them, and as I believe almost instantaneously, almost within year and day, to buy a great quantity of goods which they cannot now buy, a large proportion of which will be dutiable goods; and by consequence there is good and sound ground, if you admit my preliminary fact to be true, for saying that it is altogether likely that the remaining taxes will yield quite as much as those we now have in our federally restricted system. But bear in mind that no increase whatever is contemplated; all that is required is a simple re-adjustment. It is possible—we will admit for argument's sake—that the hon. gentlemen are right, and that my contention is wrong that the people will grow enormously richer and yet will not consume more dutiable goods, though I know of no case in which that case has occurred. We will suppose, for argument's sake, that we have to face this bugbear of direct taxation—direct taxation, be it remembered, not for all our revenue, but a trifling portion of it alone. Now, Sir, I have to call the attention of the House in that connection to certain important facts. First of all, no man who has paid any attention to this subject will, I think, dare to deny the fact, which I think is recognised by every political economist, that direct taxation properly levied takes a great deal less out of the pocket of the people than indirect taxation; most of all, indirect taxation, levied as our system of indirect taxation is levied now. Sir, I desire to say that, in my judgment, we ought not, I do not think that Government would dare, I do not think any other Government would wish, to add by direct taxation one farthing or one penny to the taxes that now press most heavily on the agricultural classes, on the fishermen, on the miners, on the lumbermen, on all the great producing classes in this community. I shall be prepared to prove in some detail, at the proper place and time, that among the many faults with which our system abounds, perhaps the greatest is this: that under it the hard-working, industrious, thrifty man is taxed enormously out of proportion to his earnings; and I say that with a system of direct taxation, if you must have recourse to it, although I doubt greatly whether you need, with proper economy, have recourse to it, that crying injustice must be redressed, and the respectable, well-to-do, monied classes must be made to pay their fair proportion—no more should be asked—to the burdens of the country. This proportion they most assuredly do not contribute to-day, and never will, under a system of purely indirect taxation. Further, we should bear in mind, as these hon. gentlemen are so intensely desirous of copying English precedents, that it is the system of the mother country in a very high degree; and if that precedent be followed here two very good results will accrue. First of all, Sir, you will remove that crying injustice of which I spoke, and by which the poor man contributes out of all proportion to-day, out of his scanty means, to the support of our Government; and in the next place, you will produce this other admirable result, of giving all these respectable, well-to-do, monied men a keen practical interest in watching the public expenditure and checking extravagance. You will do more, if it must be done by that means—you will create a sound, wholesome, healthy public opinion, the want of which is so great an evil in Canada to-day. I dwell on that particularly, because I am aware that, at this very moment, there are certain gentlemen, presumably in the interest of the hon. gentlemen opposite, who are losing no opportunity to impress upon the farmers of this country in particular, that if we get unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, the federal revenues will have to be raised by direct taxation, levied in the same way as the municipal taxes are to-day. I for one will protest to the uttermost of my power against any such injustice; I for one declare here, speaking on my responsibility in my place in Parliament, speaking with a knowledge of the subject, that our present system is monstrously unjust to the poor man and too favorable to the rich man, and that injustice ought to be redressed, not by adding to the burden of the farmer, the laborer, the artisan, the mechanic, the fisherman, the miner, the lumberman, but by removing the burdens from these and placing them upon the shoulders on which by right they ought to fall. It is almost too ridiculous. Here we are, here we have been, adding millions a year to the taxes of this country and without the slightest regard to the permanent welfare of the people; and we are told, forsooth, that although we may, without the least injury to the community, add many millions a year to our taxation, we must not alter the mode of collection one hair's breadth under penalty of producing the most terrible results. One is tempted to remember Oxen's old saying: "Quam parva sapientia mundus gubernatur"—"With how little wisdom the world is governed." Why, if one-quarter of what I heard be true, the pickings and stealings of half-a-dozen combines from the people would more than equal any sum which it may be necessary to raise by indirect taxation. Our sage economists, forsooth, are not frightened in the least at having run up our taxes in ten years from $20,000,000 to $30,000,000 nominally, really to $40,000,000. I say again if the results were less grave, it would be positively ridiculous that such an argument should be presented to us. What does it mean? We have been so wasteful, forsooth, that we cannot afford to become rich. Now, the argument and the motive of that argument, to my mind, was a very transparent fallacy, a fallacy so transparent that in earlier life I would have thought it impossible for reasonably intelligent men to have been deluded by it. But I have lived and have learned.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have learned a good deal. It used to be said: "Surely, in vain is the net spread in the sight of any bird;" but as Mr. Lowell remarks in a rather celebrated political ditty of his:

"They did not know everything down in Judee."

And most assuredly when King Solomon penned the remark I have quoted, he never heard of that very remarkable bird Canadensis anser Conservativus.

An hon. MEMBER. How do you know?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. An hon. gentleman asks me, how do I know? Well, I have not certainly had the advantage of living in the days of King Solomon, but I do know well enough the doctrine on which all naturalists agree, and that is, the wild fowl of that particular species always follow their leader; and I think we know that their leader's line of flight is not in the least degree likely to lead him towards the Holy Land; quite the contrary. There is another shaft in these gentlemen's quiver. Having proved to their own advantage, first of all, that Canada positively cannot afford to spend one dollar to gain a pound, having demonstrated that, according to the dictates of Canadian political economy, it is always more expensive to pay two cents cash for an article than four cents on credit—which is about the difference between direct and indirect taxation—these hon. gentlemen, the names of some of whom, to my certain knowledge were appended to a certain remarkable document, bearing date 1849, have been seized in their later days with an extraordinary paroxysm of loyalty; and to back their other startling propositions they lay down this impossible, and still more startling, proposition: If you make the Canadian people rich by free trade with the United States, if you make them more prosperous, happy and contented than they unfortunately are at present, there will be great danger to their loyalty. That is the position, in almost so many words. Has the hon. the First Minister been studying the political testament of that distinguished philanthropist, the late Cardinal Richelieu, and come to the conclusion that there is danger should the people wax fat and sleepy? If he has, he will do well to remember what occurred in France in 1788, after a century and a quarter's application of Cardinal Richelieu's maxims, and I warn him, if he perseveres in his course, he may find that in 1888 he is nearing the beginning of the end. I would not have alluded to this but that already across this House, time and again, there have been flung taunts to hon. gentlemen here, that we, forsooth, are disloyal because we desire to add greatly to the prosperity of Canada. I would have thought that those hon. gentlemen who ten years ago overrode all the protestations of Mr. Mackenzie and myself, when we pointed out to them that what they were doing was to adopt a policy which was a mere servile imitation of the American policy, which was in direct contradiction to the settled policy of the Empire. I say that these men would have done well, recollecting what occurred at that time, to have spared us all these disquisitions on the loyalty of the Opposition. Do we not recollect when we showed there was danger in the policy they adopted, how we were told that, if the so-called and mis-called National Policy was bad for British connection, so much the worse for British connection. These men have not hesitated to carry out a policy which has been responsible in my judgment for driving two millions of Her Majesty's North American subjects into exile, and which had risked the loss of all British North America to the Empire. It is time that we should clear our minds of cant on this subject. I have, and I have as good a right as any hon. gentleman to have, the interest of the Empire as much at heart as any man on that side of the House. I have considered, to the best of my opportunities and to the best of my ability, what policy in this crisis is the best in the real interests of the British Empire. I know that, in what I now say, I am but expressing the views of some of the ablest and highest of British statesmen, when I say that one great peril that threatens the British Empire in this day is the state of most dangerous isolation into which she has come. What is her position to-day in the view of some of the ablest of her statesmen? It is that she has not a friend of a high class power in the world to-day. She is at enmity more or less with France by reason of her occupation of Egypt and her control of the Suez Canal; she cannot hope that Germany will raise her little finger in her behalf; she cannot expect any help from Austro-Hungary; and who does not know that the Indian taxpayer is groaning under the additional burdens imposed upon him for the purpose of checking an anticipated Russian attack on India? That is a dangerous position of isolation, and I say that there is but one first-class power in the world with whom England can make a firm and lasting alliance, and that is her and our kinsmen and friends on the other side of the border. I have always felt and I have not hesitated to express it to English statesmen as well as on the floor of this House, that the real problem which to-day awaits the decision of England is how, in the first place, by fair and honorable means—and no other should be used—to conciliate the good-will of the people of the United States, and to repair that most atrocious blunder which was committed a hundred years ago, and which led to most violent collision between the two great divisions of the English race. That is one problem, and there is another which is most closely connected and interwoven with it, to the solution of which I would desire to lend my humble aid, and that is to add to the conciliation of the good-will of the United States, the conciliation and pacification of Ireland; and those problems are closely woven together. In this project which we are now bringing forward, if you take a broad view of the whole situation, if you remember what Mr. Joseph Chamberlain has taken good care to din into our ears and into the ears of the Government opposite during his recent visit, if you remember that the interest of England in maintaining friendly relations with the United States is so vast and so great that it outweighs very many times the comparatively trifling profit which she can derive from our trade, then I think you will see there is good ground for the position which I take, and that is that, by entering into close commercial relations with the United States, by establishing a close and friendly intercourse with them, we will render to the Empire the greatest service that any colony or dependency ever rendered to the parent State. It has been made a grave ground, it has been attempted to be set up as an insuperable ground of objection, that, when you propose to enter into a treaty for unrestricted trade with the United States, you must thereby, of necessity, discriminate against English manufactures and the manufactures of all other countries except the United States. Now, that is true. I admit that. More than that, I will admit that, prima facie, what we propose to-day is a very unusual thing. I will admit—I am in nowise disposed to shrink from any argument which can be fairly advanced—I admit frankly that, when a semi-dependent State, when a colony proposes in one breath to tax the goods of the parent State and admit the goods of a foreign State free, while at the same time the parent State admits our goods and the goods of other countries free, and the foreign State taxes those goods very heavily, it is a very unusual thing indeed. I grant that it is clean against all formulas. I do not deny that. I admit that it appears to be reversing the action of 100 years ago when England lost half of this continent because she endeavored to tax their goods without giving them representation, and I admit that we are going a little far in taxing her goods and not the goods of the people of the United States. I grant that this needs explanation, and I am prepared to say that I can give a full explanation why in the interests of England itself this thing should be done. I think I have stated the case as strongly as hon. gentlemen can well desire. Now, let us first of all look at the material results which will flow to England should this discrimination take place, and here let me say what is obvious to everyone who has given the subject a second thought, that, in our peculiar geographical position towards the United States, it is perfectly apparent that we cannot hope to gain free intercourse and unrestricted reciprocity with them without discriminating against the goods of other countries, unless and until the United States are prepared to go in for free trade with all the world, in which case our proposition would not be necessary. The thing, I grant, is of the essence of the bargain. I am not in the least degree desirous of concealing that fact, but, so far as the material side is concerned, the practical results of assimilating our tariff in certain points to the American tariff as against England have been immensely and I suspect purposely exaggerated. In the first place, the House ought to remember that at this very day our tariff is pretty nearly as hostile to English manufactures as that of the United States—

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Very nearly if not quite, but let me finish my sentence—and that there is very strong ground indeed, if things remain unchanged, for believing that in two or three years from this date our tariff will be much the more onerous of the two. Then it is well to bear in mind that, the tariff to the contrary notwithstanding, England has always managed to carry on a large trade with the United States, and especially with the northern portion of it. If I had the time at my disposal, I could advance very good reasons for believing that, suppose things remain exactly as they are, notwithstanding that the English would continue to drive a large trade with us they would have a trade relatively much larger with the people of the United States, and, therefore, the absolute loss to them would be small. But I return again to the fundamental fact on which, as I said, this whole argument rests. There can be no doubt, I think, that if we succeed in getting unrestricted trade, we shall become much richer, and if we become much richer there is no doubt that we shall buy a much larger quantity of English goods than we do at present, though perhaps not in the same line. I believe that the result of England giving us a free hand in this matter, would be simply to make some little alteration in the character but not in the quantity of the goods she sells us, and that practically she would lose nothing in a material point of view. More than that, I know something of English manufacturers. I may say, by-the-by, that that is a difficulty that it will be time enough to face when it arises. Our first business is to ascertain on what terms and conditions we can obtain unrestricted trade with the United States, when we know on what terms and conditions we can trade with them, then, perhaps some difficulty may arise, and that difficulty will have to be met. But I know something, as well as the hon. gentlemen, of English manufacturers, I know they are an eminently practical, hard-headed class of men. I know very well that English manufacturers, so long as their goods are excluded from North American markets, care precious little by whose name the ukase is signed which excludes them, whether it bears the name of Grover Cleveland, or Charles Tupper, or Mackenzie Bowell. Sir, you may depend upon it that English manufacturers, at any rate, are not to be caught with chaff. They understand that 80 per cent. duty on goods is 80 per cent. duty, whether it be imposed by an American Congress or a Canadian House of Commons, and they do not care very much who imposes it, so long as the duty is there. Sir, while I speak of these things as regards the mere material aspect of the case, in relation to English manufacturers, there are other arguments which the people of Canada may very justly use toward English statesmen and the English people. I say that the past history of this country supplies all Canadians who care to study that history, with abundant arguments. Mr. Speaker, the position of Canada is exceptional, in many important respects unique, so far as regards England. I am not going to dwell much on the fact that we are more than a colony, that we are a Dominion, charged with the responsibility of managing the affairs of half a continent, and entitled to claim for herself greater privileges and greater powers than should be granted to any ordinary colony. I do not dwell on that, but I will dwell a little on certain features in our past history which I contend gives us a right to claim to be heard in this matter. Sir, England is the great colonising nation of modern times. England has obtained colonies by exchange, by barter, by conquest, by direct purchase, by voluntary and involuntary settlement, and of all her hundred colonies, England has but one, and that is the Premier Province of this Dominion, which was originally taken possession of, and has since been held by men who did not occupy or settle through any of the ordinary motives that induce men to forsake their native homes and to give up their broad fields and pleasant lands for the purpose of maintaining their allegiance to the English flag. Now, Sir, this question is being argued, to some extent, on the sentimental side, and I am ready for my friends there. To tell you a profound secret, Mr. Speaker, which I trust will not go outside the walls of this House, I have never been able exactly to understand the very deep obligation under which the people of Canada lay to England. In point of fact I rather think that the obligation is the other way. I do not think, Sir, that although we have cherished, I hope we will continue to cherish, the most friendly feeling toward the parent state, I do not think for my part, that we are under any deep debt of gratitude to English statesmen, that we owe them much, unless, perchance, it may be the duty, as Christian men, to forgive them for the atrocious blunders which have marked every treaty, or transaction, or negotiation that they have ever had with the United States where the interest of Canada were concerned, from the days of Benjamin Franklin to this hour, not excepting their first or second treaty of Washington. I say there is no man here who does not know that from the very first hour, that the United Empire Loyalists took possession of Ontario and held it for the British Crown, down to this year 1888, there never has been a time except, perhaps, the short paroxysm of the American Civil War, when the people could not have greatly benefited their material interests by throwing in their lot with the people on the other side. We have not chosen to do so, we do not now want to do so, we desire to maintain our autonomy. On that point, I am quite at one with some hon. gentlemen on the other side. But I say at this moment, a remarkable opportunity has presented itself in which a little skilful statesmanship and common honesty would enable us, at one and the same time, to obtain great benefit for ourselves, and to render a most important service to the whole Empire by aiding to reknit together those two great divisions of one race which were unfortunately sundered by the blunders and incompetence of English statesmen 100 years ago. Sir, if the hon. gentleman chooses, as I have said, to argue this matter on the ground of sentiment, all I can say is that a Canadian who understands and feels what his country's history means, will not find great difficulty on any such grounds. Moreover, Mr. Speaker, I think that in this matter, supposing that we dismiss all other considerations, and look on it as a pure matter of right, we have some right to follow the example of England herself. No man knows better than the hon. gentleman opposite that England has always adopted a very different rule and measure, in dealing with the United States, from that which she has adopted in dealing with any country under heaven. I dare say that English statesmen could bring forward good reasons for their departure from their ordinary customs in such cases. Now, I am not here to criticise her right to do what she has done, at any rate, I am not criticising the reasons for doing what she has done, but I say that England has not hesitated, as the English plenipotentiary the other day was good enough to tell us, to give up the admitted legal rights of Canada for the purpose of conciliating the good will of the people of the United States. So be it. We may have to bow, probably we will have to bow. But by every parity of reasoning, we, under these circumstances, are justified in saying to England: We give up at your behest, for your benefit, and for the sake of the Empire, our admitted legal rights, now you make us a little concession of your admitted legal rights in a matter in which we do not deny them, for your benefit and ours, and for the sake of conciliating the good-will of the American people. Sir, I said that was the lowest view. I believe that the great mass of Englishmen who have made investments in Canada, and notably in Canadian railways, would, like ourselves, be entirely satisfied if we carried out this proposition, and I believe that if all English investors in Canada were polled after having the case properly explained to them, they would go with us in saying that it was in the interests of England, that it was in the highest and largest sense for the interests of the Empire, that we should be permitted, if we desire to make such a bargain as this with the people of the United States. Sir, there is a third argument, which requires perhaps a little more consideration. We are asked when we make, or when we suggest such a proposition to be made, not by the hon. gentleman opposite, who has maintained a most judicious reticence so far on this question, as I have noticed, but we are asked by some of his followers and myrmidons: What grounds have you for believing that, if you make this proposition, the people of the United States will agree? Well, Sir, what I have to say in answer to that is this: When two men are desirous of making a bargain, or when one man is desirous of making a bargain for mutual benefit with another party, the time has come to enquire and negotiate on what terms and conditions a mutually advantageous bargain can be made. I say, moreover, that this is, even in a pre-eminent degree, a matter for the two peoples of the United States and Canada. This is a thing which, if done at all, has got to be done in the broad light of day, not in dim diplomatic twilight. We know how the American Executive is constituted and how the American Congress is constituted. We know that this thing can only be done with the consent of Congress, and, practically, with the consent of the American people, and, therefore, it is that I have ventured to take, as I have said, the responsibility of bringing this matter forward on the floor of Parliament, because I know, and hon. gentlemen know, that it is not in their power to make an agreement behind backs with the American Executive which would be in any degree binding on the American people. More than that: I say the present moment is eminently in our favor for coming to the Americans with some such proposition as this, and I have good and fair proof of what I state. In the first place, everybody knows that an enormous reduction in the American tariff is eminent. Things have come to such a pass there that the people will insist on a very great reduction and alteration in their tariff. In the next place, we have got a very direct and very important invitation, or at all events a very important expression of the good-will of the man who stands in the highest place to-day in the American Republic, and who I trust for their sake will continue to enjoy the confidence of his countrymen for a second term. Sir, I note that President Cleveland in the recommendation which he addressed to Congress respecting the Fisheries Treaty after stating the advantages he thinks he has achieved, goes on to say:

"Our social and commercial intercourse with those populations who have been placed upon our borders and made forever our neighbors is made apparent by a list of the United States' common carriers, marine and inland, connecting their lines with Canada, which was returned by the Secretary-Treasury to the Senate on 7th February, in answer to a resolution of that body; and this is instructive as to the great volume of mutually profitable interchange which has come into existence during the last half century."

And then the President goes on to use these important words, which coming from so high a source at such a time can be taken as nothing less than an invitation by the President of the United States to us to come forward and see on what terms we can negotiate for unrestricted reciprocity with them. Says President Cleveland:

"This intercourse is still but partially developed, and if the amicable enterprises and wholesome rivalry between the two populations be not obstructed, the promise of the future is full of the fruits of an unbounded prosperity on both sides of the border."

Sir, will any gentlemen here or elsewhere dare to maintain that when President Cleveland in an official document of the highest importance uses such terms as these with respect to intercourse with Canada, we, forsooth, should be debarred by any sense of dignity from responding to an invitation like that? I have another, not so formal, and yet more important perhaps. I find that as long as a year ago, at a time when there was a danger of hostile collision between the two countries, Mr. Secretary Bayard, a man, as the First Minister knows, of the highest rank next to the President of the United States, a man who is virtually Premier of the President's Cabinet, a man whose name is honored and deservedly honored by friend and foe from one end of the United States to the other,—I say that Mr.

Bayard, the virtual Premier of the United States, wrote a year ago to Sir Charles Tupper in these terms:

"The immediate difficulty to be settled is found in the Treaty of 1818 between the United States and Great Britain, which has been questio vexata ever since it was concluded, and to-day is suffered to interfere with and seriously embarrass the good understanding of both countries in the important commercial relations and interests which have come into being since its ratification, and for the adjustment of which it is wholly inadequate as has been unhappily proved by the events of the past two years."

And then comes this important paragraph:

"I am confident we both seek to attain a just and permanent settlement—and there is but one way to procure it—and that is by a straightforward treatment on a liberal and statesmanlike plan of the entire commercial relations of the two countries. I say commercial because I do not propose to include, however indirectly, or by any intendment, however partial or oblique, the political relations of Canada and the United States, nor to effect the legislative independence of either country."

This is a just, a wise and a statesmanlike proposal from a man of the highest place and highest character in North America. Have we not seen within the last two weeks two distinguished members of Congress, Mr. Butterworth and Mr. Hitt, both Republicans, both opposed to the party of Mr. Bayard and President Cleveland, introducing Bills, one of which is almost substantially on the lines of the resolution I have placed in your hands, Mr. Speaker, the other of which goes further than I think it would be judicious or wise to go, but both in the direction of free trade and unrestricted reciprocity with Canada. Looking at this communication which has been placed in your hands, and as to which something was said to-night, I cannot but fear that a grand opportunity was lost by the delay of the Government in not endeavoring to settle the fishery question a considerable time ago in accordance with Mr. Bayard's suggestion. Their unhappy procrastination and unhappy delay I fear has been the cause why this negotiation was put off till the eleventh hour, to the most unfavorable moment that could by any possibility be selected, just on the eve of a Presidential election, when everybody in arms in the United States almost could have told hon. gentlemen opposite that no Government in the United States was free to deal as it would wish with great commercial questions, but they are all made subservient to the political exigencies of the times. Now, we do not know what passed, we do not know, and we will not know, I am afraid, in time for this debate, really what passed between these negotiators. We have not got the information, but we have got enough to see that there were proposals and counter-proposals, but what followed is concealed from the Parliament of Canada, which has a good right to know. I for one must say that I attach no sort of importance whatever to the fact that when Sir Charles Tupper tabled—I beg pardon for speaking of him by name—the very vague proposition which he did table, he was told by the American negotiators that they were not authorised to deal with it. It was patent and apparent that they were not authorised to deal with it, and I beg to observe that judging of their own action the conduct of the Government had been so indiscreet in various ways as to render it excessively difficult either for President Cleveland or his Cabinet, however favorable disposed they were, and I believe they were very favorably disposed to us, to render it very difficult for them to mix up the fishery question with our commercial relations at that date. You must remember that this matter had been publicly brought to the attention of the United States Congress, and that the Committee on Foreign Affairs, headed by Mr. Belmont, have declared:

"That the motive and purpose have been plainly and openly avowed by Canada to be, first, the punishment of such vessels because the United States levies a duty on Canadian fish, not fresh, for immediate consumption and secondly to coerce the United States to exempt such Canadian fish from all Custom duties, and to enter into other new reciprocal Customs' relations with the Canadian Dominion and Newfoundland."

And the Committee on Foreign Affairs went on to add that this was a policy of threat and coercion, which should be instantly and summarily dealt with. Under those circumstances it was absurd to say that anything could be adduced from the refusal of the American Commissioners to discuss this question of reciprocal relations upon the very bald and brief memorandum furnished us by Sir Charles Tupper. I repeat one thing which I said before but it will bear repetition. It must always be remembered that Canada has a good deal to give as well as a good deal to get, and in making a bargain with the United States I for one would give very fair and full equivalents. I wish that the treaty should be perfectly and mutually beneficial, that for every dollar of profit we make they should make their dollar, and that for every Canadian who is benefited an American should be benefited likewise. It is on such a basis alone that a firm and permanent treaty of reciprocity, or a firm and permanent arrangement for free and unrestricted trade can be carried out. As I have said the people of the United States need new markets as well as we do. I do not contend, for it would be absurd to contend, that the thing is as important to them as it is to us. It is not as important to 60,000,000 to have the market of 5,000,000, as it is for 5,000,000 people to have the market of 60,000,000. That much is clear. But I do contend, Sir, that we have it in our power to give a full equivalent, and benefit quite as many Americans by this arrangement as Canadians will be benefited. I also say that this is emphatically one of those questions in which very nearly everything depends on how the question is presented to the various parties to the negotiation. You may approach this if you will in the spirit of statesmen, or you may approach it in the spirit of flunkies. It is a large question which demands a large treatment. Now, whatever the faults of England or English statesmen may be, I have always felt, and I have always maintained, that England is essentially just, and that when England understands fairly and properly the grounds upon which we make this claim that England will, I believe, be prepared to concede it. As for the United States, I have no doubt that they have got their faults as we have got our faults, but with all their faults no man can have mixed much with the Americans without knowing that they are emphatically a great and a generous nation. I have heard one most foolish complaint and most foolish fear expressed, and I have heard that complaint made by men who ought to know better, the complaint that the people and the Government of the United States, forsooth, are not prepared to gush over or to rush into our arms or those of England at every pretty phrase. I do not blame them for that. As I have said I know something of the history of North America for the past one hundred years and something of the history of the dealings of England with the United States during that interval. Even during the last five and twenty years I say, that we have not always so acted as to warrant us in expecting that the Americans will rush at once into our arms whenever we propose a friendly treaty for arrangement with them, but I do say that if you go to the United States and make fair, just and reasonable propositions to them that there is every reason—and we have the proof of their highest statesmen's assertions that we will be so received—there is every reason to believe that we will be fairly and honorably received, and that it is in our power to make a treaty which shall be mutually advantageous, honorable and profitable to both nations. I do not gush over the United States either. I admire the United States, but I am in no way disposed to cringe to them. I think I may remind the House that the only negotiation during the last one hundred years in which Canada obtained a tolerable equivalent for her concessions was the negotiation conducted at Halifax by the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie and my lamented friend Sir Albert Smith. I take no shame to admit, and I have said it before, that for many a year I have made it my deliberate purpose that I would do all that one man could do, all that any man honorably could do, to make friends as far as I could or to cause my people and the English people to become friends once more with the people of the United States. Our position towards the people of the United States has been vastly changed within the last five and twenty years, and it is well that this House should remember that. Five and twenty years ago but a small proportion of her population were in the United States. To-day, Sir, the United States, in the most emphatic possible manner, are becoming literally flesh of our flesh and blood of our blood. I think my friends from the Maritime Provinces and Quebec probably can affirm my statement, when I say that I know whole counties, I know great regions in Canada where you cannot find one single solitary Canadian family which has not a son, or a daughter, or a brother, or a sister or some very near and dear relative now inhabiting the United States. We will do best honor to the United Empire Loyalist traditions if we in our degree contribute to bring those two great races together, and to repair in this way what I have always looked upon as a great blot in English policy within the last century. Now, there is another side of this question. Suppose the hon. gentlemen entered into those negotiations in good faith, suppose they tried their best, suppose they do their best, and suppose the negotiation fails, well, all I can say is that I would advise the people of Canada in that case to set to work and put their house in order. If we go on as we are going now, our position will soon become intolerable as compared with the United States. I do not think that hon. gentlemen opposite have at all appreciated what the United States has done during the last dozen years. Sir, I do not think this House is at all aware of the fiscal position in which the United States stand to-day. I have here the last United States Treasury return, and what does it show? It shows, Sir, that the total expenditure of the United States, less sinking fund, was just $268,000,000, of which $35,500,000 came from miscellaneous receipts, and $233,000,000 was all they required to raise by direct taxation. Now, Sir, they collect $120,000,000 in round numbers by excise, and, therefore, all they require to raise by customs duties is a bare $114,000,000. Sir, it would be in the power of the United States Secretary of the Treasury, if Congress gave him the authority, to raise either the whole of the customs revenue in either of these three ways. He might maintain the existing tax on sugar and impose a very small income tax indeed, and raise all the revenue he wanted; he might maintain the tax on sugar and impose a very small ad valorem duty and raise all the revenue he wanted; or he might maintain the present taxes on a very few articles and make his trade list free. Now, I would like to direct the attention of this House for a few moments to what might befall if the United States adopted such a course. We have no less an authority than Mr. Joseph Chamberlain for saying that if the United States chose to reduce their tariff materially, they would become a most formidable competitor of England in the markets of the world; and if they became a formidable competitor of England, what sort of a competitor would they be with our farmers and manufacturers under such circumstances—we heavily burdened with debt and the United States almost free? What, I should like to know, would the hon. gentlemen do in such a case? And it is a case which is eminent, a case which may occur at any moment? Will they go on and heap further taxes on the people? Do they think they could prevent a much more deplorable exodus than they have? Now, Sir, if the hon. gentlemen refuse to act—this is not a motion of want of confidence; they have not committed themselves, at least the First Minister has not, and I do not think his colleagues have committed themselves, against this proposition—if they refuse to act, I ask them to consult their own Finance Minister as to whether I am not right, looking at the result of their fisheries negotiation, in saying that a most intense feeling of disappointment will pervade the whole of the Maritime Provinces at any rate. An intense feeling of disappointment, I know, will pervade a vast number of the farmers of Canada from one end of the Dominion to the other, and I think there will be a very great and bitter disappointment on the part of many of the inhabitants of Manitoba and probably also of British Columbia. Now, Sir, it must be borne in mind that our circumstances within a few years, not wholly by our own fault, not wholly by the fault of government, but in consequence of great economic changes which have been taking place of very great importance, have been materially changed. Then, it is notorious that our position, in comparison with that of the United States, has in twenty years been reversed, and reversed enormously to our detriment. Twenty years ago our taxes were one-third of the taxes of the United States; twenty years ago our debt was one-third of the debt of the United States. To-day, by the last returns I have here, our debt is two and a half times, as nearly as may be, greater per head than the debt of the United States; and the necessary taxes which the United States require to raise for the purpose of carrying on their government are one-third less than the necessary taxes the people of Canada require to pay. Then, Sir, the European market, to which we formerly looked, is dwindling for us, so far as we are concerned. We are exposed to intense competition from every part of the world. On the other hand the American market is growing with immense rapidity, and has become vastly richer to-day than it was a short time ago, while we are not able to keep the emigrants we bring here. As I said before, a great change in the United States is eminent, and it is our business to prepare to meet it. Sir, let me recite our course for the last twenty years. Can hon. gentlemen opposite, with the Public Accounts in their hands, venture to deny that within twenty years our debt has trebled, having risen from $73,000,000 or $75,000,000 to $230,000,000, and that our taxes have trebled likewise, having risen from $11,500,000 to $30,000,000? And that does not at all represent the real increase of taxation. Can they deny, Sir, that there is proof, absolutely conclusive, over the greater part of the Dominion, that we have lost three emigrants out of every four that we brought here, and one in four of our own people? Can they deny that there has been an enormous reduction in the volume of trade, until the volume of trade to-day is nearly 50 per cent. less than it was in 1873? Can they deny that there has been a very great fall in the prices of the articles produced by our agriculturists, on whom we vainly depend? What shall I say of the immigration for the last six years? I have only got the municipal statistics of Ontario to go upon, but what a sorry story they have to tell us. I have the returns of every rural municipality and of every town and village of Ontario for the last six years, and what do I find? I find that of forty-four counties in Ontario, barely three have increased their rural population more than the natural growth of the population warrants; of the remainder, twenty-two are either stationary or have gained less than their natural growth; and nineteen have absolutely lost population. The total gain in Ontario, from 1881 to 1886, is about 13,000 souls on a rural population of over 1,100,000. In those six years we have gained about one-half of the one per cent., according to the municipal statistics of Ontario. Of 206 towns and villages, 38 have increased in size more than their natural growth of population; 91 are stationary or have less than their natural growth, and 67 have lost population absolutely. 168 out of 206 have either lost absolutely in population or have grown less than the natural growth of population warrants.

I need not go over the list of rural municipalities in detail, because they show precisely the same results; and I am sorry to say that I find from information furnished me within the last few days by my esteemed friend Mr. Blue, the Secretary of the Department of Agriculture, that the record for the year 1887, is rather worse, if that be possible, than the records for the years that have preceded. What shall I say of the comparison between Manitoba and Dakota? Manitoba and Dakota started seventeen years ago on equal terms. Each had a white population 14,000 strong. In about ten years Dakota had added not a little over 100,000 to its population; Manitoba had added a little over 50,000 to its population. In 1881 Dakota had 130,000; Manitoba had 65,000. Then, Sir, we began to spend the money of the public by tens of millions in making railroads and promoting immigration to Manitoba. In 1886, we find that after spending $100,000,000 of public money, and perhaps nearly half as much private funds, the population of Manitoba has grown but 30,000, and according to the last statistics I have been able to obtain, in 1886, the population of Dakota considerably exceeds 500,000. They have added nearly 400,000 to their population within the last six years, while Manitoba has added but 30,000 according to the last census, after an expenditure of $100,000,000. Now, do you call that satisfactory? If you do not, then the time has come to search for some appropriate remedy. I say that, rightly understood and fairly understood, the interests of Canada and the United States and the mother country are really identical, and that the time is come and is not far distant, when, at any rate the best, the wisest and the most intelligent men will realise that, if they do not realize it now. I am no annexationist and I do not propose to become one. I have no desire to see our country merged in the United States, and I can tell the House that after conferences with a good many distinguished Americans, I am well advised they do not particularly desire to add to their heavy responsibilities by seeing us politically incorporated with them. I have always held and declared that I regard annexation as undesirable. I have no more wish to see my country merge her existence in that of the great state to the south of us—although I admire much in the institutions of the latter—than I would have to merge my own individual existence in that of another man's, because I admire his abilities or envy his great estate. We have a plain duty to discharge. We are, some of us, Privy Councillors, and it is our bounden duty to advise Her Majesty the Queen of Canada in the true interests of the people of Canada, whatever those may be. That may carry us far. To a very considerable extent the choice lies with the people of Canada, to decide whether they shall continue to fulfil the somewhat ignoble office that they now fulfil, of being practically, and in fact, a sort of hostage to the United States for the good behavior of England, or whether they will rise equal to the situation and become a link of union and concord between the two great English races. Which is the safer, which is the more honorable, which is the wiser, which is the more statesmanlike policy? I have abstained of set purpose from alluding to the fishery matter, except in a most cursory way. I do not wish to animadvert on the conduct of the English plenipotentiaries in that matter, but I may take this opportunity of pointing out to the House, and the Finance Minister and his friends, that they can produce no argument to warrant them in asking the people of Canada to ratify that treaty, except practically this great argument that it is, in a high degree, the interest of the Empire to conciliate the good-will of the people of the United States by all fair and honorable means. And that very argument which they bring to induce this House to consent to the treaty, applies with equal force to my contention that it is in the highest degree for the interest of the Empire that we, on our side, should endeavor, through the very proposition I now submit, to knit Canada and the United States together in a closer and more friendly alliance. We must rise above the sole craving for precedents, so dear to a certain order of legal mind. We are in a new world, and we own half a continent of it. It may be that there is no precedent to fit our case. My proposal is new and so is our situation, and, Sir, I have to say if there is no precedent to fit, let us make one. Hon. gentlemen may contend that the views I express are not those held, at least by the majority of the people, at any rate as they are represented on the floor of this House; but if these hon. gentlemen could make up their minds, for once, to depart from their precedents, and if there ever was a case in which we would be warranted in departing from precedents it is this—and would dare to submit this question to the plebiscitum of the people, they know, and I know that the answer would be decisively in its favor. They know that an overwhelming majority of the people would be at our backs in demanding that no reasonable effort should be spared to obtain free trade with the United States; and if it were possible that this plebiscitum should be voted on by every native-born Canadian in North America, we would roll up a larger majority in its favor than has ever yet been recorded in our annals of any kind whatever. I do not say, and it is false to assert that I have ever said, that Canada has not made any progress during the past twenty years. I admit considerable progress has been made in certain directions. But what I contend for now is this, that the progress has been partial, inadequate, far below what the natural resources of our country would warrant. It is also far below what we made ourselves in the twenty years before 1861 and infinitely below what the United States made in the first twenty years of their existence, when their population was equal to ours. I am quite willing to grant that a few towns have grown and prospered within the past few years, but I say it was none the less true that over many wide areas of this country our population is stationary and even retrograde. It is none the less true that from one end of Canada to the other, the value of farm lands is less to-day than it was six, seven or eight years ago; it is none the less true that the value of farm products is enormously lowered, and that our farmers are exposed to a far more intense competition than they hitherto experienced. Great new forces are coming into existence, the full effect of which we are only beginning to feel. There is danger lest Canada, so far as regards our native born population, should sink into a mere residuum, a country from which the best and most intelligent of our people are fleeing, not by hundreds or by thousands, but by millions. Then as to foreign immigrants, if these statistics can be relied upon, it is clear that we are becoming a mere dumping ground for the refuse of those whom we import into this country. It is quite clear we are not growing up towards the light, and I hold it to be a very miserable symptom of our political growth, that there should exist here this craving to hang on to our mother's apron string. Under such circumstances, it is our bounded duty to ascertain at the earliest moment we can what are the views of the people of the United States on this great question. This is not a question of etiquette. We have here, to all intents and purposes, the invitation of the President and virtual Premier of the United States to go and treat with them on fair and equal terms; and if it were a question of etiquette, the hon. gentleman is a Shakesperian student, and he knows that "nice customs courtesy to mighty kings." If two peoples desire to have a great boon like this, they need not stand on little paltry questions as to which shall make the first advance. If we fail, it will then be time to consider the situation anew. But I repeat that our real interests are those of England, and the United States are perfectly identical, and will be substantially furthered by this proposition. I hope that, in this discussion, on both sides of the House, every man who speaks will remember that he is here as a Canadian representative, that he is here as a trustee of a certain section of the Canadian people, that our business here, all that warrants us in being here, is for the purpose of discussing the welfare of Canada, and I hope that we will be spared certain stale and tawdry hypocrisies of which we have heard too much. I have the greatest possible respect for genuine loyalty and for genuine loyalists wherever I have met them. Even if they are sometimes a little wooden-headed and perverse, the thing is good in itself that I can excuse a good deal, but there is a certain class of loyalty, and there is a certain class of loyalists to whom I cannot extend any consideration at all. I must say that I have not much respect for 35 per cent. tariff protection loyalty or for 35 per cent. tariff protection loyalists; and I think, if the right hon. gentleman will permit me to say so, that the First Minister showed that he appreciated correctly that class of loyalty and of loyalists in the famous parable he delivered a few years ago, wherein he compared himself—it is his comparison, not mine—to a monkey who had stolen into a farmer's orchard and was shaking down the apples for the benefit of the herd of swine that were grunting and rooting below. England can take care of herself, as England has shown many a time and oft. If the English Cabinet, when this matter is fully represented to them, as it ought to be, see fit to object, it will be time enough for us to take up the question. In discussing it, I admit that all men who think that this will hurt Canada either morally or materially—because I do not desire to keep the question down to the mere ground of material interest—have good and fair grounds for expressing their views, but I say that none else should be heard on any pretext in this House, and I say that the worst foe of British connection is the man who would attempt to stifle discussion on that ground. More than that, I say what every one who has thought on the subject must know and feel to be true, that, in many important respects, our position is anomalous and transitional. No one supposed, when we came together in this Confederation, stretching over half a continent, that we were to remain semi-dependent forever. We are growing in stature, not as fast as hon. gentlemen say, but still we are growing, and we are entitled to a larger measure of responsibilities and to a larger measure of rights. One thing is clear, that everyone, as I have said, who thinks twice on the subject knows and feels, that things are not satisfactory for us in many ways. Why, even the Imperial Federationists know this. They do not know exactly what they want, I grant; they know less how they are to get it, I grant; but they know that there is a want and a lack in our present relations, and they desire to fill it. I have looked at that question long and often, and, as far as Canada is concerned, I see no way out for them, I see no way of our becoming a valuable member of a British federation save only on one consideration, and that is that you broaden your base and take care that you unite yourselves with the United States in the bonds of a firm and friendly alliance which is not likely to be broken, and there is no way in which that is more likely to be done than by greatly increasing and promoting the trade between the two countries. In mutual advantage and benefit the surest bond of union will be found to exist, and I believe that Mr. Goldwin Smith was eminently right in saying that it was an idle and silly delusion to say that either England or the United States profited by the great struggle of the last century, that it was a thousand pities that the violent collision took place, and I know that not only Goldwin Smith expressed those views, but that they were held by the greatest and best of the Americans of that day, by men like George Washington himself, by men like Alexander

Hamilton, by men even like the Adams, though they had strong republican leanings; that they were held by all the best thinkers of the last century; and that these are the views which are held by the best and wisest Americans of the present time, and those were substantially the views, as their correspondence in certain records exists to prove, which were held by our own United Empire forefathers, who did not desire to see Great Britain tax the colonies for her own benefit, but did not desire to testify to the great and grand idea of a united British Empire and a united British people all over North America. It is idle for any human being to rise up and tell this House that, when we have lost a number equal to half the whole population that now remains, things are satisfactory with us. There is not another country, except perhaps Ireland, that has sustained so heavy a bleeding as we have done during the last few years. I say the time has come when Canada may justly claim the right to make her own commercial treaties. I say it is for the interest of the Empire that she should have that right. These things at any rate are perfectly clear. It is quite clear to any one who will carefully study those trade returns and will study the figures which I submitted before recess, that the United States market, if it were only made free, is worth more than twice over to Canada than all the rest of the world put together. It is perfectly clear that it is the only market open to us for a great amount of our own productions. It is perfectly clear to me—it may not be to hon. gentlemen opposite—that our position relatively to the United States may become intolerable, and that there is need of present action in this regard. If we do nothing, and the United States act wisely, we may prepare—farmers and manufacturers alike—for a very severe competition, for a great and increasing exodus, and for very great and increasing dissatisfaction among our various Provinces. I must not be misunderstood. I do not say that there are no other expedients possible for us, but what I do say is that the expedient I now propose for the consideration of the House is the surest, the simplest, and the easiest expedient open to us; that it commends itself in a very high degree to the instincts of our people, as it has been unmistakably shown; that it is in itself a fair, just and reasonable proposition; that it is best for us, best for the whole Empire, best for our kinsmen and neighbors on the other side of the line; and, believing that that is so, I beg to move the resolution of which I have given notice.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the greater part of the hon. gentleman's speech delivered here this evening, but I confess that on no former occasion have I heard him speak with greater weakness, if he will allow me that expression, than he has spoken to-night. During the earlier part of his speech, the hon. gentleman dwelt almost exclusively upon the statement that this country has not been progressing. The old story of loss of population, the old story of loss of trade, the old story that we are not progressing as we ought, was repeated ad nauseam. It appeared so well to please him that, although he dropped it from time to time in order to go on with the subject which is more particularly before us, the House will remember that he invariably fell back upon the same old statement, the same old Jeremiads of ruin and decay for this country. Sir, I cannot do better than give to the hon. gentleman the advice which the leading organ of his own party gave him, and gave to this country—if, indeed, the Toronto Globe may now be called the leading organ of hon. gentlemen opposite. Only a few weeks ago the Globe said:

"Distrust all figures professing to show that Canada has retrograded instead of advancing. Eschew association with the teachers of despair. Old men who, with worn-out powers, assert that national suicide is the only course to national salvation, may be excused by considerations of their senility, but young men who echo their doleful refrain can never seem otherwise than contemptible."

These, Mr. Speaker, are not the words of a Tory newspaper, or of a Tory public man; they are the advice given to the young men of the country by the leading organ of hon. gentlemen opposite, and I commend them as the best possible answer to the statements that we have heard to-night. I think we have a right to complain, also, that the hon. gentleman was not as distinct as could be desired in his statement of what his resolution really means—whether it is commercial union that we are to have, or whether it is unrestricted reciprocity, which would leave us free to deal with other nations as we thought proper. That was not very definitely stated by the hon. gentleman, unless, indeed, we take one sentence in which he suggested that the position taken by Mr. Hitt, a member of Congress, embodied principles which went rather further than he would desire to go. But, Sir, what is it that has led to the sudden discovery of this panacea for the ills of Canada? What is it that has brought us, in this session of Parliament, to discuss a question of this kind as the only course which offers to us any assurance for the future well-being of Canada? We can remember that, although the Reciprocity Treaty is not an old one, so far as hon. gentlemen opposite are concerned, and so far as any public man in Canada, having the responsibility of a public man upon him, is concerned, until the last few months, we never heard of this question of commercial union as a remedy for the ills which are alleged to exist. Sir, all the statements made by the hon. gentleman were made over and over again before the last elections—aye, I may say that before the elections which preceded the last, all these statements were made. When we came to the last election, the two parties faced the electorate, nominally at any rate upon distinct issues. The great leader of the Liberal party went through Ontario and delivered speeches which, for elaborateness of preparation, for devotion to detail, have, perhaps, never been exceeded by the speeches delivered by any other public man in Canada. They form a volume which I hold in my hand. And yet, Mr. Speaker, what will hon. gentlemen say when I tell them that in the whole of these speeches, the only reference to reciprocity is embodied in two single lines of type, delivered, the first at Welland, and the next, if I mistake not, at Malvern. Now, the hon. gentlemen pledged themselves to a particular course in the last elections. I have the pledges here, and it is worth while reading them, delivered by their great leader. He delivered them, remember, not as an ordinary citizen, but as the leader of the party, speaking for the party, declaring himself to be authorised to speak for the party, and what did he say?

"I spoke in 1882, I spoke a few weeks ago in Toronto, I speak now as the leader of the party, expounding on all questions of principle, not merely my individual views, but the common sense, as I understand it, of the great body of the party, the general lines upon which the party, as a whole would act, if entrusted, as they will soon be, with power."

They were not entrusted with power, and they are now acting upon different principles from those which they pledged themselves to the people of this country they would act upon, if they were entrusted with power. He goes on to say:

"What I have said, and am about to say, on all questions of principle, you may then take as authoritative, to whatever extent a leader has authority, and so far from there being divergence, I can assure you that there is, in my belief, a general concurrence of sentiment between us, including Sir Richard Cartwright, whom I name only because our adversaries delight to represent him as holding other views."

Then, Sir, what more did he say?

"We have no longer a large surplus to dispose of. We have a large deficit and a greatly increased scale of expenditure to meet, and it is clearer than ever that a very high scale of taxation must be retained, and that manufacturers have nothing to fear. I then declared that any re-adjustment should be effected with due regard to the legitimate interests of all concerned. In that phrase, 'all concerned,' I hope no one will object to my including, as I do, the general public. In any re-adjustment I maintain that we should look especially to such reduction of expenditure as may allow of a reduction of taxation, to the lightening of sectional taxes; to the lightening of taxation upon the prime necessities of life, and upon the raw materials of manufacture, to a more equitable arrangement of the taxes which now bear unfairly upon the poor as compared with the rich, to a taxation of luxuries just so high as will not thwart our object by greatly checking consumption, to the curbing of monopolies of production in cases where, by combination or otherwise, the tariff allows an undue and exorbitant profit to be exacted from consumers, and to the effort—a most important point—to promote reciprocal trade with our neighbors to the south."

And that, Mr. Speaker, is the only reference in this whole book setting forth the policy of the Liberal party—that is the only reference whatever to the question of reciprocity. I notice that hon. gentlemen opposite smile; I notice that they think they have something because the term reciprocity is used here; but how do they reconcile this principle of reciprocity, if it be reciprocity they mean, with the promise that the manufacturers have nothing to fear, with the promise that the tariff cannot be materially reduced, with the promise that our large expenditures will require a high tariff to be maintained, while their policy to-day as announced is that the tariff is to be abolished altogether, in so far as the trade between our neighbors, our great competitors, and ourselves are concerned. I find the hon. gentleman went on further to say:

"No man, I care not how convinced an advocate of absolutely free trade for Canada he may be, has yet suggested, no man I believe can suggest, a practicable plan whereby our great revenue needs can be met, otherwise than by the continued imposition of very high duties on goods similar to those we make or can make within our bounds; or on the raw materials. I invite the most ardent free trader in public life to present a plausible solution of this problem; and I contend that he is bound to do so before he talks of free trade as practicable in Canada. I have not believed it soluble in my day; and any chance of its solubility, if any chance there were, has been destroyed by the vast increase of our yearly charge, and by the other conditions which have been created. The thing is removed from the domain of practical politics."

And yet within a little over one year from the day when that speech was delivered and that pledge made as indicating what would be the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite if their anticipations had been realised and they had occupied these Treasury benches, we have a three and a-half hours' speech delivered in this House for the purpose of showing us that free trade is not only practical but is absolutely essential if this country is to escape the ruin which threatens it. I might go on quoting other passages from that speech, but I will not detain the House longer. I might point out where the hon. gentleman declared that the idea of direct taxation was absurd, was not even to be thought of, and could not be thought of in connection with our affairs in Canada; but I have read enough to show that in assuming the position which hon. gentlemen opposite have taken to-night they have entirely changed their position from that which they occupied when appealing to the people a little over a year ago, and I think they are bound to show that our condition has so changed since that time as to justify that remarkable change of position on their part. One might speculate, but of course we will not do it, that it is not so much the interests of the country as the necessities of the party that have caused this change. They had been taunted by their own friends, as well as by their political opponents, as being a party without a policy. They had been taunted with being a party of negotiations without any positive idea to submit for the acceptance of the people, and as they were beaten at two elections and as by-election after by-election gave the same record and the people showed their confidence in the policy represented by this Government, hon. gentlemen opposite have made up their minds that something new is required, and they submit a policy, not a policy which this Government could carry out if they would, not a policy which those hon. gentlemen could carry out if they were on this side of the House, but a policy dependent upon the action of a foreign Government without whose consent nothing could be done. So that after nearly ten years of Opposition, after ten years of groping after something through which they might appeal to the people, hon. gentlemen have come down to a policy which is a safe one for them because they could not adopt it if they were on the Treasury benches, and the adoption of which depends entirely on the action of a foreign Government. They have come with a policy for the United States for the acceptance of the people of Canada. That is the position in which we find hon. gentlemen to-day. Sir, this question of reciprocity is an old question. Both political parties in Canada have been in favor of it—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

MR. WHITE (Cardwell). Both parties have been in favor of reciprocal trade in the natural productions of this country; both parties have been in favor of reciprocal trade, in so far as that reciprocal trade can be carried out having regard to the great interests of this country.

An hon. MEMBER. The great combines of the country.

MR. WHITE (Cardwell). This has been the case over and over again. What has been the history of negotiations in the direction of reciprocity? The treaty of 1854, commonly known as the Elgin Treaty, was, if I mistake not, negotiated under the direction of the Liberal Conservative party, the McNabb-Morin Government being in power at that time. The treaty was denounced at the very first moment it could be denounced by the United States. From that day to this, this Government, both parties I may say in Canada, have been ready to enter into negotiations for a fair interchange of the commodities of the two countries. In 1874, the late Government sent Mr. George Brown to Washington, and he and Mr. Fish drafted a treaty, which was going to be, in the opinion of every one who favored it, of great advantage to Canada. What was the fate of it? It dealt not only with the natural productions of the country, but also with a considerable line of manufactures. It went even further than that: it ensured the Americans the use of our great public works. It went further than that: It obliged the people of Canada to build a new canal, commonly known as the Caughnawaga Canal, which would give easy access for the lumber of the west to the American market. And yet, in spite of the great advantages to be given to the United States by that treaty, in spite of the fact that it went as far as the people of this country could possibly go in negotiations of that kind, what was the result of it? Why, it was simply hung up in the Senate, denied even the courtesy of a reference to the ordinary committee, and from that day to this all efforts to get a Reciprocity Treaty with the United States have failed. What was the position of the hon. gentleman at that time? Why, I find that the hon. gentleman who has addressed the House at such great length to-night, when addressing a meeting in Charlottetown, dealt with this subject. He said:

"They say we must have reciprocity, and we cannot live without it as a Dominion. I take exception to that statement. While reciprocity is desirable, we are not in such a state of subjection to the United States that we cannot live without it. We have men and ships, and 'will carry the war into Africa.' We will find new markets for ourselves, and cut them out. There is nothing better calculated to prevent the bringing about of reciprocity than to tell the Americans we cannot live without them. It would induce them to believe that they had the power to drive us to their own terms."

I shall not make other quotations as I might make them to show that this was the current of public opinion in this country at that time. I do not quote this with the object of putting the hon. gentleman in contradiction to himself. I quote it as I might quote extracts from the leading organ of that party at the same time, to show what was the current of public opinion then, and which was that, having made every effort that we possibly could make to secure reciprocal free trade with our friends on the other side of the line, so far as we could do it consistently with the interests, and welfare, and revenue requirement of this country, that we ought to go on and develop our own interests and our own destiny in our own fashion. Now what did this Government do? Under the Act of 1879—an Act which embodied the mandate of the people at that time—commonly known as the National Policy Act, we incorporated a clause which gave to the Governor General in Council the power practically of entering into a reciprocal treaty for the free interchange of products between this country and the United States. That Act is on the Statute book to day and it remains there an authority to the Government, whenever the United States will show any disposition to meet us, to enter into freer trade relations with them in so far as we can do. I think I may fairly say therefore that our record in the past, at any rate, is such that the people of Canada can say to our friends on the other side of the line: "We are ready to consider the question whenever you shall signify your decision for such consideration; we are ready to consider with you the best means of promoting the free interchange of such products in this country as we can exchange with you, having regard to our great interests," and until the people of the United States are so ready, the history of the past clearly shows that the true policy of Canada is to act upon the principle laid down by the hon. gentleman himself in the extract which I have just quoted, that is, to work out our own destiny in our own way. This question, however, of commercial union or of unrestricted reciprocity—the latter term being apparently a modification of the former principle—is not altogether a new one. In 1871 I had myself the privilege of being present at a meeting of the National Board of Trade of the United States, in the city of St. Louis, and on that occasion the chairman of the Canadian delegation, the late Hon. John Young, consented to a scheme for unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union. But there is this fact to be remembered in connection with that, Mr. Young, as everyone knows, was in favor of the separation of this country from the mother country, in order that we might enter into such an arrangement. He took the ground at St. Louis, as he did in the city of Montreal and in the press when he discussed this question, that without independence we could not enter into arrangements of this kind, and that there was first and precedent to such an arrangement and for the purpose of bringing about such arrangement, a necessity that the true interests of Canada lay in her separation from the mother country. Did any public man in Canada, having the responsibility of a public man upon him, sanction that view at that time? No. Although Mr. Young was a prominent Liberal, although he was a strong supporter of the Liberal party, although he was a man of great influence who had been a Minister of the Crown, the Toronto Globe, then edited by the late Hon. George Brown, denounced him and denounced his proposition as utterly opposed to the best interests of this country and as impossible of fulfilment except on terms of annexation itself. That was the position taken at that time in connection with this question. What is meant by this question of commercial union? I take the opinions of those who may fairly be assumed to be at any rate the best authorities upon that subject. We would never have heard of it, apparently so at any rate, until Mr. Erastus Wiman, a gentleman of great influence and of great ability in the United States, a Canadian by birth and I believe still a Canadian by allegiance, took it into his head, having plenty of leisure on his hands, to come to Canada and carve out a policy for the people of this country. He did the constituency of Cardwell, which I have the honor to represent here, the honor to make his first début on that question there, and from that day to this he has, in the press and in public meetings, said a great deal upon this subject, so that he has come to be recognised, if not the leader of the Liberal party at least the leader of this particular policy of the Liberal party. It seems to me that in any discussion of the question in this country we should know precisely what is contemplated by this scheme. Now what does Mr. Wiman say? Writing to the American press on this subject he says:

"That by the operation of a uniform continental tariff equal in height to that always prevailing in the United States, the goods and merchandise of all foreign countries, including Great Britain, would be discriminated against in favor of American manufactures."

Then, Sir, in a letter which he addressed to the Mail, or rather in a speech which he delivered in Detroit and reported in the Mail, he said:

"That as against all the rest of the world the same rates of duty should be collected by Canada as are now levied by the United States, while between those two countries of North America the Customs line should be completely obliterated, in other words, the proposition is that around the whole continent of North America the Customs line should exist and precisely a uniform height."

Now, what does that involve? I take a leading newspaper of the Western States, and the Chicago Times I think may be considered the leading newspaper of the Western States, as giving a statement of what that really involves. Here is what the Times says:

"This proposition implies a complete surrender by the Dominion Parliament to the American Congress of all control of the principal source of the Dominion revenue, the tariff. Whatever it may please the American Congress to do regarding the tariff the Dominion must forthwith accept. The people of the Dominion would have neither a vote nor a voice in Washington under the proposed Commercial Union."

Then, Sir, the same paper says further:

"Not only would our Congress prescribe and change at pleasure the taxes exacted from the people of Canada, but our executive officers and our courts would make all the rulings and decisions affecting rates for the Dominion as well as for the United States."

Again I will quote another extract from the same paper:

"If the Dominion will take our tariff laws as they are, and as Congress may choose to modify them, and as our Treasury Department and courts may construe them, well and good. This country may agree to such an arrangement as that, but it will never agree to accept the Dominion laws, or to put the whole business of tariff-making out of Congress, or into the hands of some joint high commission. Unless, therefore, the Dominion is prepared to make a complete and unconditional surrender of all control over its own tariff, and accept whatever tariff our own Congress may choose to enact from time to time, the scheme of Commercial Union, in the sense in which that phrase is used, is entirely out of the question."

But, Mr. Speaker, I have an extract from a speech by a gentleman whose opinion on this subject is, perhaps, to us in this House of still more importance, because he speaks with the responsibility of a Canadian public man and a leading and distinguished member of his own party. I refer to the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) who, at Jarvis, during the Haldimand election, delivered a speech in which he declared for Commercial Union. Now, Sir, I may say, what the hon. gentleman said I will admit, that it differs in some respects from the suggestion or hint of the hon. gentleman who has spoken to us to-night; but I think we have a right to assume that a speech delivered so recently and by a gentleman occupying so distinguished a position as the hon. member for North Norfolk must be held to embody, at any rate, the views of a considerable section of his party. He said:

"It was simply a Customs' union between two or more independent states where a common tariff and excise laws were adopted, and the revenue collected, after deducting expenses of collection, was divided among the participants upon the basis of population, or any other basis that might be agreed upon, while all trade restrictions between them were removed. The application of the principle between Canada and the United States would require that the two countries should have the same excise rates and the same tariff upon imports from all other countries; that the revenue thus collected in both countries should be divided upon conditions hereafter to be arranged; that the Customs line between the two countries from ocean to ocean should be removed, and that trade between Canada and the States should be in every respect as free and untrammelled as trade between the different States of the American Union was at the present moment."

That is a statement of the case as submitted by the hon. member for North Norfolk, and I am bound to say—and

I think this honorable House will agree with me—that in directness and clearness of statement it is far preferable to the speech to which we have listened to-night from the hon. member for South Oxford. Then, Sir, we have a still more important authority in this case—the authority on whose support and assistance hon. gentlemen depend for the realisation of their hopes. What is it that is proposed in Congress to-day. Mr. Butterworth introduced a Bill, and that Bill was submitted to the proper committee of the House of Representatives; but although we are not in the secrets of that committee, although we do not know what was done there or how it happened, what we do know is that Mr. Hitt afterwards introduced a resolution to the House of Representatives which was submitted to the same committee, and that Mr. Butterworth telegraphed a practical abandonment of his own scheme and the adoption of the scheme embodied in the resolution of Mr. Hitt. I have not the resolution itself, but here is a Washington despatch giving the substance of it:—

“WASHINGTON, 5th March.

“In the House of Representatives to-day Congressman Hitt introduced a joint resolution for the promotion of commercial union with Canada. It was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. It provides that when it shall be duly certified to the President that the Government of the Dominion of Canada has declared a desire to establish commercial union with the United States, having a uniform revenue system, like internal taxes to be collected, and like import duties to be imposed on articles brought into either country from other nations, and no duties upon trade between the United States and Canada, he shall appoint three commissioners to meet those who may be likewise designated to represent the Government of Canada to prepare a plan for the assimilation of the import duties and internal revenue taxes of the two countries, and an equitable division of receipts under commercial union, and said commissioners shall report to the President, who shall lay the report before Congress.”

Now, that is the only proposal before the Congress of the United States to-day, and I think we have a right therefore to ask hon. gentlemen whether they are prepared to accept that proposal, or if they are not, why they should, in view of the past history of this question, trifle with the time of Parliament in discussing this matter. Now, Sir, this does not mean unrestricted reciprocity, because Mr. Hitt, in a letter to the press says:

“The tariff would have to be the same in Canada and the United States, or there would be infinite fraud and disturbance of trade.”

So that you will see that upon that question Mr. Hitt speaks with no uncertain sound, and that the only proposition which comes from anybody in the United States is a proposition for a union or a reciprocity different, I take it, from that which is embodied in this resolution, although the same as that which, up to the time the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar), wrote his letter to Mr. Wiman, was accepted by hon. gentlemen opposite, including the hon. member for South Oxford and the hon. member for North Norfolk. The change came suddenly. The hon. member for West Ontario—the power behind the throne under the late leader, and I assume the power behind the throne under the present leader as well, if we may judge of the wonderful effect of that letter—wrote to Mr. Wiman, to say that the people of Canada were so enamored of the term Custom houses, that they loved the existence of the Custom house so much, that the proposal which suggested the abolition of the Custom houses along the line would not likely meet with general support in Canada; and, therefore, he suggested that we should have all the advantages of Commercial Union plus the expense of keeping up the line of Custom houses between the two countries; and that is the proposal we have here. Now, Mr. Speaker, what does this proposition which is submitted to us involve? In the first place, I take it that it involves, as I think I have shown, similar Customs duties to those imposed by the United States against all other countries in the world except the United States; and I take it, notwithstanding what the hon. gentleman has said, that that practically means separation from the mother country. Now, I am not going to raise the loyalty cry in any sense whatever. I accept the suggestion made with the hon. gentleman that we should deal with this question from the standpoint of our own interests, that we should deal with it as it affects Canada; and I do not feel disposed, therefore, at this time to raise the general question of loyalty to the mother country, and the danger and ingratitude involved in the separation from the mother country. But I think it is important, when we are discussing the question that the facts should be stated, and let the people draw their own inference and their conclusion from those facts. For anyone seriously to pretend that this country should remain connected with the mother country after adopting a principle by which we became commercially a portion of a foreign nation and charged against the mother country the same duties that foreign nation, charged, seems to me to ask people to believe that which no reasonable person can very well believe. So that we must take the proposition as meaning separation from the mother country. I doubt very much whether a high spirited people like the people of Canada would be mean enough to accept a continuance of the connection under such conditions as would be involved in that arrangement, even if the mother country were generous enough to consent to it. Then, Sir, it affects our finances seriously; and I think you will agree with me, that, having regard to the fact that the hon. member who has addressed us at so great length to-night is an ex-Finance Minister, whose speciality it is to deal with finances, the House has reason to complain that upon that branch of the subject he was not very distinct nor very clear. Now, Sir, let us look for a moment at how we stand financially to-day. Our expenditure for the fiscal year of 1887, amounted to $35,658,000.

| Of this, the charges on debt amounted to | $ 9,970,671 |
| Subsidies to Provinces | 4,169,341 |
| Sinking fund..... | 1,592,952 |
| Collection of revenue..... | 8,375,926 |

|------------|--------------|
| Total..... | $24,108,890 |

Now, I think, the House will agree with me that these are charges that no commercial union, at any rate no unrestricted reciprocity, would enable us to escape. They are the fixed charges of the country, and cannot be got rid of in any way whatever. Then we have the charges for other expenses, a little over $11,500,000. How are these met? Civil government, $1,211,850. It may be, if hon. gentlemen opposite were on this side, they might possibly take a few hundred dollars off that, or they might not. I think it will be found on examination, especially if you look at the estimates, for instance, of this year, where hardly an increase has taken place except the ordinary statutory increase, that the expenditure under this head cannot very well be reduced. Administration of Justice, $675,114. That is an item which cannot be reduced. Fisheries, the protections and bounties to fishermen, $415,443. I do not know whether hon. gentlemen opposite will abandon protection to the fisheries or the system of bounties to fishermen; but unless they do so that item cannot be reduced. Then there is the expenditure on the Indians in the North-West Territories, $1,201,301, and in view of the fact that the only complaint we have from hon. gentlemen opposite is that we permit the Indians to starve, that we do not give them enough food, and therefore do not expend enough on them, I do not think that is an item that can very well be reduced. Legislation costs us $977,302. That cannot be reduced. Militia, $1,193,692; lighthouse and coast service, $542,811; Mounted Police, $781,644; penitentiaries, $311,267; and public works rather under $2,133,315—or in all $9,395,759. And I think I may fairly say that by no process of economy, even if the hon. gentlemen, with their cheese paring methods, were on this side of the House, could these amounts be materially reduced, or at any rate so reduced as in the slightest degree to affect the general question of the application of this policy for carrying on the government of the country. How do we meet these expenses to-day? We have a revenue altogether of $35,754,993, of which the Customs yielded $21,377,800, leaving a balance from other sources of $13,375,193. On the imports we get from the United States to-day the duty amounts to $7,299,591, so that we have a revenue from Customs duties on imports from other countries, of $15,079,209, and adding to this the revenue from other sources, which, as I have stated, amounts to a little over $13,250,000, we have a total of $28,455,402. The deficit, therefore, if we gave up the revenue from the imports from the United States, which we would have, on our present expenditure and present general receipts, would amount to very nearly $7,250,000. That, I take it, must be made up by direct taxation. It is quite clear, as I have pointed out, that we cannot, if we are to carry on the Government of the country and proceed with the public improvements necessary to develop the country, do with a less expenditure than that which we have to-day; and shall we willingly give up this amount that we receive from Customs duties on the imports from the United States, we will have the large reduction to meet of $7,300,000. But that is not all. That is assuming that all our imports from other countries would come in as they come in to-day. That is assuming we would still have English goods coming by the St. Lawrence or landing at Boston or New York and coming here in bond. Would anyone pretend to say that would be the result? Immediately we would find the overwhelming proportion of the goods we now receive would be replaced by goods of a similar character manufactured in the United States, and we would find, not that we lost simply the $7,300,000 which we now derive from Customs duty on imports from the United States, but also at least one-half of the Customs duties that we receive from goods imported from England. I venture to say it would be very much more than one-half, and that practically we would surrender the whole of our Custom revenue. But that is not all. We would find also that the large importing trade of Canada would be transferred from the St. Lawrence, where a great part of it is done to-day, to American ports. We would actually by this process destroy the great trade by the St. Lawrence, which, I believe, both sides in this House desire to see built up. Why should ships come by the St. Lawrence, why should goods take that route and pay us large duties, when they could go to the American ports, pay duties there and be scattered through the United States, while we would receive goods of American manufacture in their place? There would be really no motive for these goods coming by the St. Lawrence at all, and thus we would destroy not only the manufacturing industries of the country, but another trade as well, which is too seldom thought of when we are dealing with the question of the trade interests of the country, and that is the great distributing trade of the country. You would find, Sir, American merchants in their great cities all along the border becoming the distributors to the retailers of the Dominion, thus verifying the statement made by prominent Americans in support of Commercial Union, that the effects would be to place American goods direct from the American warehouse to the retail store all over the Dominion. A great prejudice and injury would thus be done to the importing and distributing trade of Canada. How are we going to make up this revenue? The hon. gentleman does not seem to feel very much alarmed at direct taxation. He thinks direct taxation is more readily collected and costs less and is more equitable in its distribution than the system of taxation which we now have by means of Customs duties.

am not going to burden this discussion by a general discussion of that question, although I think I could show, and that without much difficulty, that the people who would suffer relatively the most from the system of direct taxation are those very poor people whom the hon. gentleman appears to be so much interested in. What did he see a short time ago in the city of Toronto when the publication was made of the incomes assessed of a number of the wealthy people of that city? He saw that the poor man, with his income of $500 or $600 a year, was assessed to the full amount, but in regard to the millionaire with his $40,000 or $50,000 a year, no assessor would think of putting him down for that, and he was put at $5,000 or $6,000 or perhaps $10,000 a year. And, as with incomes, so with real property. If you go into any of our large cities, you will find that the poor man's house can be easily assessed at its real value; but, if you take the rich man's house, which has cost him $50,000 or $100,000, with its almost park-like lawns around it, you will find that it is assessed at one-third or one-fourth of its value, for no assessor would think of putting it down at its real value. That is known to every one who has watched the record of the assessment roll. So this system of direct taxation, instead of being one which would relieve the poor of an excessive burden, would really impose upon the poor far more than their proper proportion of taxation. Under the present system, the poor man can get on practically without any taxation at all. Our taxes are largely upon luxuries. It is the wealthy, under the present system, who pay the large proportion, because it is upon the expensive goods that the larger proportion of the taxation of the country is paid, while a poor man can sit down and look over what he eats and what he wears, and see what he pays for it, and can ascertain the fact for his comfort that the taxation he pays is practically nil in this happy country of ours. But we cannot adopt the principle of Excise duties, because I think, if I read the resolution of the hon. gentleman aright, he proposes a special exception in regard to the Excise duties. We cannot put on extra duties of Excise for this reason, that there is a limit beyond which you cannot go in Excise duties. You have to have regard, in the imposition of Excise duties, particularly in this country where we are alongside our neighbors on the other side, to the duties imposed by them and the general cost of the article in order to know what amount of Excise duty is collectable under any system you may adopt, and therefore we are restricted even in the matter of Excise duties. We would have to adopt direct taxation. No other means could possibly be adopted. Of course, there is one way in which we might reduce our expenditures to some extent. We spend to-day some four million dollars on Provincial subsidies. The hon. gentleman opposite referred to the action of the Quebec Conference, whom, in a lapse of excessive candour, he described as his friends, correcting himself immediately afterwards; and he referred to the resolutions passed by that Conference as if they were the embodiment of the wisdom of this country, as I believe they are to be the embodiment of the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. But they do not contemplate a reduction in the matter of subsidies. On the contrary, the very thing which will commend them to some of the Provinces is that resolution which proposes largely to increase the subsidies. It is true that the hon. gentleman after speaking of these resolutions as the embodiment of wisdom, said that this commercial union would prevent absolutely an increase of the expenses of the country, but if we are to reduce the expenditure, if we are to resort to direct taxation, I think the people of this country will at once say that it would be little less than absurd that the Dominion Government, the central authority, should impose direct taxation through the machinery of municipal government—because there is hardly any other way in which to do it—in order to distribute a portion of the proceeds back again to the Provinces. I am not going to say whether we ought to do away with Provincial subsidies or not. The hon. gentleman in a former Session of Parliament, did suggest that he believed it would be for the interests of Canada if the Provincial subsidies were done away with altogether. I leave him on that subject to make his account with his hon. friends on that side from the other Provinces, and I think he will find some difficulty in convincing them that that would be a wise system to adopt in Canada. So you see, by the adoption of this policy, we are to find ourselves reduced to a system of direct taxation by which we are to levy at least $15,000,000 to make up for the loss in Customs duties which the adoption of this system of so-called unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union would impose upon us. Now, what is Canada to gain as a return for this sacrifice, because, after all, this is a business matter, and ought to be discussed as a business proposition. What are we to gain for this sacrifice? We sacrifice a large portion of our revenue, we sacrifice our distributing trade, we sacrifice or we risk the sacrificing of the manufacturing interests of the country. What are we to get in return for it? Hon. gentlemen tell us we are to get an enlarged market in the United States.—I suppose it is really the enlarged market which is the chief advantage proposed. The market which is to be opened in this country for our friends on the other side is their side of the subject. Our side is that we are to get an enlarged market in the United States. How do we stand in regard to that matter at present? Let us look at our exports to the United States and to Great Britain. Our exports to the United States amount to $32,273,033, and to Great Britain they amount to $38,714,331. I will deal simply with the exports to United States. Those of the mine amount to nearly $3,000,000 those of the fisheries to nearly $2,250,000, those of the forest to over $9,250,000, those of animals to over $7,000,000, the products of the farm to very nearly $8,000,000, manufactures to a little over $1,250,000, and miscellaneous to $569,918, making in all a little over thirty-two and a quarter millions. If we examine these figures, we will find this result: Of the $9,250,000 worth of the products of the forest, $1,600,000 enters free under the present system, and the duty on the remaining portion is proposed to be remitted by the Tariff Bill now before Congress. Of the exports of the mine, coal amounts about one million and a quarter, gold quartz to about a million; gypsum crude, to about $80,000; copper ore, $181,000; iron ore, $171,900; stone and marble, $69,300; making the total of $2,754,000. Coal, as the hon. gentlemen know, over a million dollars worth of it, in fact nearly the whole export of coal to the United States goes from the coal fields of Vancouver Island to the markets of the United States on the Pacific coast, chiefly to San Francisco. Now, the question of duty on that might be an important matter, but I am inclined to think in that case we may accept the general view which hon. gentlemen opposite, especially in this controversy, have impressed on us, namely, that it is the consumer who pays the duty. Of the fisheries, $2,717,000, no less than $1,130,000 worth is already admitted free, so that the advantages of a free market, undoubtedly very great, may be, after all, over estimated. No one who has watched the progress of the fisheries and the fishery trade during the last two years in our Maritime Provinces, does not know that there has never been—I think I am within the mark in saying—there has never been in the history of the Maritime Provinces more profitable fishing than that which occurred during the last year or two. Now we find in regard to the fisheries that new markets are being opened up all the time. Here, for instance, is what the Halifax Chamber of Commerce said upon this subject on 7th March, only a few days ago:

"Now that we have been for a time in sole possession of our fisheries, we are realising more than ever their very great value. The product of our fisheries is stated at about twenty millions of dollars. Of this great industry Nova Scotia is credited with at least one-half of the whole. While the available consuming population is rapidly increasing, a single square mile cannot be added to these productive grounds, the product of which must, in the very nature of things, continue to increase in value. Their accessibility, productiveness and extent place them before us as the most valuable in the world. The markets of the world are wide enough if properly cultivated for all we catch for export, with an ever-increasing demand. Our merchants seem fairly alive to the value of these more distant markets and each year ought to find them more capable of utilising them. Let us then be alive to the great value of this source of wealth and employment, quite satisfied, while in full possession of our own, to allow our neighbors across the line the full possession of their own, and get ready, should they come to a just and equitable view of the whole premises, to meet them in a reciprocity treaty of friendly commerce worthy of the two most advanced nations of the world, and members at the same time of one great family."

Now, Sir, you will see that the Chamber of Commerce of Halifax, thoroughly familiar with the position of the fisheries, recognise that they have, under the present conditions, opportunities for the profitable employment of those fisheries, and that they look forward to them as a great source of wealth, and believe that other large markets may be opened for them, even if the United States should, unfortunately, continue the policy which they have adopted in the past. Now, of animals and their produce, we exported $7,034,455 and of these there were already free of duty $2,669,628, leaving a little over four millions and a quarter subject to duty. The products of the farm reached $7,400,777. With a view of ascertaining the duty which we pay on our exports, I take the American trade returns, because they give the exact amount of duty paid upon the exports of Canada into that country. The imports into the United States from Canada in 1887, which were subject to duty amounted to about to $26,000,000. I have taken the details of 24 millions of this sum; the others were very small amounts, and in the hurry I did not go into them. But upon 24 millions of exports, the duty paid was $4,715,464, or on the whole exports from Canada into the United States, the duty paid was about $5,000,000. Unrestricted reciprocity would remove that, so that as a mere matter of bargain, as a mere matter of profit and loss, we would receive about five millions, assuming, of course, that the exporter pays the duty, that the producer pays the duty, which is rather strange doctrine, coming from hon. gentlemen opposite, in view of the discussions we have had in the past. But assuming that the producer pays the duty, we save $5,000,000, and for that we would sacrifice the duties on American goods coming into Canada, amounting to over seven millions and a quarter. It is a new doctrine that we are to give up seven and three quarter million dollars in order that we may get five millions in return. Now, Sir, it is impossible, in the discussion of this question, to avoid some reference of what is going on in the Congress of the United States. A Bill, as hon. gentlemen know, has now been submitted to Congress, putting on the free list a large number of articles which are now subject to duty. The articles that would be exempt from duty, and the amount of duty now collected, are the following:—

| Lumber..... | $7,829,811 |
| Flax | 298,679 |
| Tin plates..... | 222 |
| Copper ore | 188,329 |
| Potatoes | 339,163 |
| Beans and peas | 556,430 |
| Wool..... | 356,284 |

In all, $9,800,000 worth of exports from Canada to the United States, out of the $25,000,000 that are paying duty, would be exempt from duties if that Bill passed. Now, the amount of the duty on the articles which would be remitted if that Bill passes, amounts to $2,778,964. As to the balance of the articles, this fact ought to be remembered, that our trade with the United States is a trade of competition and not a trade of exchange. The articles that would go into the United States are articles which are largely produced by the people of that country. When the hon. gentleman tells us that we are to give up a market of 5,000,000 for a market of 60,000,000 of people, he ought also in fairness, to tell us that we give up our market of 5,000,000 for a market of 60,000,000 which is already so fully occupied that precisely the same articles we export to them, they actually are importing a larger amount of most of those articles from other countries than they are importing from us. No one, therefore, can say but this is a market open to us in the sense in which hon. gentlemen use that term. The distinction between competition and exchange in matters of trade cannot be too strongly emphasised. We would thus find that the balance which we would receive, supposing that the Bill now before Congress passes, from duty on the balance of the articles, would amount to $2,780,000, and for the remission of that amount the people of Canada, as I have said, were expected to give up $7,300,000. We are in addition to risk the transfer of our important trade to United States ports, we are to introduce discriminating rates against Great Britain and to disturb our entire fiscal and industrial system, because the hon. gentleman himself admits that that would be the immediate result at all events, whatever might be the ultimate result of the adoption of this principle of unrestricted reciprocity. A few words as to the question of this large market, because that after all is the one argument produced to induce us to accept this principle. First as to manufactures. I am relieved considerably from the necessity of dealing with this question by the admission of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) that the effect would be simply to injure many of the manufactures of Canada. Is it in the interests of this country that we should injure those manufactures? What have the manufacturers of this country done that an injury of this kind proposed to be inflicted on them should be treated as a matter not only of no consequence but as a matter that actually should be received with considerable self-complacency by Parliament? True, it is said that the effect would be to induce us to do as is done in the United States, to adopt special classes of manufactures, that with the large market of 65,000,000 to supply instead of 5,000,000, manufacturers would adopt special lines, and having adopted those special lines, on the whole the manufacturing interests of this country would be promoted rather than retarded, after, of course the immediate disturbance has passed away, which the hon. gentleman admits is inevitable. But the adoption of those special lines involves a change of our manufactures altogether, the introduction of new machinery, the introduction of new capital; and I will ask any hon. gentleman whether he thinks any man would be so foolish as to invest large capital in Canada for special lines of manufactures in the hope that we might thereby get a market in the United States as well as in Canada, when by simply crossing the line he could secure for all time a market of 60,000,000 at all events, and for the time being the market of Canada as well. Remember that this reciprocity arrangement is not to be—I do not so understand it—a permanent arrangement, I mean an absolutely permanent arrangement. It will be a time treaty, and everyone knows that in a time treaty there will always be the termination of the treaty in the view of any man who is investing a single dollar in manufacturing industries or commerce in Canada. They will look at the past. They will remember that every treaty that we have had with the United States has been denounced the very moment the terms of the treaty permitted it. More than that. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) says we are still to remain an independent community on this continent, that is independent so far as political connection with the United States is concerned, and we are still to remain connected with the mother country. The hon. gentleman disavows any desire that we should separate from the mother country. There is, however, still the contingency which constantly must arise between nations of disagreement and rupture occurring between these nations, and a rupture as everybody knows ends a treaty and every manufacturer who is going to invest his money having regard to this market of 65,000,000 would stop to consider the contingency of a disagreement arising between the two nations, stopping trade and leaving him with all his investment he had made for a trade with 65,000,000 of people and only a market of 5,000,000 in which he could employ it. He would go, I say, to the other side of the line if he had the business capacity, business foresight and business enterprise which manufacturers are generally acknowledged to possess. So much for the manufacturers and for the wholesale merchants whose distributing trade would be affected by such a treaty. But we are told the farmers are the men who are going to gain largely by this treaty. We are told, and told truthfully, that they are the great majority of the people of Canada, that they are the people whose interests, if we could be shown that they were to be materially affected, ought to govern and supersede all other considerations in connection with the legislation of this Parliament. What is the fact in regard to them? Why not more than ten per cent. of the entire products of Canada go to the United States. I hear an hon. gentleman behind me, who is thoroughly familiar with this subject, say that not more than five per cent. goes to the United States, but I place the quantity at ten per cent.

Mr. WELSH. More than 20 per cent. goes.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The overwhelming proportion is consumed in Canada. I think I may fairly say that $360,000,000 worth is consumed in Canada out of some $400,000,000 worth, the entire production of the farms in Canada. So that the interests of the farmer are to be advanced, not by improving the market for his 10 per cent., but by improving the market for the overwhelming quantity he sells at home by causing an improvement of the home market. That is the true policy with regard to the interests of the farmer in Canada. How is the home market to be improved? Every one knows that it is by building up urban populations, the home market is improved to the farmer. Has that been going on during the last few years? Look at the city of Toronto. The hon. gentleman says one or two of our towns have made progress. I say that all the important towns of Canada have made progress. Take the city of Toronto, whose assessed value in six years has increased $42,000,000, and there are very few cities in the United States that can be said to have shown greater relative progress during the same time. Take the city of Montreal. Its assessed value in one single year has increased $7,500,000, and that increased assessed value represents a largely increased population, a largely increased consuming population, consuming the products of the farmers of the country. The same progress substantially, yet not quite the same, may be said to have characterised the chief great centres of Canada. Now, what is the condition of the farmers at this moment? The hon. gentleman has told us they are in a very desperate condition, that the cost of farm lands has gone down, that the cost of farm produce has gone down; and he proposes to increase the price of farm land and increase the cost of the various products by destroying the manufacturing interests of Canada, by compelling us to resort to direct taxation, by stopping all the public works of every kind, because that is part of the hon. gentleman's policy; he proposes to increase the value of farm lands and of farm products by doing this, in order that he may obtain reciprocal free trade or rather unrestricted reciprocity, with the United States.

Now I will take some figures from an authority which can hardly be said to be an unfavorable authority at any rate to hon. gentlemen opposite. The figures are given in the report of Mr. Blue. Mr. Blue, as is well known, has developed into somewhat of a politician and he is to day I believe an ardent advocate of Commercial Union. Although it is none of my business, and I have no right to interfere with the officer of another Government I am bound to say that I think having regard to the fact that he is the statistician of the Government that he has to give figures and returns on those very important matters to the people of Ontario as a whole irrespective of politics that greater confidence might be reposed in him if it were not known—I do not mean to say recollect that he has misstated any figures—but greater confidence would be bestowed upon him if it were not known that he is interested in a movement which will be promoted by showing that the interests of the farmers are failing, and that their products are failing to realise the prices that they did before. But I take his figures which cannot be regarded as unfavorable figures by hon. gentlemen opposite. Ontario, according to Mr. Blue contains 22,000,000 acres of farm land occupied, of which 10,940,000 are cleared and 8,670,000 woodlands, and acreage in field crops 7,403,000, and orchards and gardens 186,616, and the remainder occupied by barns, buildings and minor crops. The total acreage of the Province in wheat (fall and spring) was 1,464,000 in 1886 and the product that year (it was less last year), was 27,900,000 bushels. The average price of farm land according to Mr. Blue in 1886 was $9.78 per acre, and that instead of being a reduction of price was actually according to Mr. Blue again 22 cents per acre above the average in the years from 1882 to 1886. That is the statement made by Mr. Blue. The average value of the farm buildings was $3.44 per acre, and the increase of 69 cents per acre over the average of 1882 and 1886. The average value of farming implements was $2.32 per acre or 21 cents increase over the average from 1882 to 1886. The value of the live stock was 37 cents per acre above the five years' average. I think that those figures at any rate do not show that the value in the hands of the farmers are decreasing, as the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) would have led us to believe in his speech. We have here a very large increase in farm lands, buildings, stock and agricultural implements. We have on those an average increase of $1.50 an acre in 1886 over the average of the preceding five years, or an aggregate increase of thirty millions of dollars in the pockets of the farmers of Ontario in 1886 over the average of the previous five years. That is not by any means an evidence of that poverty of which we hear so much from hon. gentlemen opposite. But they told us or will probably tell us that those farms are all mortgaged, that the farmers are hopelessly in debt, and that, therefore, on that account they find that the burden of paying the interest on their debt having regard to the prices that they are now getting for their products, is a burden which is intolerable to them although how they are going to get out of that by unrestricted reciprocity I have not yet been able to discover. I think I will be able to show before I get through that this policy would send them to the wrong market to get relief of that kind. Now there are sixty-five loan and building societies who make reports to the Financial Department of Canada. The loans represented by these companies who report to the Finance Department represent between $30,000,000 and $85,000,000, and the value of property from 1880 to 1883, according to those reports, in the Provinces of Canada increased $32,000,000. The value of mortgages on property increased $18,000,000. Between 1883 and 1886 the value of property again increased, curiously enough, $32,000,000, while the value of mortgages on property increased $12,000,000. In 1880 the default through the non-payment of interest or principal was about eight per cent. of the whole. In 1886 the default was reduced to four seven-tenths per cent., and in 1887 the condition of things was even better. I take two companies as an illustration, because recently they have held their meetings and have made their statements. The Canadian Company held its annual meeting in London, England, since the beginning of the present year. From the report of the remarks of the chairman I take the following:—

"The chairman referred to two facts, first that the company had reduced their rate of interest one per cent. because other companies were offering money at reduced rates, and secondly, that the proceeds obtained last year (1887) from the sale of lands in Canada were twenty-five per cent. higher than the value in December, 1886."

Those were the actual sales, forced sales I presume some of them, as well as sales not forced by reason of land falling as the result of foreclosure into the lands of the loan company. The North of Scotland Canadian Mortgage Company also held its meeting since the beginning of the new year:

"The chairman referred to the falling off in interest received in 1887 on mortgages in Canada. That is explained by the fact that a very considerable number of the mortgages made three or four years ago at a higher rate of interest have fallen in and the money has been lent out at the much less rate of interest current now."

They also report:

"The amount of real estate fallen into the hands of the company through foreclosure was but £8,000 out of £800,000 the company had invested, or only about one per cent."

Yet hon. gentlemen, in the face of those facts—facts which ought to be open to them if they were anxious to say something good of the country—tell us that the farmers of Canada have nothing but ruin staring them in the face. The rate of interest has fallen within the last six years at least two per cent., or a saving to the mortgagors in the operations of loan companies of a million and a half of dollars in a year. The value of farms has increased, money is cheaper and defaults are 70 per cent. less than five years ago. The savings of the farmers are increasing rapidly, and the loan companies are vying with each other to make loans on farm land. That is the position of things in Canada in relation to the farmers of the country. Now, hon. gentlemen tell us that the farmers will be better off if they went to the States. Happily for us, we have the record of the farmers in the States. They will be, I have no doubt, interesting. I think I can say this with perfect truth, that on the face of God's earth there are not to-day a body of men, take them on an average who are as well to do as the farmers of Ontario at the present time. Now, Sir, in the March report for the State of New York, right alongside of us, a wealthy state, with a large urban population and great cities which can afford immediate markets for the ordinary products of the land. This report is forwarded to the Washington Department of Agriculture, and the following reference is made to the farmers in New York. It is an official report made to Congress and it says:

"On the whole farmers are more in debt than they were ten years ago. There are a large number of farms which were purchased a few years ago and mortgaged which would not now sell for more than the face of the mortgages, owing to the depreciation of the farming lands, which on an average is fully 33 per cent. in ten years. Probably one-third of the farms in the State would not sell for more than the cost of buildings and other improvements, owing to this shrinkage."

In the United States generally the value of farm stock is declining in exact proportion to the increase in the number. The statistician of the Washington Bureau of Agriculture says:

"The decline of value in horses, mules and cattle has been in progress for two years. It averages 3 per cent. for horses and mules, 8 per cent. in cattle, 11 per cent in sheep and 15 per cent. in swine."

While numbers have increased except of sheep in two years past the aggregate valuation of farm animals is less by something over $100,000,000."

During the same two years in which in the United States there was a decrease in value of farm stock to the above amount, notwithstanding the increase in numbers, Ontario had an increase in the number, excepting sheep and swine, and in the value of the live stock on her farms to the amount of $8,250,000. In the United States it is estimated that in ten States, including Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, &c., the total value of the farm products is $1,000,000,000 and that one-half of the farms are mortgaged. These produce $500,000,000 in value; of this $239,000,000 goes to pay interest, leaving $261,000,000 to support 886,000 farmers and their families, or $294 a year. These are the official records published at Washington for the information of the American Government and Congress, and I think they go to show that if the farmers of Canada want to improve their condition, it is not to the United States that they will have to go, because these farmers of Michigan and Illinois have all the advantages of commercial union and unrestricted reciprocity—all the advantages which hon. gentlemen opposite promise to the people of Canada if they will only accept their panacea for the ills under which we are laboring. Now, what is the condition of the farmers of Canada. I take the statement of Prof. Wm. Brown, of the Ontario Agricultural College, an institution under the control of the Local Government of Ontario. He says:

"The average farmer of the Province of Ontario is doing well, is actually making money. He has by his own admission to our statistical department during the past five years been receiving a total crop value of $1,925, say $2,000 from all sources; this is the first proof and admission doubted by no one."

So that I think, Mr. Speaker, in the face of these facts and figures, which are official on both sides of the line—from the officers of the Ontario Government, so far as Ontario is concerned, and from the officers of the American Government, so far as the United States is concerned—we may fairly say that the farmers of Canada find nothing to envy in the position of their neighbors on the other side of the line.

An hon. MEMBER. Why do they go there then?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Now, Sir, I will give the hon. gentleman an extract from a newspaper from which I have already quoted, I think the leading newspaper in the Western States, the Chicago Times, in regard to the condition of the farmers in those States:

"Farm mortgages are swallowing up millions of acres of land in Southern and Western States and Territories. The syndicates that loan money at from 1 to 3 per cent. per month are mainly made up of Scotch, English and New England capitalists, who have their agents throughout the south and west. These mortgages are falling due, and soon an immense number of southern and western farms will be in the hands of foreign mortgagees. It is said that $200,000,000 has been loaned on farm mortgages in the south-west; in Kansas, $20,000,000, and nearly as much in Nebraska. The territories are covered with mortgages on new farms not yet patented. In some of them the law has permitted outrageous interest, so that the farm mortgage business has grown into immense proportions. In many land districts half of the settlers borrow money at high interest to pay the small price required by the Government on proving up. This is leading to widespread disaster. The object of the pre-emption law is perverted. Eastern and foreign capitalists get the land with such improvements as the settler has put upon it. The settler loses all by reason of the exorbitant interest he is compelled to pay."

An hon. gentleman on the other side asks me why farmers leave Canada to go to the Western States. One reason is precisely such speeches as we have heard to-night. The farmers of Canada, listening to the statements of the hon. gentleman, who speaks as an ex-Minister of Finance, and whose statements the public have a right to assume, at any rate, ought to be taken as exact, finding that their condition is bad, and that in the United States everything is coulour de rose, have gone, many of them, to the United States. But I know what is going on in Dakota to-day, and I tell the hon. gentlemen that as they have been compelled to realise that time has been their great enemy in the past, so they will find in the future that Canadians who have been entrapped into going to Dakota by statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite, are now beginning to come back to Canada, so that at this moment the movement of population, instead of being from the north to the south, is from the south to the north.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Tell us about Canadians who invest in Texas ranches.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). If the hon. gentleman desires to insult any members of this House, perhaps if enquiries were made into some of his own investments—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have made no investments in the United States.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). We are told of this enormous passage of population from Canada to the United States. It is quite true there are Canadians in the United States, just as it is quite true that there are Americans in Canada. It is quite true that in Canada, as in the Eastern States, there has been a movement of population westward. Up to quite recently we had no North-West of our own where those people could go to. They are beginning to go there now. We have in this House to-day representatives from those Territories, who I venture to say will give the hon. gentlemen his answer with regard to them, probably before this debate is ended. But what is the fact with regard to the movement of population? I take the New England States of Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Vermont, New Hampshire, Connecticut, and Maine, and what do we find? That in 50 years the increase in the population of those States has been 2,056,309, that is from 1,953,717 to a little over 4,000,000, while in Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island during the same period the population has increased from 1,065,215 to 4,142,951, or an increase of 3,087,736. Canada, which started fifty years ago with a population of 1,000,000 less than that of the New England States, which, I think, hon. gentlemen will admit with me stands relatively under very much the same conditions as we do, finds itself at the end of the fifty years with a population of 140,000 more than they. Yet hon. gentlemen opposite contend that the people of this country are leaving because they cannot make money. Now there is another question, and that is the question of the prices which are paid for products in the two countries. Mr. Wiman, as I have said before, did my constituency the honor of visiting it on the 1st July last, and making his first speech there on commercial union in Canada. I regret very much I was not able to be present, not for the purpose of replying to him, but of joining with my constituents in extending to Mr. Wiman and the distinguished American who accompanied him a hearty welcome to the county. In that speech Mr. Wiman, speaking to the farmers, made some statements, of which we have heard the like to-night from the hon. member for South Oxford. He told the farmers of Cardwell that he knew a good many people in the city of New York, who live at the magnificent rate of millionaires, and to whom the question of what they would put on their table was a matter of no consequence. For "broilers," he said, a term which I find a good many people knew nothing about, for broilers they would pay three dollars a pair, and for the finest class of butter 60 cents a pound, and so on with a number of articles, leaving the impression upon the minds of the people he was addressing that if they had only commercial union, they would find themselves supplying broilers to the tables of millionaires and also supplying fancy articles of butter. We have had statements of that kind to-night from the hon. member for South

Oxford. Were they fair statements? Did he take the trouble before making them, to examine the prices of ordinary articles of the farm in the towns of the United States and Canada and make a comparison? I do not think he did. Now what is the fact. Take, for instance, the city of Buffalo and the city of Toronto. After reading Mr. Wiman's speech I had the curiosity to compare the markets on the first of July of Buffalo and Toronto with each other; and curiously enough, as to the majority of these ordinary articles, the price was higher than Toronto, although the farmers of Albany and the surrounding district were in much closer proximity to the wealthy millionaires upon whose tables broilers, &c., were used, than were the farmers of Toronto. On the 9th of this month, taking the prices of ordinary articles upon the market of Buffalo and Toronto, I find they compare as follows:—

| | $ cts. | $ cts. | $ cts. | $ cts. |
| Oats, per bushel | 0 44 to | 0 45 | 0 39 to | 0 40 |
| Hay, per ton | 14 00 to | 16 00 | 12 00 to | 14 00 |
| Potatoes, per bag | 1 00 to | 1 10 | 0 85 to | 0 90 |
| Butter, choice, per lb | 0 20 to | 0 21 | 0 22 to | 0 24 |
| do fair to good, per lb | 0 15 to | 0 18 | 0 18 to | 0 20 |
| Turkeys, per lb | 0 12 to | 0 13 | 0 10 to | 0 12 |
| Chickens, per lb | 0 12 to | 0 13 | 0 10 to | 0 12 |
| Geese, per lb | 0 10 to | 0 10½ | 0 07 to | 0 10 |
| Apples, per brl | 1 75 to | 2 60 | 1 25 to | 2 50 |
| Onions, per bag | 1 50 to | 2 00 | 1 25 to | 1 50 |
| Turnips do | 0 40 to | 0 50 | 0 40 to | 0 50 |
| Carrots do | 0 50 to | 0 60 | 0 55 to | 0 65 |

So that hon. gentlemen will see these are the ordinary articles which the farmers produce and carry to the market of Buffalo on the one side and Toronto on the other. The farmer in the vicinity of Toronto is better off on the whole, although the farmer in the vicinity of Albany has unrestricted reciprocity with the other parts of the American Union, although he has in fact commercial union. How do the prices in Toronto and Milwaukee compare? I have not examined the figures myself, but took them from the New York Witness, which, I presume, is a good authority. They compare as follows:—

| | TORONTO. | | MILWAUKEE | |
|-----------------|----------|---------|-----------|---------|
| | $ cts. | $ cts. | $ cts. | $ cts. |
| Wheat | 0 73 to | 0 83½ | 0 60 to | 0 70 |
| Oats | 0 45 to | 0 47 | 0 32 to | 0 38 |
| Barley | 0 70 to | 0 82 | 0 60 to | 0 68 |
| Live hogs | 5 00 to | 5 50 | 4 00 to | 4 60 |
| Cattle | 2 50 to | 4 50 | 2 50 to | 4 00 |
| Eggs | 0 22 to | 0 30 | 0 17 to | 0 18 |
| Butter | 0 18 to | 0 25 | 0 18 to | 0 20 |

These are simply the ordinary market reports, showing one reason I fancy why the official statistician for the Province of Ontario can report a so much more favorable condition of affairs to farmers of that Province than the official statistics of the United States can record with reference to the farmers of the latter. I shall not detain the House longer. As I said in commencing, the people of this country have always been and are always ready to enter into the freest commercial relations with our neighbors, consistent with the great policy of developing our own industries. I protest against the character of speeches such as that to which we have listened to-night. If hon. gentlemen opposite have sat on that side for ten years, they owe that fact chiefly to just such speeches as the one we have heard from the hon. member for South Oxford. They mistake the temper of the people of Canada, they mistake the temper of the electors of this country, if they imagine that the electors will tolerate this perpetual depreciation of the country itself, and I cannot in this sense do better than to offer as a heritage to hon. gentlemen opposite and through them to the country the words of a former leader of the Liberal party, a great leader, who, whatever difference of opinion may have existed as to his motives and opinions upon some questions was at least a sincere and devoted Canadian and loyalist. I alluded to the late Hon. George Brown. I cannot do better than give his words as a heritage which, it seems to me, it is well worth our while to hold in memory as the conclusions of the remarks I have just made:

"Neither politically nor commercially does Canada need to change her position to secure a high degree of prosperity. In all that conduces to personal comfort and happiness, in the steady development of home and foreign trade, in the extension of public enterprise, in the flourishing condition of our farmers and in the unlimited scope for the employment of a vast population, Canada has all that a nation can desire."

Mr. DAVIES moved the adjournment of the debate.
Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

Sir JOHN MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. McMULLEN. I should like to ask what effort the Postmaster General has made to expedite the delivery of mails. From Monday last there has not been a mail which has arrived here from west of Toronto, and this is Wednesday. Has anything been done in this matter?

Mr. McLELAN. There has been a blockade on several of the railways in consequence of the snowstorm.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am aware of that, but what I want to know is whether the Minister has made any effort to get the mails forwarded.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 11 55 p.m.

Ottawa, Thursday, March 15, 1888.

No. 16.

NOTICE TO MEMBERS.

Necessary corrections to Members' Speeches, for the bound edition, must be forwarded to the Debates Office within twenty-four hours after the printed copies of the speeches have been circulated, as after that time the contractors may print the copies for the bound edition without further delay.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 15th March, 1888.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

COST OF RAILWAYS IN CANADA.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, What is the nominal cost, as given to 1st January, 1888, of all railways in the Dominion of Canada?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I have made enquiries in order to get a return to this question, but I am informed that this information can only be given to the 1st of July, 1887. The figures that are given to me to that date are as follows: The subscribed capital is $716,970,950, and the paid up capital is $678,182,769.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The paid up capital?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If the House will permit me, I rather think the hon. gentleman has been a little misinformed on that subject. It is scarcely possible that it can amount to as much, because, exclusive of paid up capital, there would be a huge charge for bonds and other matters of that kind. However, it is vastly above the figures I named, so that it does not hurt my argument. But I think the hon. gentleman will find that there has been an error in the statement. It might, probably, be as well to have it correct. I know the details myself pretty well in the railway statistics, and if the hon. gentleman will compare these details, he will see that it is scarcely within the limits of possibility that there should have been $678,000,000 of capital paid up. The total cost may have amounted to that.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That I do not know. I communicated with the chief engineer of railways, Mr. Schreiber, and these are the figures he sent me yesterday.

COMMISSION ROYALE DU TRAVAIL.

M. BEAUSOLEIL demande: Le gouvernement a-t-il reçu aucune plainte verbale ou écrite concernant la conduite du président ou d'aucun membre de la Commission Royale du Travail dans l'exercice de ses fonctions officielles; et si oui, quelle est la nature de ces plaintes?

16--1888--1

DEPOSITIONS TAKEN BY THE LABOR COMMISSION

Mr. BEAUSOLEIL asked, Whether the Government received from the chairman of the Royal Commission on Labor an application for authority to furnish to parties interested duly certified copies of the depositions taken by the said commission; and if so, what authorisation did they receive?

Mr. BOWELL. Application was made by some parties to the commission for the evidence here mentioned. The Government declined to permit the evidence to be given to any interested party until it had been reported to the Government.

LEGAL TENDER IN GOLD.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, 1. Is it the intention of the Government to compel the banks to keep a requisite reserve—that is, a fixed percentage of circulation and deposit? 2. To abolish the present dual legal tender making American gold the sole legal tender? 3. Is the Government aware that by refusing to redeem the legal tender notes in American gold (whilst holding plenty) a grievous burden is imposed upon the community—exchange on New York being forced to a premium sufficient to recoup for the loss sustained by the remittance of British gold?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The whole question of banks and the banking system is now under the consideration of the Government, and I presume will also come under the consideration of the House of Commons. Hon. gentlemen know that the bank charters expire in 1890, and in the meantime the whole subject will be fully studied with a view to consider the whole question of our banking and commerce.

Mr. MITCHELL. The right hon. gentleman will notice that this enquiry refers more particularly to the action of the Government, than to the banks.

BOUNDARY BETWEEN ALASKA AND CANADA.

Mr. CHARLTON asked, Whether, in consequence of the discovery of gold on the upper waters of the Yukon River, and the growing importance of having the boundary between Alaska and the Dominion of Canada defined, steps have been taken to secure an early location of the same by joint action and agreement of the United States and Canada?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Communications have been going on between the United States and Her Majesty's Government, and also with Canada, with a view, if possible, of settling by agreement the boundary between Alaska and Canada.

COST OF THE NORTH-WEST REBELLION.

Mr. MULOCK asked, What is the total amount of money disbursed by the Government in consequence of the North-West rebellion?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In the absence of the hon. Minister of Militia, I would say to the hon. gentleman that the question involves a number of accounts in several departments. If the hon. gentleman will allow it to stand as a notice for a return, the return will be brought down at once, and the same for the next question.

VENTILATION OF THE CHAMBER.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to direct the attention of the Minister of Public Works to the fact that on this side of the House my hon. friend beside me, and myself in particular, are exposed to a very heavy draught. It is all fair that the Opposition should be kept in the cold shades, but I object to being kept in a draught, and I hope the Minister of Public Works, who is responsible for this building, will endeavor to take some steps so as to prevent this very serious inconvenience. It is not quite fair that a man should be required to make a long speech here with a draught striking on him.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman is perfectly right, and we on this side of the House have felt the draught as well. The attention of the chief architect of the department has been called to this. He has examined the building, and some defects in the windows have been remedied; but the constant opening of the doors in the chamber and the opening of doors leading to the galleries, some of which are occasionally left open, make it very difficult not to have draughts. Of course, hon. gentlemen opposite will understand that we do not want to treat them, in that respect at all events, different from ourselves.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I hope the Minister will take the matter into his consideration, as it is a very serious annoyance.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes.

Mr. CHARLTON. I desire to direct attention to one feature, which is, that it is impossible to get fresh air without having a current of air when it comes in. If we put an end to draughts we will sit in a very injurious atmosphere, and while I admit that the matter is very difficult to regulate, it will be better I think to have the fresh air.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. You wish to honor the drafts.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message as follows:—

LANSDOWNE.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

I acknowledge with thanks the loyal Address you have voted in answer to the Speech with which I opened the session.

I receive with satisfaction your assurance that your earnest and careful attention will be given to the important measures which are to be submitted for your consideration.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
Ottawa, 13th March, 1888.

RECIPROCITY WITH THE UNITED STATES.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Richard Cartwright:

That it is highly desirable that the largest possible freedom of commercial intercourse should obtain between the Dominion of Canada and the United States, and that it is expedient that all articles manufactured in, or the natural products of either of the said countries should be admitted free of duty into the ports of the other (articles subject to duties of excise or of internal revenue alone excepted). That it is further expedient that the Government of the Dominion should take steps, at an early date, to ascertain on what terms and conditions arrangements can be effected with the United States for the purpose of securing full and unrestricted reciprocity of trade therewith.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD,

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Mr. Speaker, I am sure it is felt on both sides of the House that no question of more importance could engage its attention at the present time than that embodied in the resolution submitted by my hon. friend for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). It is a matter of deep regret that upon the present occasion above all others the hon. Minister of Finance is unable, through sickness, to take part in our deliberations. It would have been to those on this side of the House a great pleasure to have heard him in reply to the speech which was delivered by the mover of this resolution. Whether he would have taken the course that the gentleman who took his place adopted or not, I am not prepared to say; but his intimate knowledge of public affairs, his special knowledge of the wants of the Maritime Provinces of this Dominion, and the knowledge he has gained while acting as one of Her Majesty's plenipotentiaries in the late Fisheries conference, would, I am sure, have qualified him to have grappled with the very large and important question before us in a manner in which I may say, without any disrespect to the hon. gentleman opposite, he failed to grapple with it. Sir, the hon. gentleman who opened the debate opened it in a speech which I think is admitted on all sides to have been equal to the occasion. He recognised not only the importance but the gravity of the issues which were contained in the resolution he submitted, and I think it will be admitted that for power, ability and eloquence this House has seldom listened to a more able exposition of the commercial relations of Canada and other countries. I do not think that the hon. gentleman who replied to the hon. member for South Oxford did as fully appreciate the argument which had been advanced by the mover. It struck me that the hon. gentleman delivered a speech which had been prepared for a different occasion. He seemed to me for a long time to be barking up the wrong tree, he seemed, either wilfully or otherwise, not to have recognised the proposition submitted in the resolution, which is in writing and which seems to be very clear and unambiguous, and the hon. gentleman discussed at great length a proposition for commercial union and advanced certain objections to that proposition which to his mind seemed to be insuperable. I should like to know whether the hon. Minister of Finance, if he had been here, would have endorsed the line of argument taken by the hon. gentleman. I am not so sure that the Premier himself, before this debate is over, will be prepared thoroughly to endorse that line of argument. If he does he will have to go back upon his past record in some respects, to go back on it very seriously; and I am rather inclined to think that the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) went further, perhaps, than his brief warranted. He started out with the assertion that the resolution embodied a new panacea for the solution of Canada's difficulties. He endeavored to lead the House to believe that the advocacy of freer and better and larger commercial relations with the United States was a new plank in the platform of the Liberal party, forgetting that so long as that party has been a party the desire to obtain freer, better and wider commercial relations with the United States has been one of the principal planks in its platform. Why, he surely could not have remembered that when my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Mackenzie) was Premier, negotiations were entered into between his Government and that of the United States which resulted in a draft treaty being agreed to for enlarged commercial relations with that country, not confined to the natural products of the country, as the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) would like our treaties to be confined, but extending far and beyond that, and embracing in addition to our natural productions a large number of manufactured articles. Does he forget, too, that in the years 1884 and 1885 the Liberal party proposed in this House a resolution on each occasion, asking the endorsement of the House to the proposition that it was the duty of the Government for the time being to move in the direction of obtaining extended trade relations with the United States? Does he forget on that occasion, the last occasion, that the resolution declared that:

"In view of the early termination of the fisheries articles of the treaty of Washington, this House is of opinion the negotiations should be opened with the United States of America, as well as for the renewal of reciprocal privileges accorded by that treaty to American citizens and British subjects respectively, as for the opening up of additional reciprocal trade relations between Canada and the United States; and that in the conduct of negotiations, Canada should be directly represented."

In the face of these propositions how can the hon. gentleman have the hardihood to assert that the proposition now before the House, submitted by the hon. member for South Oxford, is a new proposition and affords a new panacea for the difficulties of Canada? The hon. gentleman referred at some length, at undue and unnecessary length I think, to the speech delivered by Mr. Blake at Malvern, a year ago, and he started out with a declaration that that speech did not lay down any platform such as that which we have embodied in the resolution here. But before the hon. member finished his quotation he was obliged to read the words, "that one of the planks in the platform of the Liberal party was to obtain reciprocal trade with the United States of America." The hon. gentleman objected that Mr. Blake, upon that occasion, did not enlarge upon that plank; did not treat his hearers to three or four pages of arguments in favor of it; but Mr. Blake was then laying down what the platform of the Liberal party was, and it would take, I think, even an abler and more eloquent gentleman than Mr. Blake to exhaust all the arguments in favor of the numerous propositions which he was advancing on behalf of the Liberal party and which he thought the country ought to accept. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman went further. He fairly glorified in the fact that on that occasion Mr. Blake admitted that such had been the extravagance of the Government which had charge of the administration of affairs in this country for the last eight or ten years, and such were the permanent heavy charges that they have added on to Canada, that the taxation and the expenditure which it was once able to reduce very much, now had to be kept up to a very much larger sum than they ought to be. He gloried in that fact, Sir. He, a Minister of the Crown, knew that the expenditure and the taxation had been increased by the political party to which he gave in his adhesion, and that he was one of those who had increased the taxation so enormously by a sum nearly up to $11,000,000, on account of enormous increased expenditure, bringing the affairs of this country to such a pass that the fixed expenditure was such that Mr. Blake was not able to promise as much reduction in the tariff as he would like to have promised. The hon. gentleman gloried in that state of affairs and said that this showed that the Reform party had gone back on their free trade principles. It shows nothing of the kind. The Reform party have not gone back on their desire for free trade principles, or on their desire to extend to Canada those free trade principles as far as it is possible to extend them. But the Reform party cannot ignore the fact that eight or ten years of reckless misgovernment and extravagance has launched this country into such a financial state that it was impossible to apply their free trade principles as fully and as freely and as strongly as they would like to do. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman, in his speech—which I may say was more remarkable for its omissions than for what it did contain—did not grapple or attempt to grapple with the statesmanlike propositions which had been advanced by my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). The hon. gentleman who proposed the motion did not seek to hide the fact that that new departure, if accepted, was surrounded with a great many difficulties. We know, Sir, that you cannot have a change to the large extent that is proposed here without a change in the commercial aspect of the affairs of this country. This, no doubt, would involve us in a great many difficulties; but, Sir, it is the duty of statesmen to meet those difficulties, and my hon. friend, I think, laid down the lines on which he would proceed, and he argued at great length, taking up each difficulty, one after the other, and showed how they could be met. I did not hear the hon. the Minister of Interior attempt to answer any of those arguments. I did not hear him reply to the facts upon which the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) based his proposition. Let me recall the attention of the House to a few of those facts. I will not detain the House very long, nor enlarge upon them. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) made the assertion here—with all the experience he had gained as a former Finance Minister and in connection with the responsible position which he holds as financial critic of this side of the House—that if the policy pursued by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) when in power had been pursued to this day, there would be at least a saving of $10,000,000 in the taxation of the country, and instead of the pitiful 40,000 people in Manitoba and the North-West, that country which we looked to a few years ago as the salvation almost of this Dominion, there would be at least half a million people there to-day. Did the Minister of Interior attempt to deny any one of those propositions? He did not. A reference to the Public Accounts will show that to-day the taxation of this country is eleven or twelve million dollars more than it was when Mr. Mackenzie went out of power, and the hon. gentleman knows by the returns which he and his colleagues have brought down that, so far from being one tithe or one-twentieth of the number of people in the North-West that they predicted there would be there, there is a pitiful 40,000 of an increase in population since Mr. Mackenzie went out of power. That proposition was one deserving of serious attention. If the proposition is based on truth it requires an answer, if it is true and the remedy which the hon. gentleman proposes under the circumstances which now exist is not a correct one, the hon. the Minister of the Interior himself ought to have proposed some other remedy. But what is the remedy he proposed? And after a two-hours' speech he has no remedy at all. The policy of increasing taxation and extravagance is to go on year after year until, Sir, in the near future, when the people's backs can bear the burden no longer, some constitutional or unconstitutional change must take place to give them relief. Then, Sir, there was another statement of fact which the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) brought to the notice of the House. He had mentioned it before, but it is an important fact and will bear repetition again. It was that between 1881 and 1886, while we had spent $2,000,000 in bringing emigrants into this country, and while we have brought 477,000 emigrants here, there were but 25,000 of those settlers in the North-West and Manitoba, and that 452,000 of the immigrants brought into this country, at a very large expense to the public exchequer, had left this country after they came here. Why did they leave? The hon. gentleman knows, and his colleagues know, that those emigrants came to a country as fine as the sun shines upon. Whether you go to the Maritime Provinces, possessing the richest fisheries in the world, mines which cannot be surpassed in any part of the world, I believe, agricultural lands capable of feeding thousands and thousands and hundreds of thousands more people than at present occupy them, whether he goes to the fertile region of Ontario, or the great, rich plains of the North-West, he must see that in Canada we have natural advantages which cannot be surpassed by any country on this side of the Atlantic. And when he was asked to say why the hundreds of thousands of people brought here at the public expense, after they had come and surveyed the land, had left the country and joined a foreign power, the hon. gentleman was silent and passed it by in silence. Perhaps he was discreet, Sir, perhaps he would have to acknowledge that the extravagance and the taxation which now bears so heavily on the people of this country had frightened them away; and the only answer he could give was the pitiful, childish answer that those immigrants—whom I will undertake to say not one in a thousand has ever read a political speech—were frightened out of the country through remarks made from hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. Sir, it is true that the Government, some years ago, when they paid a large sum of money for some wonderful books to circulate among the emigrants who came into this country, circulated books printed in English among Germans and people of other nationalities who could not speak the English language. I do not think, Sir, that they ever took the trouble to submit to any of those foreign emigrants, the speeches of my hon. friend, which was said to be so lugubrious, amongst people whom I undertake to say could not read English at all. What took them away? Was it because the country was not as good a country as they were led to believe? The hon. gentleman knows it is not so. It was not because our country did not possess the advantages which they expected to find when they came here; but it was because the country has been cursed with an extravagant, and I will say it, a corrupt Government—a Government that has not sought primarily to develop the North-West so much as it has sought to maintain itself in power and to line the pockets of its hangers-on. The hon. gentleman, Sir, did not grapple with the statement made with reference to the debt and taxation of this country as compared with the debt and taxation of the country south of us. We know that if immigrants come to this country, whether the hard-headed Scotch from Scotland, or shrewd canny Irish or English people, and begin to compare its advantages with those of the neighboring country, they will at once see that Canada possesses a great many natural advantages over the United States; but, Sir, if they find that while we have been rolling up our debt and taxation at a rate unparalleled in the history of any British colony, the people to the south have been reducing theirs in an inverse ratio, I think those shrewd people will say, We prefer going to the country that is reducing its expenditure and taxation rather than to a new country which is rolling up both at the rate Canada is. We learn that, twenty years ago, our debt per head was not one-third of the debt per head of the United States, whereas to-day it is two and a-half times as great, and that at the same period our necessary taxation was one-third that of the United States, whereas to-day it is 50 per cent. higher than theirs. If these are facts, and if the hon. member for South Oxford overstated them in any way, then it was the duty of the hon. gentleman who replied to him to give any answer that could be given. But the hon. gentleman gave no answer because he knew he could not give it; he gave no answer because he could not question the accuracy of the facts stated. Now, Sir, the hon. member for South Oxford stated as a reason why we should seek to extend our commercial relations with other countries, that we had attempted to build up a large inter-provincial trade, and that this attempt, although it may have been conceived with the best motives, had not been successful. He stated why, but he did not give all the reasons. We have built an

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

Intercolonial Railway at a cost of nearly $50,000,000; we have tried to build up an inter-provincial commerce between the Maritime Provinces and Ontario, and between Ontario and the great West, and yet, after spending many millions of dollars, our attempt has been a comparative failure; and why? For one reason, that the circumstances of the different Provinces are such that there never can be a very large inter-provincial trade between them. The natural market of the group of Provinces, known as the Maritime Provinces, lies to the south of them in the New England States; and you may attempt to fight against geography, you may build all the railroads you like, but the results of a practical experience of twenty years have shown that while you may dam back the trade a little, and prevent the people of the Maritime Provinces from trading with the people with whom they ought to have natural trade relations, you cannot force their trade into an unnatural channel. Have you done so? What trade is there to-day between the Maritime Provinces and the upper Provinces of the Dominion? How much oats, how much fish, how much of any of the natural products of the soil or of the mine, do we send you? You carry the products of the mine almost for nothing over the Intercolonial railway, in order to force this trade, to such an extent that your Intercolonial railway at the present time is sinking, outside of interest, $300,000 or $400,000 a year, and you have nothing to carry which will make any return upon the annual cost of the railway. Then, Sir, the hon. gentlemen say, in reply to the statement, that the people are leaving the Maritime Provinces in large numbers every year. Oh, yes, but the people are going west. Well, Sir, we had the statement made yesterday that this is not the fact. The census returns are examined, and we find that there are, practically speaking, none of the Maritime people in the Province of Ontario, or in the Province of Quebec, and a very few in the Province of Manitoba. Where have they gone, then? To a country which hon. gentlemen term a foreign country—to the United States of America; and while the exodus from the eastern part of British North America to the west has been perfectly natural, the people who leave the New England States go to the western states and remain in their own country; but in Canada, owing to the want of the freer trade relations that we ought to possess, our people are driven, not to our own western prairies, where they might and would go, but to the south of the line. Do you suppose if the people of Manitoba and the North-West Territories had not been hampered as they have been with the unnatural trade restrictions which you have placed upon them to prevent them dealing with those who are their natural neighbors, and who are prepared to deal with them—to buy what they have to sell and to sell to them what they want to buy—do you suppose the country would not have been filled up with the hardy yeomen of the Maritime Provinces who have gone west during the past few years. These men do not leave British North America because they are disloyal to the flag. They are loyal to the flag, and they would prefer to live in Canada under their Sovereign if they were allowed to remain; but in order to build up monopolies, to create rich colonisation companies, to fill the pockets of political favorites, to make rich a few favorite manufacturers who contribute to their election funds—in order to do this, you place a damper on the trade relations that ought to exist between this country and the United States; and the result is that those people, not being able to find a place in this country where they could farm successfully and live, are driven across the border. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman did not grapple with one of those statements more than that. This is a very large question, and there are very many points which a gentleman speaking on the Government side might be pardon ed for overlooking; but there was a point mentioned by the hon. member for South Oxford which I think ought to have challenged a moment's attention from the hon. member for Cardwell. Why, Sir, he mentioned a fact, which has been repeated to-day, that over $800,000,000 has been locked up in railroads in this country. We have spent money with a lavish hand—public monies which we have voted, and private monies which have been invested—in railway enterprises in this country; and all for what? To give us better means of communication, for carrying away the surplus products of the land; and after you have built your railways at such an enormous cost, you place a barrier at the border so that the trade may not be carried to the people who want to buy it. A more insane policy was never conceived. What has the hon. gentleman to say in reply to the natural demand which has gone up from every section of this country—from the farmers, the fishermen, the miners and all the producing classes of the country—for freer trade relations. The answer of the hon. gentleman to-day is the answer he gave this House and this country when I had the honor of first sitting in this House some years ago. But he says we have placed our policy on the Statute-book; the people know, he says, we have made a statutory offer of exchange in natural products with the United States. Why, we know that statutory offer is a farce, and the hon. gentleman knows it was a farce and a blind from the day it was made. How many years has it been on the Statute-book? It has been there ever since the introduction of the National Policy. Has it ever evoked a responsive offer from the other side of the line? Never. The hon. gentleman talks of our offer to export to the United States all our natural products in return for the privilege of purchasing all their natural products. And what do we ever purchase of their products? Outside of the article of Indian corn, we purchase scarcely anything at all. The hon. gentleman knows, and his Government know, that they are merely playing with this question when they tell the people they are willing to establish unrestricted reciprocity in the natural products of the two countries. I say there is no reciprocity in that offer. The hon. gentleman evaded the principle set down in the resolution; he set up a man of straw and then proceeded to knock him down. He discussed the question of commercial union at very great length. I was not aware that the question of commercial union was embodied in this resolution before the House. That question may come up for discussion in this House, and the speech which the hon. gentleman fired off at half-cock may then be appropriate, but it was utterly irrelevant on this occasion, and no answer to the proposition laid down or the arguments advanced in support of that proposition by my hon. friend for South Oxford. The policy of the Liberal party, the policy agreed upon and formulated by the hon. member for South Oxford, is contained in that resolution, and that is not the policy advocated at present by Mr. Erastus Wiman and which the hon. gentleman took such pains to answer yesterday. The policy of Mr. Wiman is not that policy which is propounded here, and the hon. gentleman therefore wasted, in discussing it, a large part of the time of this House that he might profitably have employed in answering the arguments submitted on this side, were he able to do so. He declared that the resolution implied and involved the raising of our tariff as high as that of the United States. When and where did he learn that? It is not in the resolution; it was not declared to be his policy by the hon. gentleman who moved the resolution; it cannot be deduced from anything contained in that resolution. It is not the fact. The policy of unrestricted reciprocity does not imply at all that the tariff of this country, as against the world, shall be raised up to the tariff of the United States. The tariff of this country, if unrestricted reciprocity were carried to-morrow, would be just as this Parliament, which would retain supreme control over it, would choose to adopt. Therefore, when the hon. gentleman started out on his argument with the statement that unrestricted reciprocity involved the assimilation of our tariff with that of the United States, he made a statement which neither the resolution nor the argument advanced in support of the resolution justified. Then the hon. gentleman stated further that this proposition was going to destroy the trade of the St. Lawrence. Why will it destroy the trade of the St. Lawrence? If our tariff remains as it is to-day and the tariff of the United States remains as it is to-day, will not the trade, not only of Canada but the trade of the great western country belonging to the United States, naturally flow by the St. Lawrence. Will not the productions of that great western country flow from there down the St. Lawrence? What will restrict it? What will hamper it? Is not the St. Lawrence the natural channel which Providence intended for the trade of that great western country. The hon. gentleman well knows it is, and therefore to make the bald assertion, without a single vestige of proof to support it, that our proposition will have the effect of destroying the trade of the St. Lawrence, is utterly absurd. But the hon. gentleman stated that we were a happy country, and that if there was one part of the National Policy of which he was more proud than another, it was that which related to the incidents of taxation. In this country, he said, under this unrestricted reciprocity policy, there must be direct taxation. That was also a bugbear of the hon. gentleman's own imagination; that was also a man of straw of his own making. That does not at all necessarily follow our proposition. It was not propounded as part of the policy necessarily by my hon. friend from South Huron. And it does not follow it must necessarily take place. But, he says, if there was one part of the policy he approved of, it was that part of the National Policy by which the incidents of taxation bear almost entirely upon the rich and not upon the poor. Why, the hon. gentleman knows—no man knows better—that the evil underlying the National Policy is that it bears more heavily upon the poor than upon the rich man. The specific duties upon articles imported bear more heavily upon the coarse articles consumed by the poor than upon the fine articles consumed by the rich. If the hon. gentleman will take the articles which enter into the necessary consumption of the ordinary workingman, say a man whose income amounts to $400 per year, and making first allowance for clothing, boots and shoes, he will find that for sugar, for groceries, for crockery and the little miscellaneous articles alone, the workingman, whose income is $400, pays not less than $35 to the revenue upon it.

Mr. BERGIN. Name the articles.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Let the hon. gentleman take the articles, and he will find it is true. When a poor man pays at that rate on the necessities of life, for an hon. Minister of the experience of the hon. member for Cardwell to stand up in this House and say that a poor man's taxation is practically nil, is to insult the intelligence of this House and the country. But there is more than that. If the National Policy was intended to have, and if it has any effect at all, it should operate to exclude from this country those manufactures which, the hon. gentleman said, can be made in it. Therefore, the poor man, if he does not practically pay to the exchequer, pays into the pockets of the manufacturers, and the latter have taken the best possible means of establishing that he shall pay to the uttermost farthing. We hear of combines made in every branch of manufacture which is protected by this National Policy. To-day we have these manufacturers combining in all branches of trade—for what? To mulct the poor man still more. But the hon. gentleman reached the climax when he came to speak with reference to what he called the doleful wail set up by the hon. member for South Oxford. It appears to me that these hon. gentlemen, or a few of them, believe it is the duty of a representative of the people to hide and cover up the truth. I contend, on the contrary, that it is the duty of a representative of the people to discover the truth, to discover the grievance, in order that he may discover the remedy for the grievance, and I say that he is no loyal man to the people or to the country who desires to hide the grievances or the evils under which the country labors. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) pointed out that for the last few years there had been a wonderful depression in the agricultural interests of this country; that in this young country, whose agricultural prosperity ought to proceed, not by slow degrees but by leaps and bounds as it did years ago, the agricultural industry appeared now to be stricken by paralysis, and that stagnation appeared to be the order of the day; that, while a few years ago our agricultural population were able to hold their own to a marvellous degree, to-day the wheels of progress have been turned aside and we are retrograding rather than progressing. The hon. member, for Cardwell (Mr. White) replied to the hon. member, and, with that jaunty air which he assumes when he wants the House to imagine that he knows everything on every subject, he said the House need not be alarmed, that all this was wrong, and this new Daniel who had come to judgment said he had in his hands the proof of the position he took. He said that if there was one thing which he admitted, it was the statistics prepared by his friend, Mr. Blue, of Ontario, and he commended the enterprise of the Ontario Government in the preparation of those statistics, and he said, I am going to destroy the Goliath of the other side with a single stone from my sling. I, the young David of the House. How did he do that? He asked us to place, as he said he was prepared to place, the most implicit confidence in the statistics of Mr. Blue. He told us that they showed it was not true that Canada was not progressing, and that he would show from those statistics that, during a certain number of years which he mentioned, the agricultural wealth of Ontario had developed, and he rolled it under his tongue as a sweet morsel, to the extent of some thirty millions of dollars, and he asked us to fall down and worship the statement he had set up. The hon. gentleman has acquired, perhaps from his having been a writer upon the daily press, a habit of jumping too hastily to too hastily formed conclusions. He takes a bird's-eye view of certain statistics in the same way as he would if he were writing an article for the Montreal Gazette. But let us take the very statistics the hon. gentleman has referred to. I am prepared for the nonce to assume that they are accurate, and that they point out correctly the relative increase in the agricultural wealth of the Province of Ontario during the time when my hon. friend from East York presided over the destinies of this country, and when the policy promoted by him and the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) was in force, and I am willing to compare that with the time during which the Government of which the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), who has his panacea for all the evils of the country, has been in power. What do I find by this blue book which he vouches for?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yellow book.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Yellow book, if you like. What do I find from this yellow book? What do I find as the result of the stone which he has slung to destroy the effect of the Goliath opposite to him? We find that in the year 1873, when the member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) took charge of the administration of affairs in this country, the average value of real estate in Ontario amounted to $10.02 per acre. I ask, as a favor, the attention of my hon.

Mr DAVIES (P.E.I.)

friend the member for Cardwell to this statement. In the year 1873 the average acreable value of land in the rural district of Ontario was $10.02 per acre. I find that under the system of economy and prudence in the management of affairs, and keeping down the taxes of the country, and developing the resources of the country, on the part of the Government of that day, the value of real estate in the country districts rose until, in 1878, it had reached the enormous sum of $18.14 per acre. Does the hon. gentleman know what that means? It means that in that period of time, about five years, the increase in value of the rural lands in the Province of Ontario amounted to $160,000,000. There are about 120,000,000 acres of land in Ontario, and, according to the statements contained in this book to which the hon. gentleman gives his adhesion, the increase has been that which I have stated, which cannot be paralleled in the history of any country on this side of the Atlantic. It is a record of which the Government of Ontario ought to be proud, and of which any Government which had the direction of the affairs of the country would have a right to be proud. Then we had the National Policy brought into operation, putting taxes on all the consumers. While the value was $18.14 per acre in 1878, nearly eight years go by, and in 1885, the last year I find recorded in this book which the hon. gentleman presents to the House as being undoubtedly true, I find that the acreable value had only gone up to $19.71, or an increase per acre of $1.57 in the seven years as against an increase of $8.12 per acre in the previous five years. There you see that $1.57 per acre represents the wonderful increase of $30,000,000 that the hon. gentleman speaks of, while $160,000,000 of increase took place in the five years when Mr. Mackenzie was in power. The hon. gentleman could take his pencil and see how much the ratio per cent. under the old régime was over the increase under the National Policy. I think it is just about 700 per cent., or that as nearly as possible. I have not a blackboard on which to make the calculation accurately, but if I am wrong he can correct it. I say that, in that statement, I have given an answer to the hour-and-a-half speech of the hon. gentleman. The statements which have been made from time to time by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House as to the lamentable fact that progress has been stayed by this policy in the greatest Province in this Dominion, are proved by the figures for the accuracy of which he himself has vouched; but, if that is the case in the Province of Ontario, it is ten times more the case in the Province, or in the part of the Dominion from which I come. Go back to 1873 or to a few years before that, and, although we have no statistics which reduce it to a certainty of mathematical accuracy as we have here, I will appeal to the knowledge of fact of every man from the Province from which I come and from the Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and what do they tell you? What will they tell you? Will they tell you that the agricultural interests have become wealthy during the past eight or nine years under the aegis and protection of the National Policy? Oh no! Our agricultural industry is depressed, our farmers are living without hope; our young men, the bone and sinew of the country—

An hon. MEMBER. No, no.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. gentleman who says "no" must be speaking without any practical knowledge whatever. I think he comes from the Province of Nova Scotia. I can take him through county after county of Cape Breton from which the young men have fled, as from a plague, almost. I can take him to the Province of Prince Edward Island, and he will go through large districts where the young men, who ought to have remained at home to till the soil, and enrich the community, and make new homes for themselves, have abandoned that land and gone off to the United States; and I tell the hon. gentleman, that if it had not been for the returns which these young men make yearly to their parents and their friends, the sad tale, as it stands to-day, would be ten times worse. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman wanted to show, to confirm his argument, that things are not so bad in Ontario as gentlemen on this side of the House have stated. I am not acquainted, personally, with the facts in Ontario, the actual condition of affairs, but I am acquainted with them in the Maritime Provinces. I give you my version; the deductions I draw from what I have seen, and know, and felt, and I give you from the blue book the truth of what takes place there. The hon. gentleman says: "I will prove to you, from figures from the United States, that the farmers are much more heavily mortgaged there than they are in Ontario; that the condition of the Ontario farmer, in respect to mortgages, is not half so bad as in some parts of the United States; that the exodus from Ontario is not so bad as it is from some of the States." How does he do it? The hon. gentleman takes the loan companies of Ontario and the lists of their mortgages, and he assumes that they form a fair statement of the mortgage debt upon the farms of Ontario. Well, I am informed by those who are conversant with the facts, that in a number of the largest counties of Ontario, the company's mortgage list does not show one-tenth of the mortgages that really exist upon the farms of the country. But with what does the hon. gentleman compare the great Province of Ontario? He takes the State of Vermont and the State of New Hampshire, and one or two other States, that do not possess one-tenth of the fertility, that do not possess one-tenth of the natural resources of the great and rich Province of Ontario—not one-hundredth, as an hon. friend beside me says—the sterile, rocky districts of Vermont and New Hampshire, and he says that they have only progressed in a certain ratio, and if Ontario has kept up, she ought to be satisfied. Sir, is that the way for an hon. gentleman to talk who wants to hold up his country properly in the eyes of the world? He could not use more depreciatory language than to compare the progress of Vermont and New Hampshire, in the same ratio, with the progress of Ontario, or even of the Maritime Provinces, if those Provinces had any thing like fair play. The natural resources of those States are not one-twentieth as great; and therefore while it is perfectly natural that young men should go from the rocks and the poor soil of Vermont and New Hampshire, to the richer soil of the western country, it is unnatural, and it is wrong, and it is owing to man's bad fiscal regulations, that the young men are driven from Ontario. What is natural in one case is artificial and unnatural in the other. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have referred to the hon. gentleman's speech at greater length, perhaps, than its importance justifies; but I think I have been enabled to show that one or two, at any rate, of his main propositions are utterly untenable. Now, I want to call the attention of the House for a very short time to the record of the Trade and Navigation Returns of this country, to ascertain whether the people should be satisfied with the continuance of the existing state of affairs. Is it true, or is it not true, that the people are satisfied? Is it true, or is it not true, that the people of the Maritime Provinces, or the people of Quebec, or the people of Ontario, or the people of the North-West, are satisfied that the present state of affairs should continue? The hon. member for Cardwell says they are. He says, I have nothing to offer you, we must go on as we are going, doubling the taxation, doubling the expenditure in so many years. We must depend on our own resources, and keep the present Government in power, and adopt no new-fangled schemes for the relief of the great mass of the people. There are just one or two prominent facts that I want to notice. I am aware they have been noticed before, but they are so important, in my opinion, that they will bear repeating. Sir, we were told a few years ago that there were few countries on the face of the globe that were increasing in prosperity in the same ratio as Canada; we were told that the best index to that increase of prosperity was to be found in our navigation returns; that a country which from year to year added tens of thousands to its exports, and consequently tens of thousands to its wealth, was an improving country, a country that would afford a welcome asylum to the over-taxed and over-burdened people of other parts of the world. Sir, it is true that for years and years the export trade of Canada did increase largely, did go up by leaps and bounds, but what do we find to-day under the blighting influence of the National Policy? We find, Sir, that while, in the year 1873, the exports of this country reached the sum of $89,789,000, in the year 1887 ought we not to look for an increase away beyond the hundreds? On the contrary, we find that the export trade has remained stationary, hardly a dollar of increase in the surplus exports of our products—89 millions in 1873, and 89 millions only in 1887. I say that fact, bold and bald as it is, ought to open our eyes, and call for more serious treatment than it has received at the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite. It shows us that our affairs are not in the satisfactory condition, they would lead us to believe. It shows us we must find some remedy other than that we now possess. What have we been doing during all this time? Why have we reason to expect that our surplus products for export should be largely increased? Not only because of the richness of our soil, not only because of the inexhaustible nature of our fisheries and our mines and our forests, but because we have been borrowing for a number of years past largely in the money markets of the world and bringing millions of dollars here and spending them in developing the resources of the country. This policy of rapid construction of railways, of rapid construction of public works, and the expenditure of millions of borrowed money, has gone on from year to year, and it has circulated an enormous amount of money among the people and has created in some places an apparent prosperity. But this expenditure is about ceasing now. I think the more prudent on the Government side have long ago come to the conclusion that we cannot go on borrowing forever, unless we can show that our wealth is increasing in such a degree as to justify us in believing we will be able to bear equally the burdens which increased borrowing places upon us. Let us look at our great wealth producing interests and see how we can develop and promote them. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) stated, in his address yesterday, that we should not be so concerned about foreign markets. He said: You must remember that after all is said and done, the home market is the great market for the people; he said that while the whole exports reached $400,000,000—I think those are the correct figures, although I am only speaking from memory—only about 10 per cent. of the products were exported. Assuming his statement to be true, does it at all follow from it that the foreign market which purchases the ten millions or forty millions of surplus products we export is not of vital importance to us? Why, the hon. gentleman ought to know, the hon. gentleman does know, I venture to say—if he does not he has not learned one of the elementary principles of political economy—that it is the foreign market which controls the price we get for our products. Sir, if you want to know the price of oats or wheat or any of the products, a surplus of which we send abroad, you must look at the foreign markets which determine the price. It is the English market that determines the price of oats and the price of wheat, and, in fact, it is the market abroad which receives the surplus that determines the price of our products. The hon. gentleman knows that, and therefore, the price we obtain for the surplus of our products we export depends on the foreign market. The quantity we keep at home and sell in the home market is regulated entirely by the price we get abroad, and the price we get abroad is, therefore, of vital importance. Now, let us compare the exports of to-day; and what do we find them to be? We find that out of total exports of $80,000,000 from this country there were $3,805,000 products of the soil, $6,875,000 of the fisheries, $20,484,000 of the forest, $24,247,000 animals and their products, $3,000,000 odd for manufactures, and $644,000 for miscellaneous, which, together with some other items, makes a total of $80,000,000. What fact does this convey to any thinking man? Compare the wonderful amount of exports of surplus products from the farm, from the forest, from the fisheries and from the mines, with the tawdry and paltry amount of manufactures we export, and then you can judge of the real relative importance of those industries to our people. A paltry $3,000,000 worth of manufactures are exported from Canada, a sum less by hundreds of thousands than we exported from the country before the National Policy ever was introduced; and yet we are asked to sacrifice the interests of the people, who produce and export $75,000,000 worth of products, in order to bolster and build up and make wealthy that class which exported $3,000,000 worth. I hold that the farming community and those interested in the lumber interest, and the other interests I have mentioned, deserve more serious attention at the hands of this Parliament than the handful of people who are engaged in manufactures here, of which they export only $3,000,000 worth. We cannot consume these products. Those $80,000,000 worth of products we export we cannot consume here, that is evident. We must have a market for those products. You have developed as far as you can our trade by building the Intercolonial and other railways. You have endeavoured to force on the Maritime Provinces as much of the surplus products as you can. You have forced upon the Province of Quebec all the coal from the Maritime Provinces you can force by carrying it almost for nothing. You have forced trade wherever possible, and after all is said and done you have $77,000,000 worth of the products of the mine, forest, land and sea to export abroad. Now, where does it go? We find there are two great countries which consume it all. We can almost put out of sight, in considering this question, those other countries of the world which, a few years ago, some of the statesmen supposed would become great purchasers of our surplus products. We find that Great Britain took $38,000,000 of our surplus products, and the United States took $35,000,000 worth. So, then, it is to those two countries that we must look for the sale of those products. Let us analyse just a little further those surplus products and find where they go. We find that of the products of the mine, of the value of $3,800,000, the United States took over $3,000,000 worth. It is true you have restricted the trade as much as possible. It is true that by building up barriers on this side and maintaining barriers on that, the statesmen of both countries have prevented the trade from reaching one-half of what it might have been; but even to-day, with all the restrictions, with all that men can do to stop the flow of traffic between the two countries, the surplus products of the mine are practically purchased by our neighbors in the great American Republic. So it is with regard to our fisheries. Of a total value of $6,806,000 exported, the United States took nearly $3,000,000 worth; and be it remembered that is the only market to which we are able to send those $3,000,000 worth of products. We have no other market in the world for our mackerel except the United States, and we have no other market for our fresh fish. That is our market and our sole market, and it is well known to all who have studied the question, that you are hampering and destroying, as far as it is in the power of man to do, those great industries to which I have referred, by unnatural restrictions. Why, Sir, of the exports of our forests the United States takes $9,000,000; of animals and their products, $7,291,000; agricultural products outside of that, $7,966,248; and manufactures, $1,250,000. Therefore, without wearying the House and going into some details,—details which have been given by my hon. friend, but which I have looked up and which are unnecessary to repeat:—we find, Sir, that to the south of us lies one country which, next to Great Britain, takes all the surplus products we have to sell. Now, Sir, the question is whether it is desirable or whether it is not desirable that we should remove all artificial barriers which intercept all the freest interchange of the surplus products of this country with the surplus products of the country south of us. What would be the effect if we did this? Why, Sir, the effects of the old reciprocity treaty, all confined as they were to natural products, have never been forgotten by the people of the Maritime Provinces. I do not know whether they were as profitable to the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) Well, then, if they were, the people of Quebec and Ontario must have as warm a heart for the return of those good old times as we have in the Maritime Provinces. It is true that under that old reciprocity treaty, to which I wish to call attention, that the amount of profits and benefits, and advantages were not confined to the Dominion of Canada. I do not claim that we possessed greater advantages under it than the United States. I mean to say that under the treaty the United States benefitted largely, and I mean to say that the figures show that, so far as the balance of trade is concerned, it points to the fact that the balance of trade was largely in their favor. We bought some from them and they bought from us during the period the reciprocity treaty was in force. And, Sir, I would just call the attention of the House for a few moments to the marvellous strides which the trade of this country received at the time when the annual products of both countries were allowed to flow free between the Dominion of Canada and the nation to the south of us. I find, Sir, on looking up the returns, that before the reciprocity treaty came into force the entire traffic between Canada and the United States was very small. In 1845 it was $8,000,000, in 1846 $9,000,000, in 1847 it increased to $10,000,000, in 1848 to $12,000,000, in 1850 to $15,000,000, and in 1851 to $18,000,000—slow, up-hill progress, but all the progress that could be made under the system of government and under the restrictions to trade which then existed. I find that in the year last before the reciprocity treaty, 1853, that the entire trade between the Provinces that now comprise the Dominion of Canada and the United States of America was $20,000,000. I find, Sir, the first year after that treaty took place that the trade bounded up from $20,000,000 to $33,000,000, that two years afterwards it had gone up to $42,000,000, that two years after that, in 1857, to $46,000,000, in 1859 it had gone up to $48,000,000, in 1863 to $55,000,000, in 1864 to $67,000,000, in 1865 to $71,000,000, and in 1866 it had reached the tremendous figures of $84,000,000. There is no stop, there is no halt. The producing power of this country was tested to its utmost and it was equal to the demand made upon it; and our fishermen, our farmers, and our lumbermen poured out their surplus products to the American market, and wealth rolled back upon them. I see opposite to me men who know the truth of what I am speaking. I would recall their attention to the time when in every creek in the Maritime Provinces the smaller vessels came there laden with the products we required from the farms and the looms of the United States and returned again with everything that our farmers, from their surplus products, had to sell. We had not one article to sell which they were not willing to buy, and to buy at a profitable rate. Wealth rolled in upon the country, as can be seen from the figures which the total trade returns of the country shows during that time. What has been the consequence since, Sir? During that period of time the figures are large, the total interchange of traffic between the Dominion of Canada and the United States reached the immense and unparalleled figures of $670,000,000. It is almost inconceivable—an amount which one can hardly grasp—but such are the facts as shown by the trade and navigation returns, and what was it that we purchased from the United States during that time? We purchased $150,000,000 worth of farm products, $3,500,000 worth of timber, $21,000,000 worth miscellaneous goods and $151,000,000 worth of general merchandise. We purchased it because it was for our advantage to purchase it, and we would not have purchased it unless it were so. We made money by the purchase, and we made money by the sale to the people of the United States of the millions of dollars I have mentioned bringing back those millions in return. What is the consequence of the repeal of that treaty? It had no sooner been repealed than the traffic fell from $84,000,000 to $57,000,000, a falling off in one year of nearly $30,000,000. In the year following it was $56,000,000. In 1869, two years afterwards, it remained at $56,000,000. It struggled up and ascended steadily from that time until in the year 1878 it reached $89,000,000, but to-day, Sir, we find it has gone back again to $82,000,000. We find that during the period of the reciprocity treaty, that not only by the personal experience which every gentleman who remembers can bring to bear upon it, but by the statistics contained in our blue books as well, that it is proved beyond a doubt that the period of the reciprocity treaty was a period of unparalleled prosperity for Canada, whilst at the same time it was a period during which the United States reaped great gain from traffic with us. It was not a one-sided treaty. As hon. gentlemen opposite say, we are not going as beggars to the United States, we are not a poor country, we are a great country with great capabilities.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Yes, hon. gentlemen opposite sometimes think that they possess all the loyalty and all the love of country on their side of the House. I can tell them that we are as proud of our country and have as great a knowledge of its capabilities as they have, but we want to make it a country fit for us to live in ourselves and for our sons afterwards. We want to see its capabilities developed and not dwarfed by the politicians of the country; we want to see the restrictions upon that development removed; we want to see the trade of the country untrammelled; we do not want to see the whole interests of this great and growing Dominion sacrificed to the interests of a few who have put their money in the manufactures of the country. Do you say in answer to that, as the hon. gentleman said yesterday, "I am perfectly willing that there should be a return to that old system." I dare say you may be, I dare that you are, but the hon. gentleman knows that it is baying the moon. He has eight or ten years' experience of his offer, and he knows it will never be granted. I have already dwelt on that question. He knows he may keep the statutory offer there for ever and it will evoke no response from the people of the United States, because it is not, and we have no hesitation in saying it is not, a fair offer of reciprocal trade. It is asking too much from them and giving too little from us. The hon. gentleman introduced the National Policy in this country. He boasts that it received the endorsement of the majority of the people of this country.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Yes, "hear, hear," says my hon. friend; does he know why?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I will tell him why. Does he know the ground upon which the people of the Maritime Provinces were asked, by the man who possesses as much power in the Government, if not more, than its chief, to adopt that policy? Do you think of the trade which came to the Maritime Provinces eight years ago? The hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) got a rebuke yesterday which I think he had better take to heart. I will repeat the question, and, before he laughs, he had better hear what I say. I was going to ask, does he dare to think that a people trained up in the principle of free trade as the people of the Maritime Provinces have been, a people knowing and believing in the benefits of free trade, could be got to listen to a proposal to reverse the system under which they had grown prosperous and introduce a protective system alone because it was protective? No, you could not; you would not have polled a corporal's guard. But you came to them under false pretences; you said to them, We ask you to adopt the National Policy—in order that it may give benefits to you? Not at all. Did you try to prove that it would be in itself a benefit? No, but you told them it would be a means of obtaining that which you are all striving for—it would be a means of obtaining reciprocal trade with the United States. That is why you carried your National Policy in 1878. You carried it under false pretences. Sir Charles Tupper came to the city of Charlottetown, which I have now the honor to represent, and in the most emphatic terms pledged his word that what he was seeking was not an increase of taxation to build up manufactures, but it was to obtain that which was the greatest blessing the Maritime Provinces would ever have—it was to obtain reciprocity, and that was the only way they could get it. The people took him at his word, they voted for the National Policy, and they were sold; and to-day they are farther off from reciprocity than ever.) The less the hon. gentleman says about the election the better. We know how it was carried. Take the Province where they did not spend money, where they did not pour it out in bribery—take the Province from which I come, and what is your answer? What was the issue on which my hon. friend and myself appealed to the people of that Province? The issue was reciprocity with the United States and the best means to obtain it; and we appealed to them to return a party to power who were in sympathy with that policy, and who were determined to do all that lay in their power to obtain it, and the people answered by sending a unanimous delegation for that purpose. It is true, Sir, in some of the other Provinces where you poured out the Government money like water, where you bought the people with their own money, the results were not the same as with us; but you know that if you had not made the promises with regard to railways in the adjoining Province of Nova Scotia, if you had not poured out the money as you did for the construction of public works, you would hardly have had a corporal's guard to back up the hon. Finance Minister. His own personal qualities and his long public life might possibly have insured his return, but I doubt that he would have had a corporal's guard to back him in the House. Why do I believe it? Because the interests of the people of Nova Scotia are identical with those of the people of Prince Edward Island, and the untrammelled vote in the one Province shows what the untrammelled vote would have been in the other.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. What a corrupt lot the people must be to be bought up in this way.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, our Public Accounts show it. Why, they offered themselves to us, but Mr. Blake was too honest to buy them.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Now, we are not singular—it would be unnatural if we were—in feeling and predicting the great benefits which would accrue to this country from reciprocal trade with the United States. I do not know what the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government may say to-day; I do not know what his views are now; but I know, Sir, that he shares the general belief that the repeal of the Reciprocity Treaty was a great calamity to this country. In 1865, when he was negotiating for a renewal of that treaty, he put into a State document which he forwarded to the English Government a declaration of his own that the repeal of that treaty was a great calamity to Canada; and he went further—further, I think, than was necessary. He almost warned the British Government that unless that treaty was renewed in some form or other the loyalty of the people might be undermined. The hon. gentleman said at that time in a Minute of Council:

“Under the beneficent operation of the system of self-government which the later policy of the mother country has accorded to Canada, in common with the other colonies possessing representative institutions, combined with the advantages secured by the Reciprocity Treaty, of an unrestricted commerce with our nearest neighbors in the natural productions of the two countries, all agitation for organic changes has ceased, all dissatisfaction with the existing political relations of the provinces has wholly disappeared.”

There had been dissatisfaction among some of those politically associated with the right hon. gentleman until we obtained access to our natural markets in the United States; but the dissatisfaction, he says, has ceased.

“Although the Commissioners would grossly misrepresent their countrymen if they were to affirm that their loyalty to their Sovereign would be diminished in the slightest degree by the withdrawal, through the unfriendly action of a foreign Government, of mere commercial privileges, however valuable these might be deemed; they think they cannot err in directing the attention of the enlightened statesmen who wield the destinies of the great Empire, of which it is the proudest boast of Canadians that their country forms a part, to the connection which is usually found to exist between the material prosperity and the political contentment of a people, for in doing so they feel that they are appealing to the highest motives that can actuate patriotic statesmen—the desire to perpetuate a Dominion founded on the affectionate allegiance of a prosperous and contented people.”

Statesmanlike words, those, Sir! The hon. gentleman tells the Home Government: I do not want to say that our loyalty depends altogether upon our obtaining and maintaining free commercial relations with the people of the United States, but such is always the case, and unless the people are contented, and unless the people are prosperous, you may look out for some disloyalty. He warns the British Government that unless some steps are taken the loyalty of the people will be undermined. And the hon. gentleman at that time, I have no doubt, was honest in his desire to bring about a renewal of that treaty under which we have prospered so much. But, Sir, at that time, if I am not incorrect, the hon. gentleman caused propositions to be made to the States which would have horror-stricken the hon. member for Cardwell—not propositions for an exchange of natural products alone, but propositions for the assimilation of the tariffs of the two countries. If the Hon. George Brown was correct in a statement he made in a speech delivered by him in 1865, negotiations were then on foot for a renewal of reciprocity with the United States. I wonder if the hon. gentleman will leave the Government when he discovers that his leader is heterodox on that point. We have not yet heard from the hon. the First Minister, but perhaps he may yet throw over the hon. member for Cardwell. He may yet approve of the resolution introduced, because, as I have shown, it does not go any further than the right hon. gentleman was willing to go when he was seeking a renewal of those treaty relations in 1865, when he declared that the abrogation of the treaty would be a great national calamity.

Mr. SPROULE. Did he make a treaty?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.). But I find that these negotiations went still further. In 1879, the hon. gentleman again opened negotiations with the people of the United States for a renewal of that treaty; and I hope the hon. member for Cardwell will not be horror-stricken when he learns that again, in 1869,—I state this on the authority of the late Hon. George Brown—propositions were made a second time for the assimilation of the tariff of the two countries. I refer to the speech which the Hon. George Brown delivered in the Senate in 1875, in which he stated:

“In 1869, formal negotiations were entered into with the American Government, and the project of a treaty was presented for discussion. The negotiations continued from July, 1869, to March, 1870. The project included the cession for a term of years of our fisheries to the United States, the enlargement and enjoyment of our canals, the free enjoyment of the navigation of the St. Lawrence, the assimilation of our customs and excise duties, and some other propositions.”

Is the hon. member for Cardwell willing to resign and leave a gentleman who has proved himself so disloyal as the First Minister did when he made those propositions? I have here the speech of the Hon. Mr. Huntington, who is now dead and gone, and whose silvery voice used to ring through this Chamber. In that speech Mr. Huntington stated he was aware from a person who could give him authoritative information, that such a project of treaty had been signed by the Hon. John Rose and the Secretary of the United States Treasury. That statement will be found in Mr. Huntington's speech of March 16th, 1870. Mr. Huntington said:

“I know something about the memorandum entered into by the contracting parties in regard to the preliminary negotiations, and I have my information from sources which I believe to be reliable and trustworthy. And I say that in the preliminary negotiations between Hon. Mr. Rose and Mr. Secretary Fish, it was agreed that the manufactures of both countries should be admitted duty free, and hon. gentlemen cannot deny it.”

There is the statement, Sir, and I will go further. I will challenge the right hon. the First Minister to bring down the documents, if he dares deny the authoritative statement made by Mr. Huntington and by the Hon. Geo. Brown, who were both members of the Privy Council, and who both stated they had their information from the highest source. The hon. member for Cardwell has said that this proposition of ours involves an assimilation of the customs and excise duties, and is, therefore, a disloyal proposition. But the same proposition was made by his leader. Is the hon. gentleman prepared to justify his leader or to denounce him as disloyal?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). If the hon. gentleman will allow me, I would say that, several times in his speech, he has put words into my mouth which I never uttered. What I said was that a differential duty against England was disloyal to the mother country and inconsistent with our position.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I ask the hon. gentleman: Is not the proposition for differential duties just as much involved in the proposal of his leader, which I have just stated? If the hon. gentleman doubts what I say, let him turn his attention to the Order in Council which was adopted, and which was signed by Sir John Rose. On the 3rd September, 1868, at the very time when the right for the Dominion of Canada was discriminated in any way against the mother country was challenged, and when Sir John Rose penned a Minute of Council which was approved by the other members of the Cabinet, affirming our right to discriminate whenever we pleased against the mother land, why was that document signed? Why did the Government of that day contend that the Dominion of Canada had the right, if it chose, to discriminate against the manufactures of the mother country? Simply because the Government were then engaged in endeavoring to carry out a treaty which had that discrimination for one of its objects. I am not going to read this document at length, but I call the attention of those that wish to peruse it, to the document itself. It is to be found in No. 47 of the Sessional Papers for 1869. Sir John Rose, after devoting the first part of the minute to the assertion of the right of one Province to discriminate in favor of another Province against English goods, because Prince Edward Island was not then part of the Dominion, and the question was raised whether the Dominion had the right to discriminate in favor of Prince Edward Island as against Great Britain—after disposing of that minor question, Sir John Rose then grappled with the second objection. He said:

"The second point as stated by His Grace, viz: 'The exclusive favor which substantially or, at all events, apparently might be conferred on the United States, if the clause providing for the admission of certain products of that country, in the event of certain contingencies, should come into operation,' and which His Grace is pleased to say: 'he fears could not be acceded to,' raises a question of such deep import to the people of this Dominion, that the undersigned deems it in his duty to advert to the course which has hitherto been pursued by Her Majesty's Government with reference to it, in the conviction that further consideration will lead His Grace to withdraw the objections which by anticipation have been advanced."

He then goes on to discuss the peculiar position in which Canada and the United States stand with regard to each other, and shows that it is for their mutual interest to exchange certain articles on reciprocal terms:

"The truth of this proposition has never been denied by Her Majesty's Government, but, on the contrary, their influence has been invariably exercised in furtherance of such reciprocal arrangements."

He then goes on to say:

"In 1885, the delegates from Canada, who visited England for the purpose of conferring with Her Majesty's Government on various important matters affecting the interests of the Dominion, were again assured that Sir Frederick Bruce, Her Majesty's Representative at Washington, had received instructions to negotiate for a renewal of the treaty, and to act in concert with the Government of Canada to that end."

It thus appears that the principle of establishing special trade relations on reciprocal terms between Canada and the United States has been formally recognised and approved by Her Majesty's Government since 1848. And having thus successfully, as he thinks, refuted the objection taken by His Grace, we have the subsequent statement made by the gentleman to whom I have referred, that they endeavored to negotiate with the United States for the assimilation of the duties of the two countries, which involved differential duties against the mother country. I think I have fairly proved that proposition. Then we had a new departure in 1878. We had the National Policy introduced, and there was an end of all propositions of that kind. Hon. gentlemen will see that it is not only in the statements made by leading and eloquent members of the then Opposition, which afterwards became the Government, that they were enabled to carry out that proposition of the National Policy, but that they placed upon the face of their proposition a statement which was not of any intrinsic value in the proposition itself, but might have had great value in regard to the trade with the United States, and it was on that ground that they asked the people to adopt it. Let me read the proposition which was made by the hon. the First Minister at that time. After reciting that it is desirable to adopt a national policy, he goes on:

"That such a policy will retain in Canada thousands of our fellow-countrymen now obliged to expatriate themselves in search of the employment denied them at home, will restore prosperity to our struggling industries, now so sadly depressed, will prevent Canada from being made a sacrifice market, will encourage and develop an active inter-provincial trade, and moving (as it ought to do) in the direction of reciprocity of tariffs with our neighbors, so far as the various interests of Canada may demand, will greatly tend to procure for this country—"

What?

"Eventually a reciprocity of trade."

That is what you were leading up to, or what you said you were leading up to, and what you deluded the people of the country into believing you were leading up to, and that is why you carried your National Policy. But I contend that that proposition has been a failure. It has not led to reciprocity of trade. On the contrary, it has had a most unfortunate effect on our commercial connection with the United States. It can hardly be believed that four and a half millions of people in this country can convert sixty millions of people in the great country to the south of us to our views by any threat of forcing them into trade relations. The proposition was absurd from the start, and now you are further away than you were at the time the National Policy was first instituted from the end you proposed to gain. What do we find now? Bringing the matter down to the present day, we find that the fishery embargo has brought together the plenipotentiaries of Great Britain and the United States to try and solve the disputes which have been so serious that, as Mr. Bayard expresses it, unless they are satisfactorily solved, they may result in war. No other meaning can be attached to this language. What do we find to-day? We find that the leader of the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) who spoke yesterday, the Finance Minister (Sir Charles Tupper), goes to Washington, and does he tell Mr. Bayard, or does he, in answer to his proposition, use the language of the hon. member for Cardwell, and say offensively to the people of the United States, "You have our proposition and we can go no further than we have expressed in the Statute?" Sir Charles Tupper, I hope, is too great a lover of his country to take that course; and he says, I will treat this question of trade relations in a different way. We are not the suppliants in this case. We are not sacrificing any question of honor. Mr. Bayard, that great statesman, comes to us and says:

"I am confident we both seek to attain a just and permanent settlement—and there is but one way to procure it—and that is by a straightforward treatment, on a liberal and statesmanlike plan, of the entire commercial relations of the two countries."

I think this Parliament may thank its stars that the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) was not sent to Washington to answer that proposition of Mr. Bayard, and to tell him that the one way of settling the matter by a liberal and statesmanlike plan of dealing with the commercial relations of the two countries was, only, that the Government would not go beyond the statutory provision they had already made. Sir Charles Tupper tells Mr. Bayard that he coincides fully with him:

"I entirely concur in your statement that we both seek to attain a just and permanent settlement—and that there is but one way to procure it—and that is by a straightforward treatment, on a liberal and statesmanlike plan, of the entire commercial relations of the two countries."

None of your pettifogging propositions as included in the resolution of 1878, but a broad and statesmanlike plan of the entire commercial relations of the two countries, or, as my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) puts it, unrestricted interchange of the natural and manufactured articles of the two countries. That is paraphrasing the language used by Secretary Bayard and re-echoed by Sir Charles Tupper, and we are not going further to-day than Sir Charles Tupper has gone in his reply to the note of Secretary Bayard. Now we have that great country holding out the right hand of fellowship, and, through its Secretary of State, inviting us to declare what we believe to be the broad and liberal and comprehensive measures we should adopt. It is known that the American commissioners refused to accept the offer Sir Charles Tupper made to treat in regard to the commercial relations of the two countries, and it is known why they refused. Those commissioners had not the power to deal with that matter, and it is known that the Congress of the United States is most jealous of interference by the representatives of the President with its supreme control over the commercial relations of that country, it is well known that they desire to maintain intact their right to regulate the tariff of the country as they see best; and so we see to-day in that great body members proposing, one a scheme known as Commercial Union, and another a proposition known as Unrestricted Reciprocity, which is as akin to ours as it can be. Thus, we have the leading men on both sides, in their respective Legislatures, taking a common-sense view of this great question which is being talked over at every fireside on both sides of the line, and is of the utmost importance to the people of this Dominion. We have now an opportunity of declaring whether we are in earnest in desiring broad, liberal and comprehensive measures with the United States, or whether we are dangling this before the eyes of the people for political purposes. It has come down to that, and those who to-day vote a negative to the proposition of my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) will be voting against the proposition which I believe a very large majority of the people of the United States are prepared to make, if they see a desire on this side of the line to meet them half-way. There have been a few objections raised to this proposition, and my hon. friend has answered some of them. I will not touch upon the ground he has occupied. The hon. gentleman opposite says this will discriminate against Great Britain. Necessarily it must to some extent, but we cannot help that. It necessarily must discriminate against Great Britain somehow. We cannot help that. But this discrimination is not half as great as it is generally supposed. In fact we have a right to discriminate; the question is, is it in our interest to discriminate or not?

Mr. MITCHELL. That is the point.

Mr. DAVIES. That is the point. I say while we are loyal to England and loyal to the English flag, we are here representing the Canadian people in our Legislature. We are not now in waddling clothes. The time has gone by when the legislation of this country is to be moulded to suit the interests of the English manufacturer. The legislation of this country must be moulded to suit the interest of the Canadian producer and the Canadian consumer. I remember well reading the other day that in 1859 objections were taken by the Colonial Secretary to the financial scheme introduced by Sir Alexander T. Galt, then Finance Minister of Canada, on the ground that it worked injuriously to the interest of the British manufacturer, and in that far-off time, Sir Alexander Galt, with the prescience of a true statesman, recognising the importance of Canadian interests, told him he was sorry it was so, but the interests of the Canadian people must be paramount to the interests of the British manufacturer. Sir, the words of that statesman—for I think I may fairly call him a statesman, I think he is entitled to that name—may be quoted by me on this occasion. Sir Alexander Galt, in reply to the dispatch from His Grace the Duke of Newcastle, protesting against the enactment of the new Canadian tariff, moved to that protest by certain manufacturers of Sheffield, wrote:

"I must distinctly affirm the right of the Canadian Legislature to adjust the taxation of the people in the way they deem best, even if it should unfortunately happen to meet the disapproval of the Imperial Ministry. Her Majesty cannot be advised to disallow such acts unless the advisers are prepared to assume the administration of the affairs of the colony, irrespective of the views of the inhabitants."

That was the language of Sir Alexander T. Galt. We are a free people, we have control over our fiscal legislation, we know what is best for our own interests, we have power to deal with them, and if that power is to be superseded by some other persons, they must come here and take the responsibility of governing this country. But, Sir, having the power, how are we going to discriminate? As a matter of fact we have exercised that power already. Hon. gentlemen may say that they did not intend to do it, but I say that the practical effect of the incidence of taxation as it bears upon English goods and upon American goods, is to discriminate largely against the English. What do we find to-day? We find that there are $25,766,273 of dutiable goods imported from Great Britain, and $9,195,960 of free goods, making the total imports from Great Britain, $14,962,233. Upon that sum you charge a duty of $9,318,920, or as nearly as possible, 21 per cent. upon English imported goods. I find, Sir, that in the same year

—I am now speaking of 1887—we imported $30,570,609 of dutiable goods from the States, and $14,536,457 of free goods from the same country, making a total of $45,107,066 from the United States. Upon those goods you exacted a duty of $7,268,194, or a shade over 16 per cent. So that while you are levying upon the total English importations a duty of 21 per cent., you are levying upon the total imports from the United States a duty of only 16 per cent.: you have discriminated, practically, to the extent of nearly 4 per cent. I am not complaining about it; it may be in the interests of Canada that you should do so, and if it is in the interests of Canada, I am prepared to defend the discrimination. But, Sir, no question has ever been raised on this side of the House, no question has ever been raised outside, that that involved the loyalty of the Administration. You are legislating in the interests of those you represent, and you would be false and recreant to the people you represent if you did not do so. Whether it bears harshly or not upon a particular class at home, is not the question which we ought to have in view. But I say that, practically, the effect will not amount to much. We will continue to buy largely from Great Britain of those classes of goods we now buy. I say we will do more. I say that no man who recollects the prosperity of the people of Canada under the old treaty, does not know what the prosperity of the people will be if a new treaty is made, based upon the proposition of my hon. friend from South Oxford. We know that the people will be in a position to purchase two dollars for one dollar they now purchase of English goods, and if that is so, I would like to see the man who will have the hardihood to deny that the only result will be rather beneficial than otherwise to the English manufacturer. There is a very large class of goods you buy from England that you must continue to buy, even if trade becomes free between us and the States. England does not enter in competition with the United States in those classes of goods. Why, you see the United States to-day, with a tariff 10 per cent. higher than ours, and they purchase in the English market over $150,000,000 yearly of English manufactured goods. Sir, if we had our tariff to-day and free trade with the States, we would still continue to import from England all those classes of goods which the Americans now find it to be their interest to import in spite of their high tariff. I believe myself that our importation of English goods under the new era of prosperity which would be inaugurated, would be largely in excess of what it is to-day, and I believe, therefore, that, practically, the English manufacturer would be benefitted instead of injured. I acknowledge that it has on the face of it an element of discrimination, but I say that if it is in favor of the Canadian people that it should be so, I, for one, am prepared to accept the responsibility of my vote. It may be said that there will be a loss of revenue. We know there will be a loss of revenue, and I think my hon. friend pointed out pretty clearly how he proposes to meet that loss of revenue. He proposes to meet it by following on the lines, in one respect, that have been advocated in this House for a number of years back. We say the pruning-knife must be applied to the expenditure, this matter must be dealt with vigorously, heroic measures of retrenchment must be adopted; and I think this side of the House, if entrusted with the administration of affairs, is prepared to adopt heroic measures of retrenchment. If this country could be governed as it was by my hon. friend from East York, when 23 millions sufficed to carry on the affairs of the country, instead of 36 millions that are now required, I think we would have no difficulty in meeting the loss of revenue. I say the first article in our creed is heroic retrenchment in the public expenditure. I say more than that: if our importations from England are, as I believe they will be, largely in excess of what they are now, your revenue will proportionately increase, and if there is a small deficiency, we will be prepared, I have no doubt, to meet it, and the people will be prepared to make it up cheerfully when the time comes. Now, Sir, there is an element in this question which affects the people of the Maritime Provinces more than it does the people of western Canada. When the treaty negotiated by the late George Brown was presented to the country, it was found that he had obtained a very great boon for the people of the Maritime Provinces—the right to register colonial built ships in the United States. That, Sir, is a very great boon, and coupled with that, I venture to express the hope that one of the conditions referred to in the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford—if his proposition is ever formulated into a treaty—will be that, in addition to the right to register our vessels in the United States and the reciprocal right of the United States to register their vessels in our country, we shall also have the privilege of the coasting trade of the United States. Sir, unrestricted reciprocity will be a boon to the whole country—it will be a great boon to Ontario, a great boon to Quebec, a great boon to Manitoba, a great boon to the Maritime Provinces; but if, along with it, we can have the coasting trade and the right to register our colonial built ships in the United States, why, Sir, who will dare to fix bounds to the prosperity which will encircle those Maritime Provinces. Our shipping trade, which at one time was a very prosperous trade, has gone down; it is melancholy to look at the figures. I find away back in 1877 we built 100,000 tons of shipping in the Maritime Provinces of the Dominion; to-day we are building but 27,000. Give us the right to register our ships in the United States, and in the Provinces of Quebec and Nova Scotia and New Brunswick we can build hundreds of ships suitable for the coasting trade which will then go into service between the Provinces and the United States. We can do it, and we can do it profitably, for we have the money, the timber, the brawny arms, and intelligence and experience gained by many years of ship building, and we have the cheap labor and the sailors to man the ships afterwards. I doubt if there is any condition you can attach to this scheme of unrestricted reciprocity which will be of greater advantage to the whole Maritime Provinces, and to the Province of Quebec in addition, than this which I have mentioned, and which I venture to hope will form one of the conditions of reciprocity, conferring upon both countries respectively the right to register their ships in the other country, the right to register Canadian vessels in the United States and the right to register American vessels in Canada. Sir, we now have arrived, as it were, at the parting of the waves. We must make our choice between two policies. We have, on the one hand, the National Policy, with a statutory offer which we know has not been accepted, and will not be accepted and never can be accepted; we have, on the other hand, a broad, statesmanlike proposition submitted here for throwing down the barriers of trade and opening up unrestricted reciprocity between two countries. We have offered to us the choice between stagnation in our trade, as I am sorry to say it at present exists, and that prosperity which advanced by leaps and bounds under the old treaty and which will be renewed under the new. We have a controversy here, and we have to make our choice between legislation, on the one hand, for the classes and legislation, on the other hand, for the masses—legislation which has built up, as the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) pointed out, two or three large cities, which is making the assessed value of Toronto and Montreal very much larger than it was years ago, but which is doing so at the expense of other portions of the same Provinces. You are building up the cities at the expense of the country. The totality of your wealth is not increasing. Sir, we are as loyal as you are; but we are not loyal in one quarter only, but we are loyal to the flag, loyal to the Canadian flag, loyal to the people we represent. Sir, I say it is not loyalty but disloyalty on the part of any member of this House if he shrinks from adopting measures which will be for our own interest and the interests of our people, for fear they would be disapproved by a small section of manufacturers. Sir, I am not afraid our manufacturers will go to the wall. There are certain classes of manufacturers which will go to the wall—those manufactures which exist only because they are bolstered up by this false system of the National Policy. Some of them may go; but when I see such men as millionaire Gibson, who owns one of the largest cotton factories in the Dominion of Canada, declaring openly, "I court unrestricted reciprocity because it will give me a large market, and I am not afraid to compete with manufacturers to the south of us." "I believe," he says, "I have money enough and brains enough, and our people are intelligent enough to enable us to compete successfully with those who are manufacturing cotton to the south. Give me the market—that is what I want." And hundreds are echoing the same cry. You cannot take up a copy of the Mail newspaper, which has devoted itself to this particular branch of the subject, without seeing that in all parts of the Dominion manufacturers are coming forward and declaring—what? Declaring they are going to be ruined, as the hon. member for Cardwell says? No. They are declaring they are ready to accept the situation, to join hands with the great agricultural, mining and lumbering interests of the Dominion and go in for this unrestricted reciprocity of trade, which will make prosperity follow over this Dominion like a sunbeam. Sir, I tell hon. gentlemen that this question has eaten too deeply into the hearts of the people to be disposed of with a single speech or a single phrase. The people have learned by experience. Time is on our side. Time the hon. member for Cardwell spoke about last night, and I tell him that time is on our side. The social conditions of the country are on our side, they are working for us, and all of our debates here will not stop the onward flow of public opinion which is being created at every fireside in this Dominion, based as it is upon the best interests of the people. Sir, we tender the people a flag of which we are not ashamed, a flag upon which is inscribed, "Unrestricted Trade with the United States—Freedom of Trade." Hon. gentlemen know that this sentiment will find an echo in the heart of every man who has attained manhood's estate and remembers what reciprocity brought us in the past; it will find an echo in the heart of every young man who to-day is in despair whether he should remain in this country or go abroad; it will find an echo in the heart of the bread-winner who finds it hard enough to earn sufficient to buy his daily bread, much less to put by a little for a rainy day; and we throw this flag to the breeze, confident that it will be carried by the united hands of the people of the several Provinces of the Dominion to a glorious, if not to a speedy victory.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), in the course of his speech last night, made use of an expression something like this: That in the discussion of this question we should approach it as statesmen and not as flunkies. I have been a little curious to know if the hon. gentleman were to undertake to put himself and his lieutenant, who has so bravely spoken just now, in one or other of these categories, in which he would place them. It would not be in harmony with his own self-respect that he should put himself or his friend in the second, and it would not be for me certainly to attempt to make the classification. It is for this House, and it is for this country after the House, by the speeches that were made and the arguments with which the proposition was attempted to be furthered, to say as to whether the proposition that was made was, in the first place, a statesmanlike proposition, and in the second place, whether it was furthered by statesmanlike arguments. I quite appreciate what has been said by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat as to the importance of this question. I do not think the House has yet got hold of the tremendously grave nature of the issue, if it be really a serious issue which is embodied in this proposition, and I think the House and the country may be a little excused for doubting at the present time whether it is really a serious issue or not. Hon. gentlemen opposite have had within the last ten years so many issues, they have gone from one to the other with such an amount of versatility, and such an amount of celerity, that they have become a sort of Chinese puzzle to the community at large, and when they spring a grand new issue within a few months upon Parliament and upon the people, Parliament and the people are quite excusable if they hold their breath for a little and watch in patience as to whether those gentlemen are in earnest, and whether it is worth while taking up the fight in a real spirit or not. If this issue be a real and serious issue, it is a tremendous one, because it implies a very great deal. It involves in the first place the almost complete diversion of the trade of this country, and of the methods of transport with reference to the trade of this country; I speak particularly with reference to the import trade. Hon. gentlemen may say as they please, but there will be a diversion of the trade outside of the United States which comes into this country, if such a proposition as this were carried. It seems to me to be plain, and to go without reasoning—to go by the very fact of looking at it, that there will be a very large and almost complete diversion of trade if this proposition be carried. It involves, also, a commercial severance between Canada and Great Britain, as well as outside countries with which we have been carrying on trade. But, in speaking of this commercial severance, I speak of it particularly with reference to our mother country. I think it goes without saying that, if this proposition be accepted, it involves a separation—a commercial separation—at first large, and tending to become continually larger and wider, between this country and Great Britain, and it involves, in the very wake and current of that commercial severance, a political severance as well. It may be a longer time or a shorter time in coming, but I hold it is a fact, indisputable, that the warmest and the fullest current of blood to-day that flows through the country is its commercial blood, and that along the current of its commercial life will flow the social current, will flow the sympathy of feeling, will flow, also, the political current of the people. If we commence to-day by opening a channel which involves, in the first, a commercial severance between us and the mother country, as that channel broadens and widens—and if the rosy and imaginative pictures that have been drawn here of the great extension of commerce which would take place between us and the United States be true, it must grow and widen—I say, in proportion as it does so grow and widen there must inevitably come a wider and deeper severance, politically, between us and the mother country. More than that, it involves an almost total loss of our customs revenue. That point has been disputed, and it is a question which we may dispute. I hold that no person in this House will pretend to deny that it involves a considerable disturbance of our customs duties.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Not necessarily one cent.

Mr. FOSTER. On the very item of woods that we bring into the United States we drop at one bound seven millions of dollars, and a little better, of duty. We will buy from the United States in the main, and if the proposition of my hon. friend works itself out as it is supposed by him it will, we will buy more increasingly from the United States, and in proportion as the current of trade sets in that way we shall buy less and less from outside countries when we have those discriminating duties between ourselves and outside countries. This, therefore, would involve a continual diminution in the customs contribution, which is now so very large a part of our revenue. It involves also the establishment of a new method of taxation, a method of taxation which is totally at variance with the wants of this people of Canada, and which, I believe, will be found to be at variance with the wishes of the people of Canada. It is totally impossible for the government of this country to be carried on without a very large annual increment in the way of duties of some kind. As my hon. friend last night showed, it is impossible to take excise duties beyond a certain amount, and the bulk of that which is necessary to carry on the wants of the services of this country, with its increased and its constant extension, must be got from customs duties; or if not from customs duties, it must be raised by this new method of taxation of which I have spoken—direct taxation. Again, and lastly, this proposition involves the probable destruction of a large proportion of our industries, which, in Canada, since 1878 until to-day, by the mandate of the people three times given and never revoked, it has been the sacred trust and duty of this Government and this Parliament to see carried on and established and kept firm. Since the election of 1887 hon. gentlemen have sprung this new proposition upon the House and upon the country. How dare they, in the light of responsible members to the constituencies that sent them here, spring such a proposition as that, and demand for it any other weight than their own individual opinions? They, Sir, have offered to the country a proposition which would, in a great measure, disturb the existing taxation and the purposes for which that taxation largely existed, namely, to raise a revenue with a view towards the establishment and maintenance of the great industries of this country. If ever a party went to the country pledged not to make any great disturbance in this respect, it was the party opposite. If they owe any fealty to their leader of the time gone by; if they had any respect for him as their acknowledged and most applauded leader, they should remember that they went to the country pledged not to disturb this to any large extent, and with the echoes of their own leader running in their ears and with his own words echoed by themselves upon every platform, they said: "If you intend, gentleman electors, to return us to power, if you wish the manufacturing interests fairly conserved, very well, we will not disturb them, at least, to any great extent, nor will we disturb the existing taxation." Those are the things which appear to me open to argument, and, of course, they are involved in this proposition which has been made by the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). Now, Sir, when an acknowledged and idolized finance leader of a great party in this country comes before the country and before Parliament under those peculiar conditions with the mandate of the people behind him and against the verdict of the people which was freshly given only a few months before, and puts before the country and before Parliament so bold, so revolutionary and so new a proposition as the one put before this Parliament and country, he should have good reasons for it. And not only put before the country which it will most probably affect, but put in all its nakedness before the country which must be a party to the carrying of this proposition, if ever it is successfully carried out. When a man comes with such a proposition, so bold and revolutionary, it is necessary that he should give us the closest possible reasoning, the most irrefragable proofs and lead us irresistibly to the most irrefutable conclusion before he can demand that the people who are sent here by their constituents should give him their adhesion to this change and to this proposition. Now, Sir, I leave the hon. gentleman with his speech of three or four hours in length to the calm judgment of this Parliament, and to the calmer judgment of this country beyond this Parliament. I do not propose that his speech shall be judged, it cannot be judged, in the laudatory manner in which it was referred to by his lieutenant who spoke this afternoon, but in cold blood. When the people sit down with intelligence, coolness and calmness in their own homes, coming as they do from a country which they have been proud to own as their mother land, finding stretching between them and the old Islands beyond the sea, the invisible but strong cords that patriotism and love of ancestry and love of national expansion become, which they find twining about their hearts, and causing them to look at it in the light of a country that they have been led to believe has become great and will become greater—that they have been led to believe has a great future before it—if in the spirit of union and patriotism they knit themselves together, when the people of Canada, so intelligent, and under these circumstances come to read and consider and weigh that speech, I am willing to abide by the verdict, and I think the verdict will be that the case is not proven. The hon. gentleman's speech had something in it. It was full of a plentiful assumption of personal superiority, and had running through it a constant current of sneering contempt for anyone who should be unfortunate enough to disagree with him. It was full of such expressions as this: "It is perfectly clear that," "no man who thinks twice but what knows," "any person who is not wilfully ignorant must confess," and all that; and yet at the very heels of such assertions came statements which were perfectly involved and absurd—statements which any man who thought twice would indignantly and instantly reject and the only ground for hoping that they would be ever entertained is because they come into some person's head who never thinks twice or never thinks at all. His speech was full of a wealth of assertion which was only equalled by the conspicuous poverty of fact that was found in it; and it had in it what I may call an immense vagueness, which offered a delightful excursion ground for the political adventure, but which the silent, staid and level-headed people of Canada, when they think it over, will, I venture to believe, lay it aside to be taken in infinitesimally small doses along with their well-worn Gulliver's Travels and Baron Munchausen's exploits.

Mr. MITCHELL. Amen.

Mr. FOSTER. I am glad that on this point my hon. friend from Northumberland piously agreed with me. But, Sir, while the speech of my hon. friend from South Oxford most inefficiently did that, it most efficiently did another thing. In that speech my hon. friend entirely eclipsed his hitherto unrivalled record as the murky-fingered pointer of Canadian retrogression, hopelessness and despair. On the canvas upon which he drew he placed a picture which, honestly, if I believed it to be true, would make me turn my back at once and forever upon Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. FOSTER. It would actually, much as my hon. friend might regret it, lead me to turn my back on Canada and to write upon its portals, "Abandon all hope, ye who enter here." The only alleviation that there is to that side of the subject is this, that my hon. friend has established so wide a notoriety as a prophet of unrealised disaster and woe, that even under the very hues of his canvas and under the very sound of his lamentations. I have no doubt Canadians will still marry and be given in marriage.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And go to the United States.

Mr. FOSTER. They will build up homes, and continue to live happily together, and they will not be turned aside in the main from laying broad and deep the foundations of a future prosperity.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. member for South Oxford, in the introduction of his resolution, and the hon. gentleman from Queen's, P.E.I., who spoke this afternoon, both agreed that the proposition before the House is an important one. They both agreed that it proposed a very considerable disturbance of the existing relations; they agreed that it was, in fact, a heroic remedy. Now, I think, before the House or the country is justified in accepting such a proposition, so denominated by its mover and its supporters, the burden of proof is placed upon those who introduced it and support it. The burden of proof is placed upon them to show clearly that at the present time a heroic remedy is necessary; that, taking the condition of the country now, in 1888, as compared with its condition in 1877, or in any year previous to 1877, a set of circumstances has arisen, almost suddenly arisen, which makes it necessary now to take a step that was never deemed necessary before, and that, therefore, this heroic remedy should be applied. Now, if the burden of proof must fall upon the hon. gentleman who introduced, and the hon. gentlemen who support the resolution, let us examine for a few moments the proofs by that test and the facts brought forward in support of the contention that a heroic remedy is at the present time necessary. The first proof adduced by my hon. friend from South Oxford was this: He says nature is too strong for us. Now, I suppose, by that expression he meant that the different Provinces of the Dominion are so constituted; first, with relation to themselves, and, secondly, with relation to other countries in their vicinity, that it is impossible to combine them into a united country having satisfactory trade relations among the different Provinces which compose it. I understand him to mean that the geographical conditions of these different component parts of the Dominion are such that they fight continually against a unity of commerce and a unity of spirit in the Confederation, and that, in this fight, these geographical difficulties, that is nature, will prove too strong, and these component parts can, therefore, never be welded into a united whole. In the first place, I wish, in reference to that, to make this remark: I believe the hon. member for South Oxford is not a tyro in politics, I believe he is not unknown to the political history of this country, I believe he has been a more or less central figure in the party to which he has belonged for some fifteen or sixteen years. If to-day, nature is too strong for us, as the hon. gentleman says, what must nature then have been in 1868? What must nature have been in 1873? And what must nature have been from 1873 to 1879? And what, in a less degree, must nature have been from 1879 up to the present? But we never have heard of the hon. gentleman introducing such a resolution as this or anything akin to this; we have never heard of his proposing such a remedy as this or anything akin to it, until this present year of grace of 1888, when the difficulties which nature has placed in our way have been, to a large extent, overcome by the energy and enterprise and wealth of this country. In 1868, the bald proposition was made to knit these different dependencies into a united country. The hon. member for South Oxford was a supporter of that idea; he was a supporter of that plan; he has continued to support it from 1868 to 1873.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). From 1864.

Mr. FOSTER. From 1864, then. He was in the Government, and a central figure in it, from 1873 to 1879. Has he just now arrived at this conclusion? What new light has been thrown that has brought him to the conclusion that nature is too strong for us? Why, Sir, it is the triumph of man to overcome the disabilities which nature throws in his way. It is the triumph of modern science, than which nothing has been more wonderful in the history of the world, to overcome geographical difficulties, to overcome the disabilities of distance, to overcome the obstructions of physical difficulties, and to overcome them in the interest of the unity of countries and in the interest of the spread of commerce. And it appears to me that if, in 1868, if in 1873, if in the years since then, the hon. gentleman did not feel that nature was so strong as to drive him to propose a heroic remedy, there is all the less reason to-day to adduce that as an argument, and an argument, as it seems to me, of an extraordinarily weak character. For between 1868 and this time, we have done what? We have introduced Provinces that had no knowledge of each other to each other, and they have become acquainted. We have made great lines of water communication, than which no country possesses longer and better; we have built great lines of railway communication, which are channels and arteries for the commerce of this country, and which now extend from one side of the continent to the other, and in all these ways we have put nature at a minimum of disadvantage, compared to the maximum of disadvantage that she put us to in 1868. If it be true that we must never contend against nature, and that we must seek for our commerce channels that run in geographical lines, then the history of the world has been teaching us a wrong lesson. Nature was strong between the eastern and the southern and western parts of the United States, by means of the almost illimitable distances that separated them. Man triumphed over nature, and spanned the prairies of the United States with constantly extending lines of commerce. Nature stood strong, and vast, and rugged against the two slopes of the United States, the western and the eastern slope, in the shape of a line of mountains that run down between these two sections. Modern science and modern enterprise tunnelled those mountains, modern science and modern enterprise overcame those difficulties, and has introduced a strict and intimate relation of commerce between the east and middle States of the United States and the western States, and between the eastern slope and the western slope. Science and enterprise have been at work in our own Dominion of Canada, and, whereas, the Pacific slope and the Pacific range stood there as an impassable barrier for many and many a year between our eastern and our western slope, to-day it has been tunnelled and science has surmounted the difficulty, to the wonder of the world, and to-day the life-blood of commerce flows not only from our Atlantic to our Pacific slope, but over that line which we have built, overcoming nature, the great east and the great west speak to each other and give to each other the message of increasing commerce. Time was when the Alps formed an impassable barrier between Italy and the rest of Europe, but they have been tunnelled, and German and Italian and European life flow together along that line which has been constructed by engineering skill. It is no argument to say that a country shall give over its attempt to build up a nationality because geographical difficulties and geographical distances are in the way. If there is one thing more than another which brings out and shows to the full the innate energy and power of a people, it is action which is not only the proof of their present greatness, but the guarantee of their future greatness. It is that they will set themselves together in a united effort to overcome and to vanquish nature, and to rise in spite of that to national greatness and prosperity. That argument, therefore, is not a sufficient one to show why we should introduce this heroic method. The next argument which the hon. gentleman introduced was this; that we had no other natural market, and my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) reiterated that idea. What do they mean by a natural market? Is it not quite possible that this phrase should be used without meaning? What is the natural market for a country? Is it a geographical market? By no means. If that were true, the natural market for Great Britain would be France, which lies closest to it, as we all know, but we also know that there is not the same traffic between Great Britain and France as there is between Great Britain and countries which lie thousands and thousands of miles away. If that statement were true, Great Britain's trade would not have extended, as it has done, to India, to China, to Japan and to every country in the wide world. A natural market, it seems to me, is a market in which you can place things which are demanded by that country and which are not produced, or are not produced in sufficient quantity by that country. That is the natural market for your country, and so it came to pass that the West Indies are more of a natural market for Halifax or for Nova Scotia than the Province of New Brunswick, which lies close beside them; and so it happens that countries which are the diameter of the world apart are more of a natural market than those which lie contiguous to each other. So it is not a sufficient proof that we should adopt this heroic remedy because the phrase expression is given vent to that we have no natural market, and that we need the United States for a natural market. Again, the loss of population was an argument advanced by the hon. gentleman. We must revolutionise the condition of this country, we must step out on an unknown plank, we must leave the ground upon which we have stood for years, we must burn the bridges and cut the connections which are dear to us, because there has been a movement of population in this country. I do not deny that there has been a movement of population. I do not deny that there is always a movement of population from older countries to new countries, and from the older parts of new countries to the newer parts. That is a world-wide fact, especially as far as the movement of population from Europe to America is concerned, and more especially in regard to the Anglo-Saxon race. My hon. friend was mathematically precise in his proofs. He brought it down to an exact statement that one out of four of the Canadian people is, as he unfortunately said, exiled to a foreign country, and that three out of four of the foreign people who come to this country land themselves in the country which lies to the south and west of us. Will you think of what followed that statement which was so precise, so mathematically certain, so definite in its proportions of one to four and three to four, in the way of argument to prove that that was so? It needs simply for me to say, and the hon. gentlemen who heard the speech, or, if they did not hear it, who will read the speech will bear me out, that the argument was totally inadequate to the assertion and that the assertion remains unproved. But the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has more than that to do. He has to prove not only that there has been this movement of population, but that the heroic remedy which he proposes will stop that movement. The larger portion of the argument of last night and of to-day was totally irrelevant, and I shall not attempt to deal with it. Let those hon. gentlemen beat upon it until the anvil is beaten out by the hammer. It has nothing to do with the question unless you establish, in addition to that, that, if we adopt this proposal, that movement of population will cease. Will hon. gentlemen think for a moment of why the movement of population takes place from older countries to newer? Will my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) think a little more on that question, a little hard thinking would not hurt him, will he ask himself why people leave Prince Edward Island for the west? He says it is not on account of the soil—granted; that it is not on account of the climate—granted; that it is not on account of the laws under which we live and the flag under which we live—granted. Why, then, do they leave? They leave mainly for two reasons: one, because they seek industrial employment which shall bring them in a larger amount for their earnings, and the other, to get on lands broader and freer so that they may be able to try their agricultural capacities on these larger lands. Those are the principal reasons why they leave the older portions of the country. Unfortunately there was a long period when Canada had no North-West, when she had no broad prairie country to which her children could go, but the United States of America had a broad prairie country which was opened up by lines of railways and into which the surplus population and the adventurous population of the older States of America, looking for broader and freer privileges in regards to land, went and gradually settled. The people of Western New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio and Illinois went further west as the lines of communication were opened up, and many of our own people went there, impelled by the same considerations and settled in the Western States, and the seed always brings the accumulation, and the nucleus which was planted there drew upon those who remain. And, Sir, if Canada ever wished to keep her independent and prosperous course, it was of the first importance that she should have and open out for herself a country of broad lands, a country of prairie freedom, a country of those new conditions. Sir, it was eminently wise that the North-West should be added, and wiser still that it should be opened up, and all the wiser because of the keen competition which that country and Canada had to face in comparison with the United States of America. Now, Sir, we are in the position that when our people from the older Provinces wish broader and freer lands, they can go out into our own North-West, where the great body of the people who go from our older sections to-day are turning their steps, and where they will make their homes under the same flag and will still remain citizens of Canada. My honorable and philosophical friend shakes his head as though it were not so. Is it not more so than it was twenty years ago? Is it not more so than it was five years ago? Is it not more and more so each year? Let time have its sway, let the country open up, let the prosperous years repeat themselves, let the nucleus of population go in there from different countries, each calling back to its own home for a part of its own to come and join it under new conditions, and this country's future with reference to that part of the subject, is as assured as the United States are assured with reference to themselves. The other section of the people went away because they wished to earn ready money, they went into the industrial centres in order to earn it. They found no industrial centres in Prince Edward Island. If after the farming season had passed, and they wanted to earn something for the crowded family, the quickest way they could find to earn it was to take boat and rail and go down to the manufacturing towns of Maine, to the manufacturing towns of New England, and earn their wages during the winter, coming back in the summer to work upon their farms. Canada was at a disadvantage in that respect, and the National Policy has nothing better to commend it to these people, and nothing better to give a strong hold among these people, than the fact that it is meeting successfully that need. Here and there in the different centres of our country, industrial institutions are springing up, manufacturing establishments are opening up, into which the young people of our own country who wish to earn ready money all the year, or at odd times, find a chance for employment, and a wage for their earning hour. These are the two reasons that take people away, these are the two reasons that are being cured, and I hold that we are curing them in our country. Now, I ask you, Mr. Speaker, and I ask hon.

gentlemen here: Has there been a shadow of proof to substantiate the position that the moment you have unrestricted reciprocity, all this current of population will cease, and we will have no more people going out of Canada into the Western States? Not one jot or tittle of proof to that end has been furnished. I hold that it will be opposite. To-day there are many things that keep us here, when a man thinks about going from his own country and making his home in another. There are sentimental conditions that bind him, and which he breaks before he goes. One of the strongest sentimental conditions is the change from flag to flag. You may call it sentiment, and you may say what you like about mock patriotism, and mock loyalty, but it is a feeling down in the heart of every man that is worthy the name of man. Sir, the very moment you weaken those ties by the current of commercial inter-communication, by that consensus of feeling and tendency which follows the channel of commercial communication, leading one to believe that there is no difference between the countries, that one flag is about the same as the other, that it is to the interests of these people that they shall so look upon it, that moment you weaken those ties and you thereby leave the drift towards the other country easier, more certain and more frequent than it otherwise would be. That, I believe, will commend itself to the sober second thought of those who look carefully into this matter. Therefore, I conclude, in the first place, the hon. gentleman is utterly wanting in proof that if this heroic remedy is adopted it will stop the egress of population. Sir, it is not susceptible of proof, either, that this country is not taking the best possible means to stop that egress of population, and is not successful in the means it has taken.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It has increased double.

Mr. FOSTER. That reminds me of something. When the hon. gentleman from South Oxford and the hon. gentleman from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) were in the Government of this country, from 1873 to 1879, was there no egress of population?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). There were, on the average, 22,000 a year, and since then there have been, in some years, four times that number.

Mr. FOSTER. How wonderfully and mathematically precise my hon. friend is. He will not allow the palm to be taken from him by the mathematical precision of the hon. member for South Oxford. Though the hon. member for South Oxford is well inclined to put up with small things and make his figure 1 and 4, and 3 and 4, my hon. friend from Bothwell has a broader and wider mind, and runs up into the thousands. Was there not an egress of population from 1873 to 1879? Does not the country know that there was a heavy egress of population in those years? Does not all our records teach it? The fact is, Sir, and I challenge proof to the contrary, that in those disastrous years the population that went out from this country was driven from it, and a larger population went out then than has gone out in as many years since. When my hon. friend from South Oxford was in the Government, when my hon. friend from Bothwell was in the Government, was there no need of a heroic remedy when the population was leaving us more rapidly than it is to-day? But to-day a heroic remedy is trotted out when hon. gentlemen, having failed on all other cries, wanted another fad to buoy them up. Now, Sir, the next argument that is given us why this heroic remedy should be brought in is that there is a diminution in the valuation of farm lands and farm produce. Now, you will notice that my hon. friend from South Oxford last night adduced no proof to show that farm land was decreasing in value in this country more rapidly than in the country to the south of us. He adduced not a single tittle of proof to show that farm produce was bringing less in this country than in the United States. He simply made the bald and bold assertion that farm property and farm produce in this country were decreasing in value. My hon. friend from Cardwell (Mr. White) flatly and explicitly contradicted that statement of the depreciation in farm land in the Province of Ontario. My hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) said: Well, but they have not increased much. We are not on the point now as to how much they have increased. My hon. friend from South Oxford says that they were positively decreasing in value for a series of years, although the statistical record beside him went to show that they were not decreasing, but there was an increase, though slight, in the value. Will my hon. friend maintain the proposition that there are not causes, wider and broader than any he has mentioned here, to account for the depreciation in value—or, put it in another way, for the not so rapid increase in the value of farm produce in this age of the world compared with ten years ago, fifteen years ago, or twenty years ago? Can you find me an old country in the world in which farm lands are not in more or less difficulty from various causes? The difficulty is brought about by wide and varied economic forces at work now which were not at work before. But, Sir, will my friend maintain the proposition that the countries of the United States, situated as to age, situated as to geographical latitude and longitude much the same as we are situated, have not a greater diminution in values and a greater augmentation in difficulties by the way of debts and mortgages which surround them? Why, Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont and Connecticut have enjoyed the whole freedom of the United States, have had the whole advantage of commercial union, of unrestricted reciprocity, and yet you have only to take the records to show that the difficulties existing there, with respect to those lands, are greater, by far, than those which exist with regard to our own lands. Suppose my hon. friend proves that there is not a rapid rise in the values of lands in this country, does that prove that they would be more rapid if unrestricted reciprocity were the rule? Does that prove they would be more rapid if we had a wider channel of commercial intercourse, unrestricted reciprocity with the United States? That is what they have got to prove before they establish the proposition that the heroic remedy should be applied, founded upon this as a reason for its being applied. I desire in the next place to notice the statement which was made, that there has been a total reduction in the volume of trade and that there is no inter-provincial trade in this country and there cannot possibly be any. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) was not ingenuous in that argument or in that statement. He did not state the whole truth, and he did not state it in the way it should be stated in order to convey the impression that ought to be conveyed. He took the year 1873, an abnormal year, and he made the statement that the volume of trade is to-day less than it was in 1873, and he proves it by what? By simply taking the amount of foreign trade, the exports and imports. He said nothing with regard to the great decrease in the volume of that trade when he was in power from 1873 to 1879, when it went from $127,000,000 of imports for home consumption down to $72,000,000, when it went from $217,000,000 of total trade down to $153,000,000; and yet although there was a constant and fearful diminution of the volume of trade, measured as he measured it, there was no need then for the heroic remedy! There was no resolution then, embodied as a principle of Government and carried out in practice, that we must have unrestricted reciprocity with the United States. No, wiser counsels prevailed then. Even though these hon. gentlemen in their position as being in the Government had wished for anything like that the solid common sense of the Premier at that time intervened between his party and such absurd nonsense as they seemed to be guilty of when once his leadership was taken from them. He made, as the Government which preceded him made, honest, straightforward and self-respecting proposals to the United States over and over again, and when he exhausted all that honorable proposal could make with reference to the country in this matter of trade, and when some of his followers foolishly pressed on the hon. gentleman to enter into negotiations again and again, Mr. Mackenzie rose in his place in Parliament and said: No, I have made proposals, Canada has taken the initiative again and again, our proposals have been refused; now we will wait until the power to the south of us makes some proposition to us, which we will be prepared to consider and to entertain. Yes, there is this diminution in trade. But let me say something in support of my proposition that the whole truth was not stated. Does not my hon. friend know that the trade of a country is not to be measured by the sum of its imports plus the sum of its exports? Does he not know that it is not a fair comparative measurement to simply give the sum total of the exports and imports without going into the quality of the imports? My hon. friend knows that the great difference between the imports in his period and the imports since 1878 has been this: that while the imports then consisted of articles, not only natural articles but articles upon which all labor had been expended to make them perfect and complete in a foreign country, the cost of which was added to the natural cost and this went to swell the sum total of the imports, to-day the exact opposite is the case in several of the most important particulars, and to-day a large quantity is brought in in the rough, in the less costly form, and it is worked up for the consumption of this people by the labor of own people here. Sir, in the former time ships went to the country for raw sugar. The raw product was taken to Great Britain, and British ships took the freights upon it. That sugar was carried on British railways to British refineries, and British railways had their profits. British workmen worked up the sugar, and the wages were paid to British people. Then it was put in cars and steamships and sent to St. John, Halifax or Montreal with the maximum of cost; and that, Sir, went into the figures upon which the total imports were based. That was the case with 95 per cent, if I mistake not, of the sugar consumed here. To-day of the whole sugar consumed in this country 96 per cent, if I mistake not, comes raw from the places where it is grown; it is brought into our own country, it is carried upon our own railways, worked up in our own refineries, and all the added cost put upon it goes into the pockets of our own people. That, of course, makes a vast difference. So it is with the cotton trade and the woollen trade and with a hundred and one other products, though in a less degree, but yet in some degree. The hon. member for South Oxford took care not to state this fact, but the people will take care to remember it and to ponder it well before they adopt the heroic remedy. Well, Sir, there is another question that is necessary to be put: If our trade is decreasing, how do you explain this fact? In 1875 the total registered tonnage entering into and out of the ports of this country, excluding coasting vessels always, was 9,537,000 tons, in 1876 it was 9,911,000 tons, in 1887 it was a little more than 14,000,000 tons. Did the vessels come in simply for pleasure; were they simply beating about upon the wild and yeasty waves making port now and then for the purpose of getting entered and cleared; or were they here on business and to carry on the commerce of the country? The latter evidently. From 1875 to 1879 the average tonnage of Canada, as I have explained, was 10,700,000 tons, the average tonnage from 1880 to 1887 was 13,700,000 tons, an increase of 3,000,000 a year on an average. What is all this doing? Take the railways. They are far more in number now than they were then; they have far more carrying capacity now than they had formerly, and the records as given in the railway statistics show an immense increase in the freight carried. That increase is something like this: In 1879 the tons of freight carried by railways in Canada were 8,000,000 odd, in 1883 they were nearly 16,000,000, almost double the amount of freight that was carried by our railways in 1879. What does this mean? Is this freight which is being carried down to one terminus put on board some train and carried back to another terminus to show the amount of freight carried or is it real trade? Evidently the latter. My hon. friends premises were wrong and his contention was utterly futile when he strove to make us believe that we should adopt a heroic remedy because of this alleged falling off in the volume of trade. He also says that we have no inter-provincial trade. Why, in relation to this I can refer my Nova Scotia friends to one of their organs—I mean one of their manly organs and not a newspaper organ. If there is any man who has raised a noise about himself in the Maritime Provinces within the last three or four years it has been Attorney General Longley, and Attorney General Longley's great fight with the Confederation, his great fight against "inter-continentalism" as he calls it is, that Nova Scotia for instance, is sending $12,000,000 a year to Ontario to pay for goods which come down to her. What does that mean—inter-provincial trade I think. I will allow my friend to settle that with his friend Attorney General Longley. Well, Sir, is there no other proof of inter-provincial trade than that statement, because if there were none other I should not consider it altogether satisfactory; but I think there is. I find that the Intercolonial Railway carried 175,512 tons of coal in 1887, but that is by no means all the coal which comes from Nova Scotia to Quebec and to the edges of Ontario. Every steamer the season through, as my hon. friend knows, that goes down to Cape Breton, to Sydney and other places there carries coal in this direction. I think there is some inter-provincial trade here. Well, Sir, look again at the sugar trade. There was no inter-provincial trade in sugar in the olden times. I find that last year the Intercolonial Railway carried 143,998 barrels of sugar from the Halifax and Moncton refineries into those upper Provinces. I find that over three-quarters of a million of barrels of flour were carried on the Intercolonial Railway last year, a large proportion of which went to the Maritime Provinces. Why, Sir, my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island is aware of that when the Prince Edward Island Government presented a case against this Government on account of what they thought was a fair claim for compensation, because the communication with the main land had not been satisfactorily carried out, and when it was shown by a report to the Council, which has found its way into the public records, that the amount contributed in Customs by Prince Edward Island was not very much, that statement was met by the counter-statement that Prince Edward Island buys very largely from the other Provinces of Canada and consequently that her import figures are no criterion of the Customs upon the imports or of the amount she contributes in this way to the general revenue. To-day Prince Edward Island buys from Halifax, St. John and Montreal, and there is a large and increasing inter-provincial trade in that direction. I might carry this argument further and further, but I think I have stated enough to show that there is a volume of trade far and above what was spoken of or what is shown by the simple addition of imports and exports which was relied upon by my friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). Again I state he has failed to show the necessity for a heroic remedy by that argument which he has adduced. Those were mainly the arguments he placed before the House. He spoke about debts and taxes. Will he get rid of our debts if we become immersed in this unrestricted reciprocity arrangement? Shall we not have to pay our municipal debts as before? Shall we not have to pay our city debts as before, and shall we not have to pay our Provincial and Dominion debts as before? Shall we not have the costs and charges for government and improvements the same as before? It does not seem to me that there is any prospect of getting rid of them on account of bringing into operation this heroic remedy. Then, Sir, he states that there is no adequate return for public works. What does he mean by "adequate return?" Does he mean that because the great public works in Canada have not paid, in dollars and cents, a revenue, that, therefore, they have not made any adequate return to this great country in its development and extension? If he does, he means something with which I venture to think the majority of this House will not agree. I could quote to him a speech made by the Hon. G. W. Ross not more than two months ago, at a dinner in Toronto, when that gentleman most eloquently portrayed the prosperity of Canada before our illustrious visitor, Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, at a banquet given in that city, and in which Mr. Ross pointed out with pride those great public works, our canals and our railways, which he declared were necessary to and a most invaluable factor in the prosperity and growth of this country, and which he was inclined to believe were a signal success. So much with reference to that. The last argument of all is that the federal constitution is about to collapse, but it is said that if you open up the channel of commerce and take commodities free across the border it will have some sort of a magic, subtle, decisive, and healthy effect, that the threatened collapse will be stayed off, and the members which now appear to be disjointed will be healed and made sane and sound for all time to come. I venture to say, Sir, while reviewing all the arguments adduced by the hon. gentleman that he has not proved necessity for his heroic remedy. On the contrary let hon. gentlemen look at the state of the country as it exists to-day. Was it ever in a sounder state in every way? If you look at its position you will see that the credit of Canada was never higher than it is to-day, when our four per cents reach the overtopping figure of 111, 111½ or 111¾.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. 113 now.

Mr. FOSTER. 113 now my hon. friend informs me. Yes, Sir, if there was something radically wrong which needs that terrible heroic remedy, which needs that revolutionary plaster applied to it in the body politic of the Dominion of Canada, how is it that the wide awake financiers of the great money centres of the world consider the credit of Canada so good that her consols are constantly appreciated in value and constantly sought after by them as collaterals, as stock and securities. There is another important feature in the case. The revenue of this country is improving. A few years ago when, because of certain reasons, there was a deficit for one or two years, there might have been some grounds for saying we needed a remedy. That has passed away and to-day the revenue is more than meeting the ordinary expenditure of the country. Then again, Sir, the extraordinary public works are well provided for. Our canals and our great lines of railway which have cost the country so many millions of dollars are now completed. They are as good for fifty millions of people as they are for five millions, and it will not be necessary to undertake the extra expense of building those public works again. They need not be duplicated. Once built they stand for the use of the people of this country though they be never so numerous or never so prosperous. The trade of this country has improved and is increasing daily; not only the foreign trade but the inter-provincial trade as well, and after all the true prosperity of the country depends more upon the variety and extent of this inter-provincial trade than it does on its foreign trade. The United States of America is one of the best examples of what I say. Again, the manufacturing interests of this country are in a better condition than they have ever been in the history of Canada. Time was four or five years ago when disasters were overtaking our manufacturing industries to a greater or less extent, and when there might have been some ground for claiming on that behalf the need of a heroic remedy. To-day our manufacturing industries are stable and sound, paying fair dividends to those who put money into them, as they should, and giving out their produce to the people at low prices, owing to the competition, as is right and natural, and as they should as well. There is nothing, then, in the state of the manufacturing industries of the country to call for heroic treatment. What about the business of the country? Have you watched the payments at the banks within the past few days? Have they not been satisfactory from Halifax to Victoria? Have you read the reports of the bank managers? Have they not given a good account of the business of the country? But appeal to your own experience: Is it not true that throughout Canada, from one end to the other, though there may be cases of difficulty here and there, as there always will be, the business of the country is on a stable, firm and sound foundation, and the people are satisfied with the prospects from a business point of view. Our soil is giving forth its good crops—abundant crops in some parts of the country—and the crop of this year has brought a fair average return. Taking all these things into consideration as the reverse of the picture which has been shown to us from the other side of the House, have we not good ground for saying that not only is the case of my hon. friend from South Oxford not proven, but that a strong case stands apparent before every hon. member for not disturbing the present relations, on the ground that under present conditions the country is fairly prosperous, and its future seems fairly well assured? Then, Sir, why this cry? I have noted the reason before: It is because hon. gentlemen opposite, having attempted to climb into power, by attaching themselves to this issue and that issue, to this fad and that fad, having made their bids to the people from unworthy motives and on unworthy grounds in many instances, have been shaken off from the skirts of the garments of the country, and find themselves to-day without a cry; and so they ring about again the old gospel of discontent, and appeal to the widest and strongest class we have in this country, hoping to raise and rouse the farming community into discontent, and thinking thereby that they may gain votes in this House, and possibly become a majority instead of a minority in this country. But I have full faith in the intelligence of the farming community, that, if this question comes to be a serious question, to be fought out before them, and both sides of it are fully ventilated, the farmers of this country will hold themselves aloof from the bait held out to them, and will keep themselves to the connections they have to-day, well assured that by so doing their future will not be prejudiced, but, on the contrary, will be prosperous. Now, Sir, the next question that comes is this: The first thing my hon. friend and his supporters had to prove was this, that a heroic remedy of some kind is necessary. The next thing they would have to prove, if they had successfully proved that (which they have not), is that this is the remedy. Now, will hon. gentlemen follow me for a single moment while I deal with the arguments which have been adduced to show that this remedy is the only remedy. What are they? The hon. member for South Oxford said that this was the remedy and the only remedy. How long has he been of that opinion? As a political physician, how long has he been conducting his diagnosis, and at what particular period of time did it terminate in the conclusion that the remedy was unrestricted reciprocity, and not commercial union or free trade? Well, Sir, not long; for speeches are on record, delivered not many months ago, scarcely yet cold, in which hon. gentlemen opposite, not a few, but many of them, were out full fledge and in full blast in favor of commercial union and commercial union alone as the panacea. However, the diagnosis has gone on; different physicians have consulted; they came to a conclusion a few days ago, and they believe now that this is the sole and sovereign remedy. What are the reasons given? The first reason is that it will help everybody and hurt nobody. That would be a very good reason if it were proved; but after the assertion should come proof, and so, although my hon. friend glibly asserted that it would help the fishermen, the miners, the lumbermen and the agriculturists of pluck and brains, he utterly failed to give details of any kind to show the House and the country wherein it would help them or be a special benefit to them. The hon. gentleman said the only classes hurt by it would be: first, the combines; second, the civil service; third, the promoters of elections; and fourth, those who were anxious for piers and wharves and harbors. Now, was my hon. friend really serious? It is such advocacy as that which makes me doubt still whether they intend to make this a real issue, or whether they are not only playing with it to keep themselves in practice until the next eligible thing comes up. The hon. gentleman who says this question should be approached by us as by philosophers and statesmen and not flunkies, makes the bold assertion that everybody in Canada would be helped except these four classes by this proposition being accepted; and yet a breath or two before he stated that it was a grave question, that it would cause great disturbance, that it was a large change of policy that would be grave in its consequences. Combines! If we have a combination in this Dominion of Canada, it is a Lilliput compared with one of the combinations on the other side, for instance the Standard oil combination. Why, Sir, I can just fancy, if it was this side of the House that was asking for a measure to stop combinations and we proposed as a remedy a union in commerce with the United States, how every file of papers published in the United States would be flashed around these seats, and editorial after editorial read to show that combinations in this country bore no comparison with those in the United States. If you wish to remedy combinations, this proposition would indeed be a case of the big fish eating up the little fish, for the small combinations we have here would be swallowed holus bolus by the large combinations on the other side; and what would happen? We to-day have in our hands a remedy for combinations in our own country in this Parliament, if a parliamentary remedy can be got. But if we put ourselves into the hands of a combination which octopus-like stretches its arms over a country, where we have no legislative jurisdiction, where is the remedy so far as we are concerned? And yet the hon. gentleman thinks fewer combinations would be had under unrestricted reciprocity. Does he propose to blot out the Civil Service if we have unrestricted reciprocity? Will we not need the public service of the country to be carried on, and so have a civil service? I say it seems to me the hon. gentleman is not yet really serious in his advocacy of this question. But if he were serious when he introduced it, something intervened between the time of the introduction of the measure and the time when, towards the end of his speech, he made that trivial assertion which took the seriousness out of him and out of his subject. Well, he says, as an additional reason in favor of his proposition, that the poor man in this country pays the highest taxation and that when we get reciprocity he will pay less taxation. Now the hon. gentleman attacks as monstrously unjust, and the hon. member for Queen's (P.E.I.) reiterated the same argument, and challenged proof to the contrary, the statement that the poor man does not pay the heavy weight of taxation in this country. But when the hon. gentleman was asked on this side to point out the articles on which the poor man paid his heavy tax, he let off an extra edition of the fireworks he always keeps on hand, and took great care to aim no straight bullet at the mark which was put before him. I challenge him now or any hon. gentleman on that side to go into particulars, and to prove, in the first place, that the poor man pays the weight of taxation; and to prove, in the second place, that if he does, unrestricted reciprocity will remove that weight in any measure. Look at the question as it stands. What does the poor man buy on which he pays this heavy taxation? Take, first, the fairly well-to-do class. Take, for instance, the farmer. On what does he pay taxes? Every article that goes into the food of his family, so far as their daily wants are concerned, is raised on his own farm, and on these articles he does not pay a cent of taxation. Then the large proportion of the clothing he and his family wear is also paid for out of the products of his own farm and no taxes paid. With him the luxuries he buys are the minimum whilst with the wealthy man the luxuries rise to the maximum, and in this country the practice is followed of putting the weight of taxation on the luxuries and taking it off the necessities. Oh, but my hon. friend says, there is the tariff on coarse woollens, and consequently the man who wears these woollens pays a heavy tax on every yard he uses. Does he? The farmer has sheep on his own farm, which he often shears himself, and whose wool he has often made up in the mill of his own locality, and his family wear the clothes thus manufactured. Where is the tax that is paid on these? The statement that the tax is paid in this case can only be affirmed on two grounds: First, that all the woollen clothing worn in this country is manufactured in large establishments, or else is imported; and second, that that which is manufactured in the large manufactories, notwithstanding the competition of imported goods, pays the tariff that is put on the imported articles. But will that be remedied by unrestricted reciprocity, which is to open up a channel of trade between this country and the United States? How will the tax be taken off the woollens worn by the farmers, or the other materials he uses for his wear, since in the United States a heavier tax is imposed on these articles than is imposed here? We are asked to enter into commercial relations with a country which has a higher tariff than we have, and in the name of common sense I would ask how then are the taxes here to be lowered? The proposition falls to the ground of its own weight: first ~~that the poor man pays the tax~~; and second, ~~that the tax will be taken off if unrestricted reciprocity be the rule~~. But the hon. gentleman says it will suit Great Britain and the United States, and my hon. friend was not content with drawing a picture of this country in hues of the very blackness of despair, but he must needs have his fling at the mother country as well. And in these days of troublous times, when forces are at work which at any time may create a great conflagration, the outcome of which no man can at present see, and when even the utterances of men in a Parliament of this kind, have their effect more or less in the wide world in which they are read, the hon. gentleman must go out of his way to taunt Great Britain with having no ally on the continent of Europe among the first-class powers. Sir, the position of Great Britain has been well-taken and well-maintained in the past. The institutions of Britain are, to-day, stronger than ever they were before; the power of the Anglo-Saxon race the wide world over, is as great as ever, while the spirit of enterprise of our race displayed around this whole globe of ours, and which strengthens and enobles the British power, taken collectively as a whole, has never been manifested to greater perfection than it is to-day. Great Britain will take good care to hold her proud position, and it was not manly or statesmanlike in the hon. gentleman, occupying the position he does, to question in this House her ability to retain the great influence she has always exercised in European affairs. But supposing Great Britain has no ally among the first-class powers in Europe, does the hon. gentleman propose to make for her an ally of the United States, and to embroil the United States in the European entanglements which affect Great Britain alone? Does he think that the United States, which have kept themselves religiously aloof from European entanglements, will make an alliance with Great Britain, and thus run the risk of involving themselves with Great Britain, in all the European complications that are liable to rise at any moment? What influence the great powers of reasoning of the hon. gentleman may have on the government of the United States in this respect, I cannot say, but judging from the specimens of his logic we have heard here within the last twenty-four hours, I am inclined to think his arguments will not stir the United States from the position they have hitherto maintained. What a fine method that would be of making an ally for the mother country, by putting ourselves in commercial union with the United States and raising a discriminating tariff wall against our mother land. The proposal does seem odd. There may be some abstruse meaning in it that we cannot seize, but of which the hon. member for South Oxford is fully aware. But he says, we will not discriminate largely against Great Britain, and this afternoon, I think I heard him say that our trade with Great Britain would be actually improved. Just analyse that for a moment. Here are 5,000,000 of Canadians, here is an open channel of trade between Canada and the United States, and here is an hon. gentleman asserting that the trade between the two countries will grow to $300,000,000 a year. Now what will happen? Between the United States and this country, there is no tariff, while between this country and Great Britain there is a tariff of fairly good proportions, say 22 or 25 per cent. We enter this commercial alliance. We create a trade between the two countries that will reach $300,000,000 a year; and then, when we grow rich and wax fat and sleek, the hon. gentleman says he will turn to our own mother country and import goods from her, on which we will pay the extra Customs duty, just for the sake of showing that in the long run our trade with Great Britain will not suffer. That is a most unreasonable proposition. The currents of trade, if they be free and advantageous to ourselves, will be kept for the sake of the advantages they offer, and it would be proved by the experiment, if the experiment should be ever unfortunately made, that our trade with Great Britain would dwindle to almost nothing, because the odds are against our trading with the country on whose goods we put a tariff of 25 per cent. as compared with a country between which and ourselves there is no tariff. But the hon. gentleman says, if we consider advisable to discriminate against Great Britain, we have the right to do so. We have our own interests and they are paramount, and that assertion was made still stronger to-day by the hon. member for Queen's, P. E. I. (Mr. Davies), and it was echoed by my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). Now, I have two or three links in a chain of reasoning that I would like the hon. gentlemen to follow, if I can clearly express it. The hon. member for South Oxford says: If it does discriminate against Great Britain, we have a right to do it, our own interests are paramount, which is equivalent to saying, on a fair interpretation, that, whenever the time comes that it is better for us to do thus, and so in commercial matters, we have a right to do so, and it is our duty to do so in our own interests; and that is made stronger by a second assertion that we owe nothing to Great Britain but charity for the atrocious blundering she has been guilty of in regard to our interests. There is first the statement that we have nothing but our own interests to regard because they are paramount, and secondly, there is another link which would make us understand that the paramount idea of our own interests has been overridden by Great Britain. And then the

hon. gentleman goes on to clench all that by saying that there never was a time in her own history when Canada could not have bettered her condition by linking her interests with the United States of America. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, and I ask hon. gentlemen around these boards to tell me which is the most honorable position, that occupied by my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) or that occupied by my hon. friend from the City of St. John, N.B. (Mr. Ellis). I can imagine a colloquy in the corridors between my friend from St. John and my friend from South Oxford. My friend from St. John says: Sir Knight, you tell me that our own interests should be paramount? Yes. You tell me that we owe Great Britain nothing but charity, and very little of that? Yes. You tell me that there never was any time when Canada's interests would not have been better served by linking them with the United States of America? Yes. Then, why do you not say at once: Let us link our fortunes with the United States of America, and why do you not be as brave and honest about it as I am? The only difference between these two hon. gentlemen is—and it is to the credit of my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Ellis)—that he believes thus and so, and has the courage to express it, even though it may be unpalatable to the gentlemen around him and to the people among whom he lives, while my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) contends and works in the same line, but he is afraid of outside opinion and gilds it over and says: Oh, no, I am not an annexationist, I do not believe in annexation. That is the only difference between them, and I think it is in favor of my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Ellis) and I willingly give it to him. Then we are told as a reason why this is the peculiar and only remedy, that it will give the United States a great home market in Canada. The hon. gentleman believes in the doctrine of equivalents. He is superlatively honest, and he would not take anything without giving something in return, and he is perforce driven by his own innate spirit of right to maintain the argument that there will be equivalents, and one of those is that the United States will get a large home market in Canada. Let us reason that out. There are five millions of people in Canada. They buy all they are able to now. They buy that from certain persons now. My hon. friend from South Oxford says to the people of the United States. Adopt this scheme, and you will get a largely extended home market in Canada. What will happen? If they get that home market, the people of Canada cannot buy more than they are able to. It will be simply a displacement, and the people of the United States, the merchants of the United States, will get what our merchants and our industrial centres now get. In what will they find a home market in this country? For their coal, in Nova Scotia. If they do, I ask my hon. friend whether he can find a market for American coal in Nova Scotia, without displacing an equal quantity of coal brought up from the mines in Nova Scotia, and, if he displaces Nova Scotia coal by American coal, I ask him what becomes of the men who, with drill, pick and lamp, earn that which supports their families and builds up their villages by mining the coal in the depths under the sea in the Province of Nova Scotia. They will only be able to obtain a market by displacing what is now provided by our own people, and, if they get a market in regard to manufactures, in regard to agricultural produce, in regard to sugar, they can only do it by displacing those who are now carrying on these trades as Canadians, who are improving Canadian industries, with profits to the Canadian people. The hon. gentleman should adopt the dictum of Attorney General Longley, who says that, instead of getting ten or twelve million dollars' worth from Upper Canada, they will get it from the United States. The importers from Boston and New York will gain, but what about the merchants and manufacturers of Halifax and the Lower Provinces, and Mr. FOSTER.

what about the millers and wheat growers in the other Provinces? I have not the time to carry out this reasoning, but hon. gentlemen can carry it out for themselves, and they will come to the conclusion that in nearly every case every dollar's worth of goods obtained from the United States in the way of an increased home market in Canada will displace an equal amount which has come generally through Canadian channels. That is what the apostle of commercial union declares. Mr. Wiman lets out a great deal of the truth, and sometimes he lets out the truth where it gets all over. Speaking in Newark, N. J., he says:

"If new markets for relief of over-production, created by the stimulant of protection, can be made accessible"—

What does that mean? It means simply that the producing power of the United States is over and above what is necessary to furnish its own market, and can easily have a surplus to send into other countries and other markets. Where would it be sent? Into Canada, says he. To do what? To displace an equal amount now furnished by the woollen and cotton manufacturers of Canada——"without disturbing in the slightest the perfect equilibrium of existing taxation, clearly it is the duty of the protectionist to secure these markets, not only because of the immediate outlet which they afford, but as an illustration of the benefits of his favorite policy. Further, if these new markets, secured by the protectionist without sacrifice, are got at the expense of a free trade nation, so much the better. This would be one of the results of commercial union. The total trade of Canada, a portion of the British Empire, is about $200,000,000. Two-thirds of it, it is supposed, can be secured by the United States, by simply lifting up the Customs line that now runs through the middle of the continent, and stretching it right around the continent. This would not only admit to more than half the continent all American manufacturers, but it would create in their favor, in one part of the British Empire, a discrimination against the manufacturers of another part of the British Empire. Can anything be more attractive to the average American protectionist than this advantage over the pauper labor of Europe?"

And Mr. Hitt, who has been glorified as one of the joint laborers in this heroic remedy which is to be applied by the hon. gentleman, states this a little more fully. In speaking to western men—and he is a western man—at a great banquet, he declared:

"We in the west would like you manufacturers of New England to have access to that great market of Canada. With a Reciprocity Treaty or, better still, Commercial Union, you will have the preference over English, French and German goods, and in two years' time after its adoption, goods from Yankee manufacturers will be in every retail store from Montreal to Victoria."

Well, that is perfectly right as a matter to be striven after by our friends in the United States. But it remains for us seriously to consider whether it is for our interest, as a country, that we should lay our industries at this particular time, open to that competition. But again he says that it would give us the United States market. Now, that was pretty well ventilated by my colleague last night, and I shall not traverse the ground made by him. I simply draw your attention to one of the sportively imaginative statements of the hon. member for South Oxford. He talked about our railways. He said we had long lines but they were not carrying much, but just let unrestricted reciprocity come into force, and our railways might carry more to the borders and less to the seaboard, and they would speedily quadruple freights and quadruple their earnings. Well, that is a rosy statement. Did he give one iota of proof which would lead us to believe that this would be the case? Has he not stated to this House as one of the attractive points of his programme that there are large American cities along the border, that our provinces lie contiguous to these cities. But remark that if this project were carried out, you would only have a constant stream of traffic along our lines of railway from one of these countries into another. To-day, Sir, the great traffic of our railway consists in what it carries from points distant far in the west to points distant far in the east, from one Province to another Province; by this proposition you would cut off, a large extent, that great long line of traffic, you would have a criss cross traffic in which the lines of intercommunication would be changed out of their present course by running between this country and the United States in order to get to these great cities. So much for the rosy idea of quadrupling freights and earnings of the railways of this country. With these remarks I leave that branch of my subject, thinking that I have fairly well proved that this remedy which has been proposed is not the best thing for the people of Canada. There remains one question which I shall state briefly, and that is: Is this a favorable time in which to make a proposition for closer relations between us and the United States? My hon. friend says yes, it is the happy, happy now? And he goes on to give his reasons why it is the happy now by saying that now is the time when tariff reductions are imminent. How far are tariff reductions imminent, so far as we can see? They are imminent only so far as the Tariff Bill brought down by Mr. Mills of Texas is concerned. That, Sir, is the extreme limit to which the people of the United States who are most favorable to the reduction in the tariff, dare to go, thinking to carry with them the support of Congress and the Senate which is necessary for the measure. If you scan that measure carefully you will find that, though on some few things the tariff is reduced, on others it is left far above the present average tariff of the Dominion of Canada, so that the reduction of the tariff, imminent as he says, is not a very great reduction of the tariff at the best. But he says the President, in his message, invited to these negotiations. Now, that is not a sufficient statement to go to the country. It is a sufficient statement to go to Parliament, because this Parliament is well conversant with the difference in powers between the Executive in the United States and the Executive in this country. If the Cabinet of this country, through any one of its members, or through the Governor General, made a proposition, it would be bound to carry that proposition through, and the people would consider that the country was pledged because the Government staked its life upon it. But in the United States it is very different. The President and his executive officers are, in a measure, totally distinct and outside of the Congress and Senate of the United States. They may make suggestions, they may send down messages, as they do from time to time, to be entirely ignored by the Congress and Senate, unless the feeling in those bodies is in their favor. Why, we had a President's message with reference to the fishery question, asking the United States' Senate to appoint a commission. It was sent down to that body, and the Senate rejected it by a vote of 35 to 10. So it is not indubitable proof that the United States is ready to meet this proposition, because an invitation happens to be put in the President's message. Again, it was stated that Mr. Bayard's invitation to Sir Charles Tupper showed that they were ready for it. Mr. Bayard's invitation to Sir Charles Tupper was previous to the conference. When the conference came together then they were treating in a closer capacity, and the proposition was made by Sir Charles Tupper on behalf of the British Commissioners that they should approach this matter on the basis of a general commercial adjustment between the two countries, and to that Mr. Bayard and his co-plenipotentiaries gave a decisive and categorical answer in the negative, and did it, why? Because, they said, in the present condition of affairs, it would be impossible to carry it through Congress and the Senate, which is necessary to give it life. Could anything more clearly show that the public opinion of the United States is not ripe for a proposition of this kind? The hon. gentleman again says that another indication is Mr. Butterworth's Bill, and Mr. Hitt's Bill. I have not time to lay before you the documents that I have to show you the fact that, for years, Bills and resolutions like Mr. Hitt's and Mr. Butterworth's, in all essential particulars, have been introduced over and over again in the Congress and in the Senate, and have never got further than a committee, or an adverse report from a committee. So these indications are not strong ones. He blames the Government, however, for having delayed to adjust the fishery question on Mr. Bayard's proposition until the presidential year. The Government of Canada delayed nothing. In 1855 they made a proposition, and the British Government made a proposition in their behalf, looking to a speedy conference between the two countries to undertake negotiations and settle this matter. That was pressed over and over again by Great Britain, and just so soon as the United States accepted this proposition, just so soon that proposition was taken advantage of by the British Government. But it was not delayed a single moment so far as Canada and Great Britain was concerned. It did happen to come off in the presidential year, and for that, my hon. friend finds fault with the Government. Yet he brings down a proposition asking Parliament to affirm a resolution in favor of a certain course, and instructing the Government, in this presidential year, here and now, to undertake negotiations with the United States in reference to that proposition. If a presidential year is bad in one respect for the negotiation of the treaty, why it is not bad in another respect? Now, I would rather liken my hon. friend to Homer than to do him the discourtesy of likening him, as one of his supporters did this afternoon, to Goliath.

An hon. MEMBER. Not Goliath, but Jove.

Mr. FOSTER. The Jove of his party. But, likening him to Homer, we may well say that for once he has been found nodding. Now, Sir, having gone over these points, I beg simply to conclude by making one or two remarks with reference to a point which the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) brought up this afternoon. I am sorry he is not in his place in the House to hear my criticism. My hon. friend thought that the Minister of the Interior was somewhat confused last night in his speech, and that he forgot he was talking about unrestricted reciprocity, and broke off into saying something about commercial union. I think there was great excuse for some such confusion, if any such confusion existed. My hon. friend, no doubt, had two or three hon. gentlemen in his eye, and among them he had probably the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), and he was thinking about an utterance delivered by the hon. gentleman. Speaking at Charlotte-town before the Board of Trade, not many weeks ago, the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) made this statement:

"Under commercial union trade would flow freely between this country and the United States, as it now flows between the several States; while, as against the rest of the world there would be a uniform tariff, to be mutually agreed upon by the two countries comprised in the union. 'Unrestricted reciprocity' would differ from commercial union in this respect: that while under it there would be perfectly free trade between the two countries, each country would retain the right to frame its own tariff as against the rest of the world. Canada, for instance, might have a 25 per cent. tariff, while that of the United States might be one of 35 per cent. The immediate consequence would be that imports to the United States, instead of being carried to the great ports of the United States, would be taken to the States by way of Montreal. To this the States, whose people are not arrant fools, would never consent. An unrestricted reciprocity, although it would suit us as well as commercial union, was, therefore, impracticable."

Now, in what position does the hon. gentleman place himself? Is he an honest man, is he putting this question for honest purposes before this Parliament, or is he doing as he accuses us of doing, dangling a spangle before the eyes of the people? I will believe, in the first place, that he is an honest man, and that, when he took up the two lines of commercial union and unrestricted reciprocity, he believed what he said, and he had good grounds for the belief, that the people of the United States, unless they were arrant fools, would never accept unrestricted reciprocity. Well, Sir, in what position, if he was an honest man at that time, is he placing himself now? He comes here and argues before this Parliament and asks this Parliament to adopt a measure, to show its whole hand, to go, as it were, the whole figure to keep nothing back, to state out and out to the people of the United States: We will give you everything in exchange, if you will let us take everything into your country as an exchange; and yet, in the face of that, he says—to himself of course—the United States will not accept such a proposition as that, they are not such arrant fools, and unless they were arrant fools, they would never take unrestricted reciprocity. Now, Sir, do you find any fault with any hon. gentleman on this side being slightly confused when he was looking into the eye of the hon. member who, not many weeks ago, made that statement, and has never disclaimed that statement until to-day? Or, if it is true that he believes what he said here, is it not a reprehensible proceeding for a public man to attempt to put before Parliament and the country, and press to a solution a proposition, all the time believing that the neighboring power will never accept the proposition, but will certainly reject it unless they are arrant fools, which we know the people of the United States are not? There were one or two other statements made by the hon. member for Queen's to which I desire to refer, especially to one of those strong generalisations in which he is apt to indulge respecting the poverty of the people of Prince Edward Island. He goes on, turn by turn, till he reaches the climax, and the climax is this: That the people of Prince Edward Island, the farmers there especially, are living without hope—not only in Prince Edward Island, but in the Maritime Provinces—they are becoming poorer and poorer, losing hope and falling into despair. And yet I turn up the blue books of the Dominion and look at the list which shows the earnings put into the Savings Bank of Prince Edward Island and what do I find? In 1874 they had a balance of $336,000 to their credit there, in 1879 it had climbed up to $420,000, to-day it is $2,200,000. There is a paltry increase of $84,000, in that halcyon period measured by the time when the hon. gentlemen opposite were in power in this country, and there is a massive saving of $1,750,000 which had been placed there by the poor people of Prince Edward Island in the time covered from 1880 to 1887; and yet they are living without hope, ready to plunge over into the fatal gulf of despair, they are entirely without aspiration and entirely without prospects for the future. Looking at these things it seems to me that the position which this Parliament may well take is something like this: The measure which has been proposed is a heroic measure according to the statement of the hon. gentleman who introduced it into this House. He has already failed to prove, in the first place, that a necessity for a heroic measure exists; in the second place, he has failed to prove that this is a measure which would be beneficial to Canada; and yet he asks this Government to leave the old and beaten policy and take this bantling of his own. On the other side you have the policy of the Government which from the first has been stable and has been proved. It has been this: To cultivate the most friendly relations between this country and the kindred people who live to the south of us, to seek in every way to have as fair and as free commercial relations as it is possible for the two peoples honorably to agree upon. There has not been a time since 1848 till to-day when the proposition has not stood out freely and fairly before the people of the United States something like this: Come and let us reason together and place our commercial and reciprocal relations on a fair and honorable basis for both of us. If ever those relations once established for a period have been broken, it has never been at the instance and wish of the Government or this Parliament but always at the instance and wish of our cousins on the south of the border. Hon. gentlemen tell us that it is nothing, that an Act of Parliament stands on the Statute-book offering reciprocal trade between this country and the United States the moment the United States is willing to accept it. I take that statement and I say to hon. gentlemen opposite: Suppose the United States had put a clause in their Tariff Act saying, the very moment Canada makes natural products free the United States will make them free, would we not have a pressure which it would be totally impossible for us to resist? What can be a stronger expression of opinion than an Act of Parliament voicing the opinion of the people, which has stood before the people of the United States for some time? This stood before the people of the United States, and in all our relations there has been dominant in this Parliament and with this Government since it has been in power, the desire to have as free and extended and cordial relations as are possible in the interests of both countries. On the other hand we have felt, and the Government has introduced the policy which they carry out, that failing that and if we cannot have extended reciprocal relations with the United States, the thing for us to do is to carve out a policy of our own which will stimulate industries in our own country, which will build up inter-provincial trade, which will give us a national standard of independence of our own, and which will put us on our feet in the future as it has contributed to our self-respect in the past. That policy is dear to the heart of the country. The fireworks let off about corruption and the way in which elections are carried on are very good for a slight blaze, but they go out soon and a perfume remains which is not of the sweetest or most pleasant kind. The real facts of the case about the elections are that the people after the most thorough discussion were roused to look into this question, and after giving to the Government a mandate in 1878 to foster the industries of this country by reason of a protective tariff they enjoyed the benefits for four years and when this Government went back to the people, the people renewed that mandate and enjoyed the benefits for another four years. The same people who in 1873 returned us into power, in 1887 sent this Government and the party which is with the Government back, with a strong staple majority, asking them and pledging them to preserve the interests which they had confided in their charge and the trust with which they had commissioned them in 1878 and in 1882. The Government feels, and the party feels, and the country in the main feels that this is the policy which is staple, fair, and honest. While at the same time, we look after our own industries we are willing to meet every fair proposition that is made for extended trade relations with the people to the south of us. In this regard then and with those remarks I beg leave to move the following amendment:

That Canada in the future as in the past is desirous of cultivating and extending trade relations with the United States in so far as they may not conflict with the policy of fostering the various industries and interests of the Dominion which was adopted in 1879 and which has since received in so marked a manner the sanction and approval of the people.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). Mr. Speaker, this I consider to be the most important question that has come before the people of the Dominion of Canada for many a day, and, Sir, as I belong to the agricultural community and as I have always been opposed to the policy that has been adopted by the Government of this country, as a policy that has borne hard on the laboring classes, which I represent, than any other policy in the Dominion, I would not be performing my duty to my constituents were I to listen to this debate without lifting my voice in favor of the resolution which has been offered in this House by the Hon. Sir Richard John Cartwright, member of Parliament for the south riding of Oxford. I believe, Sir, that this resolution if carried into effect will do more to quieten the discontent that exists in Canada to-day than all the National Policies in existence. We have been asked, Sir, to show on this side of the House that the remedy we offer will put an end to the large amount of emigration going out of the country into the United States. I would ask the hon. gentleman opposite if the hon. leader of the Government in his famous speech at Parkhill did not attempt to prove this would be the remedy when he stated as one of the reasons why the policy should be enforced, that he wanted the 500,000 of our own people in the workshops of the United States, in Canada, and that by adopting a policy that would re-adjust the tariff and foster the industries that object would be attained, and the agricultural industry would be benefited as we would be able to keep our own people at home to consume our own products. The hon. gentleman referred to a great many other blessings which would ensue in case of a reform of the tariff. Hon. gentlemen opposite must see before this time that the National Policy has entirely failed to confer the blessings which were promised to the people of this country. I would just say this in relation to what the First Minister has said: "That what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander." Since one policy has failed, since it has taken out of this country a great many more people than the policy that was followed by the Government of which the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie was the head, I hold that it is time we ought to have some change. We have been asked the reason why we bring up such a measure as this, and why we ask for this redress under the present circumstances? My answer to this would be that the agricultural industry in this country is now in a very languishing condition, that the prices of our products are very low indeed, and that we are not receiving prices equal to what we had before the National Policy was adopted, when compared with the prices received by the people on the other side of the line. We are paying a greater amount for the goods we consume than we ought to pay if it were not for this policy, and the agricultural community one might say is cut at both ends. The prices of their produce is reduced and whatever they have to purchase they have to pay a larger price for. I will pass on very rapidly over a few of the statements made by the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. He tried to show that there was no danger of nature being too slow and he went on to show how nature had been overcome between this Province and our Pacific Provinces, how it had been overcome between the United States and her Pacific provinces, and he argued that trade was not a geographical matter. But, Sir, in that trade between the United States and her Pacific Provinces there was no iron wall of protection between the Eastern and Western States, neither was there between the Eastern Provinces of the Dominion of Canada and her Pacific Provinces. I venture the statement that if Great Britain enforced such a policy towards the East Indies as the Government of Canada has adopted here, that the trade of Great Britain in that country would never have attained to the position it has attained to at the present day. It was by such a course as we now ask for in the proposition laid before this House that the trade of that country has been promoted. I would just say that the very fact that Canada sends less than $5,000,000 annually into the British market to-day, while it sends $22,000,000 into the markets of the United States, although a tariff of over 16 per cent. against us in the one case and a free market in the other, is proof positive that natural channels will be followed in spite of all the tariffs that can be framed. Another argument, which I was sorry to see the hon. Minister of Marine pass over as he did, was that relating to inter-provincial trade. I think the hon. member for South Oxford stated yesterday that $340,000 more had been spent on the Intercolonial Railway within the last seven months than the earnings of the railway amounted to, and I think I saw about a year ago the statement that the Intercolonial Railway cost in 12 months $160,000 more than it had earned, showing that the inter-provincial trade is not growing, but has decreased; and I was astonished that the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries did not apply himself to this argument. He dealt a great deal more in what I may term blustering statements than in arguing the question. Now, Sir, we were told that there was as great a diminution in the population of some of the United States as there has been in this country. I do not believe any hon. gentlemen opposite can rise and mention any State in the Union, similarly situated to Ontario, in which there has been as small a gain in population, as there has been in that Province. I have a statement here showing that in 1880 the population of Ontario was 1,683,283, and in 1884 1,754,044, a gain of 70,161, while the State of Michigan, situated similarly to Ontario, but not having as many natural advantages, during the same period gained 219,163. That State and the Province of Ontario are nearly equal in population, while in area and fertility the Province of Ontario far surpasses the State of Michigan. Then, Sir, we were told that the volume of trade was less in 1883 than it was in 1887. I have here a statement of the volume of trade between the United States and Canada between the years of the Reciprocity Treaty. I find that in 1873 the total volume of trade between the United States and Canada amounted to $93,915,716, while in 1886 it only amounted to $84,027,223. But going back to the year 1866, the year in which the Reciprocity Treaty ended, I find that the volume of trade between Canada and the United States in that year amounted to $84,685,361, or $600,000 more than it did in 1886, showing clearly that the trade of this country with the United States is not growing as it ought to. The farmers of this country can look back to the time of that Reciprocity Treaty from 1854 to 1866, and we can remember the great strides the country made at that time, and the prosperity that was enjoyed by every household in Canada, especially among the agricultural population; and we believe, Sir, that unless there is a remedy found for the present state of affairs in Canada there will be a severe strain put upon Confederation. To show what the feeling is in the County of Huron, to which I belong, I will just read a letter which I received yesterday from a friend in that county:

"I am pleased to learn that the Opposition are making unrestricted reciprocity with the United States one of the planks in their platform. I think it will be very popular. I also think that if we do not get something in that line before many years there will be a strong annexation party in this country, and I fear your correspondent will be added to that number."

Such is the feeling that pervades not merely the eastern and western Provinces of this country, but that is spreading rapidly among the agricultural population of the Province of Ontario. We are told that we pay no taxes on our own wool from which we make our own cloth. I can remember the statement by the hon. First Minister in his famous Parkhill speech, that if we had the National Policy all our own cloth would be made out of wool of our own raising. But I can tell him his prophecy has not been fulfilled, for whereas we imported in 1878 $8,000,000 worth of wool, we imported in 1886 $11,000,000. The effect of this on the agricultural population is, that we have to pay the whole duty even on the goods manufactured in Canada. In conversation a few days before I came to Ottawa with a large importer of dry goods from the British market, I put the question to him: "What is the effect of the tariff on goods manufactured in this country, and at what percentage can goods manufactured in Canada be purchased below goods manufactured in the English market?" His reply was that on goods purchased in Canada similar to the goods purchased in Scotland he had to pay the whole duty, that is, an average of 27 per cent. on round lot of dry goods, which amounted to 33 per cent. to the consumer, and that the only margin left over the cost of the Canadian manufactured goods compared with the cost of the goods manufactured in Britain was something like 2 per cent., that is the cost of freight and insurance; so that the statement cannot be contradicted that we have to pay the duty, and that what we pay goes into the pockets of the manufacturer. Yet I do not believe that even the manufacturers have benefited to the extent that they might, because I believe very large amounts of money have been sunk in manufacturing industries for which there is not sufficient demand in this country. I will venture the statement that no large capitalist will ever come into this country and invest any large sum of money unless we have a larger market. Then the question comes, where are we to find this larger market? Because we find that our export of manufactured goods was some $1,300,000 less last year than it was in 1878. This shows that our manufactures are not keeping pace with the improvements which are going on in manufacturing in other countries, and that the National Policy has had the effect of destroying the market in other countries for Canadian manufactured goods. There has been a good deal said with respect to the decreased value of land in the Province of Ontario. I will say, as a farmer, that this is, perhaps, a subject with which I am better acquainted than many others, as I have had an opportunity of testing the value of lands in the County of Huron and in the County of Perth which very few farmers have had. I had the honor to be appointed twelve months ago to value the whole County of Perth for equalisation purposes. I went over it along with another gentleman and put a value on every lot of land there, and I can assure you, Sir, that the reduction in the value of land in that county amounts to 10 and 15, and in some cases more, per cent. I am certain that the same reduction has taken place in the County of Huron, to which I have the honor to belong. In that county we had in 1886, according to the latest reports, 2,600 people less than in 1878, showing plainly that the country is not prosperous. There are eight counties in Ontario which have 3,000 less population than they had in 1878; yet we are told that the country is in a healthy, prosperous and thriving condition. I would ask what is the cause of the hard times we have in Canada? I need not go further back than 1882, to show the decrease in the value of crops in the Province of Ontario. In Ontario, in 1882, the value of the crops of wheat, barley, oats, rye and peas was $39,682,065, but when we come to 1886 we find the value is but $58,000,683. Now, this is a very large reduction indeed, and a reduction for which we cannot entirely blame the Government, because there is no government in the world, in my opinion, that can remedy this, although we have been told by the First Minister in one of his famous speeches that the clerk of the weather was a good Conservative. In 1878 the right hon. gentleman said the clerk of the weather was on their side, and would give a good crop, because he knew the Conservatives were going into power. But if he was a good Conservative, he must, as all Conservatives have, overdone the matter, and has not since given us the fine sunshine and the great crops which it was predicted he would supply. If the right hon. gentleman had the power of obtaining all those blessings for us, what is the reason he has forgotten at this time to give the good crops, the clear skies, the good prices, the abundance of employment and the high wages, which, in 1878, he predicted would follow the advent of his party to power. Why has he allowed hundreds of thousands of our most promising youths of our native-born population to go and settle across the lines? There is another statement which the hon. gentleman made in that famous speech to which I have alluded, and that is, that it would not pay at that time to build mills in Canada, and the reason he gave was that they had a very small amount of customers on this side, but that on the other side of the line they would have 40,000,000 of consumers. If that argument held good then, it must hold doubly good to-day. Not only that, but we find that under the influence of the National Policy flour which has fallen, since 1881, only 90 cents per barrel in the United States, has fallen in the Dominion over $2 a barrel, so that no miller present would be wise in building a mill in this country as long as the present condition of things, under which the value of produce and of labor has fallen so considerably, continues. Now, I will address myself a little further to the question of the crops. In 1886, the value of the crops was $31,361,982, and these sums that I have mentioned are less than it was in 1882. But I will go further and state that the crop of 1887 is less too. According to the quarterly report of the Bureau of Industries issued in the month of August, we had 10,000,000 less bushels of wheat in 1887 than in 1886. We had 5,000,000 less oats, 2,136,000 less barley and 3,000,000 less peas, and if you take these at the market prices, you will find a loss of $30,000,000 on the grain crop of 1887 as compared with that of 1882. That taken from the sum of $58,000,000, which was the value of the crop of 1882, reduces the crop of 1887 to a little over $45,000,000, or very little more than one-half the crop of 1882. Yet we are told we are prosperous; yet we are told that the most prosperous people in the world are the farmers of Ontario to-day. The hon. the Minister of the Interior told us that, but I can well remember that this gentleman's sympathies are not to any great extent with the farmers of the Dominion. I think he made a speech in Montreal at a banquet there, and I was a little astonished at the statements he then made. He said he had always considered that the prosperity of the Dominion lay with the merchants of Canada, and the commercial travellers, the future merchants. Hon. gentlemen opposite ignore the great wealth producers of the Dominion, the agriculturists and the laborers. They ignore them entirely, and it appears this class is only here for the purpose of having a large amount of taxation imposed on it, without receiving in any shape whatever any corresponding benefit. But our loss does not stop there. We were told by the hon. the Minister of the Interior that the horses and cattle in Ontario were on the increase. But in the report I received last August, we have 70,682 fewer horses and cattle than in 1883, 214,788 fewer sheep, 25,305 fewer hogs, and yet we are the most prosperous people in the Dominion. But the effects of the National Policy do not stop here. I do not hold it responsible in every case, but I say it has reduced the prices of produce. In 1881, the price of flour in the United States was $3.66 per barrel, but when we come to 1886, we find it was then $4.69, while in Montreal, it was $5.64 in 1881, a difference of 21 cents per barrel compared with the United States; but when we come to 1886, we find it is only worth in Montreal $3.56 a barrel, or over $2 less than what it was in the United States in 1881. Take wheat, and you find that in 1881, wheat in the United States was $1.11 per bushel, in 1886, it was 87 cents, showing a reduction in value of 24 cents, while flour in Canada had fallen 97 cents. Corn had fallen 6 cents per bushel from 1881 to 1886. Then, when we come to Canada, we find that flour had fallen from $5.64 to $3.56, or $2.08 against 97 cents in the United States, while wheat had fallen 48 cents in Canada against 24 cents in the United States, and corn had fallen 17 cents in Canada against 6 cents in the United States. If hon. gentlemen ask where I got this information, I can tell them that it was not from any wicked Grit or falsifying Reformer, but that the information is contained in a record which the hon. the Minister of Agriculture has put into the hands of every member of this House, and from that statement hon. gentlemen can see that we, the farmers of Ontario, have been robbed to a great extent by the National Policy. I was very happy to hear the Minister of the Interior state yesterday that in 1886 we raised 27,500,000 bushels of wheat in the Province of Ontario. It was a statement I had intended to make myself, and I now corroborate it.

For what reason do I corroborate it? I corroborate it for the purpose of showing that half of that wheat would be consumed by the farmer and the other half would be put on the market, and that, as the price of the home market is regulated by the amount we get for what we export, and as we were reduced 24 cents per bushel more than the wheat was reduced in the United States, if we take the half of that wheat at 13,500,000 bushels, we find that the Province of Ontario lost \$3,310,763 on the price of that wheat during that season. Taking all this into consideration, is it to be wondered at that the farmers of Ontario are in a languishing condition. What is it that gives value to farming property? What is it that gives value to land? Is it not the value of what we raise, and, as that has sunk 50 per cent. since 1882, is it not reasonable to say that the value of land has shrunk also? I was surprised to hear the hon. Minister say that the value of land had increased by \$13,000,000 over 1886 in the Province of Ontario. His statement was in reality correct, but the hon. gentleman did not treat the subject fairly. He ought to have taken an average of a few years, and, if he had done that, he would have gone back to 1883 and would have shown that in that year the land in the Province of Ontario was worth \$654,693,035, and when he came to 1886 he would have found that the land was worth \$648,009,828, or a reduction of \$6,783,197 in the value of the land during that time. He would also have shown that after 1883, 300,000 acres of land had been brought under the assessment rolls in the older counties of Ontario and 400,000 acres of land had been cleared. If you take the 300,000 acres at \$29 of value you have \$7,688,000, and if you take the 100,000 acres besides, which were cleared at \$20 an acre, which would not be an extravagant price, you find that would be \$2,000,000, making a total of \$9,688,000. This brings the reduction in the value of the land from the year 1883 to the year 1886 to \$15,471,197, and that is exclusive of all the improvements that have gone on in all the other parts of the Province except upon these 400,000 acres cleared since 1883, and the 300,000 acres which have been placed upon the assessment roll. I hold, therefore, that we have suffered to a very large extent. Although it may be shown that in buildings we have increased the value to the amount of \$30,717,637, I think I can show that that amount and the implements for which we have paid to the extent of \$7,000,000, are not really, though they may be nominally, the property of the farmer, as he is indebted for them, and is getting rapidly further in debt. Even now, I have not told the whole tale in regard to the farmers of Ontario and the burdens to which they are subjected, though some of them are of their own imposing. We have heard a good deal in respect to mortgages, and we had a very glowing account from the hon. Minister of the Interior, who told us what a great many companies had reported, but anyone who knows anything about borrowed money and mortgages in Ontario knows that there is a great deal of private funds lent among the farmers on first class mortgages, the farmers preferring to take private moneys to borrowing from the companies; and these are amounts of which the Government cannot know anything, and I know that this practice exists to a great extent in the County of Huron and all over the Province of Ontario. The Insurance and Finance Chronicle of Montreal, in its January issue, values the land very much as the Bureau of Industries values it, at \$300,000,000, but says that the land is mortgaged to the extent of \$275,000,000, that 30 per cent. of the farms in Ontario are encumbered, and are encumbered to the extent of 43 per cent. of their value, that they have loans at 6 per cent. on that amount, which would amount to \$16,500,000 that the farmers of Ontario had to pay on mortgages this last year. We are told that money has been getting cheaper. I know nothing about that. I know that I act as a valuator for a number of individuals who are lending money and for one company that lends money in the locality from which I come, and I know that, while last fall I could get money easily for 5½ per cent., to-day I cannot get it for less than 7 per cent. Money is going up rapidly in price, and I have never known such a large amount of money placed on farms during the last 44 years of my residence in Ontario as was placed during the last fall, which shows that the farmers are not in the same condition to-day as they have been since I came to the Province of Ontario, and that is a long time indeed. I would just state this with respect to the reduction in the number of cattle, that it shows the farmers had not crops enough to support their cattle. In 1885, they sold an enormous number of cattle, more than they had been accustomed to sell—they sold 143,000 cattle during that year. Now, Sir, in 1887 there were 70,000 head less cattle in Ontario than there were two years previously. The farmers are in a very bad condition indeed. I think the farmers are in the worst condition of any class of the population in the Province of Ontario. Now, let us examine the cost of running a farm of 100 acres in the Province of Ontario, and the revenue that can be got out of it. Sir, I have a statement by me which shows that the condition of the farmer is but little better, if any, than that of the day laborer who works for his daily bread. The total value of crops in 1886 was, of cereals \$15,800,683; crops of corn, buckwheat, beans, hay, clover, potatoes and carrots, \$52,763,943,—in all \$110,764,626. Then I estimate at 53 millions the products of animals and all other sources of revenue that goes into the hands of the farmer. It is a sum almost equal to the value of the crops. I find that the exact sum is \$53,878,483, which includes root crops, grain crops, and everything except straw; so that the total revenue derived from farms in the Province of Ontario is \$164,643,109. Now, how many farms are there in the Province of Ontario of 100 acres each, which is the average number of acres? We find there are 208,615. What is the revenue derived from one of those farms? I find that it will amount on the average to about \$790, and no practical farmer who knows anything about the business will venture to say that an average farm in Ontario will produce any more revenue than that. Now, this average farm has about 50 acres of wood land and 50 acres cleared. In estimating the expense of carrying on this farm we must have two men to do the work the year round. These have to board themselves, and they both receive about \$500. Then there must be a team kept with hay and grain at the market price. I put that at the low rate of 33 cents a day, or \$120 a year. Then for seed, threshing, taxes, and for all the other incidental expenses in connection with the farm, I have reckoned the low sum of \$100. These sums together amount to \$720, only leaving a balance of \$50 to come into the hands of the farmer. This sum only gives him an interest on his capital of 1⅓ per cent. He has nothing except that very small amount to keep up buildings and fences, to meet the wear and tear of his machinery, harnesses and implements. Now, that is a bad condition for the farmers of Ontario to be in. The hon. gentleman has taken his report from the Bureau of Industries, and I challenge him to go over the whole report and show that my statement is not correct. I have no fear that any hon. gentleman will be able to show anything of the kind. Now, Sir, what is the position of the manufacturers when compared with the farmers in the Province of Ontario? I have taken the figures from the census of 1881. I was happy to hear the Minister of Marine and Fisheries this afternoon say that the manufacturers of Canada were never in a better condition than they are to-day. If that is true, the statement I am about to make is one that is more than too favorable for them. I find that in the Dominion of Canada the capital invested in manufacturing industries in 1881 was \$165,302,623; I find that the raw material amounted to \$179,918,593, and the total produce from all these establishments amounted to \$309,676,068. That sum had been increased in value by labor to the amount of \$129,757,475. The sum that is to be deducted from this as having been paid for labor is \$59,429,002. Now, the question comes: How many workmen were engaged in all the different industries of Canada in 1881? I find, first, that the number of manufacturing establishments was 2,229, and the number of workmen was 254,935. I find that the average salary paid to men, women, boys and girls, was \$233 a year. Next: How much did the manufacturer draw from each individual workman? The nice little sum of \$276. In reality the manufacturers of Canada, after counting 10 per cent. for insurance and management, and 6 per cent. on capital invested, have left $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of the total cost of product over materials. And yet the Minister of Marine and Fisheries stands up in this House and declares that the farmers of the Province of Ontario are the most prosperous class in the Dominion. I state that there is no other class in this country which devotes the same amount of energy, industry and perseverance, and exercises the same amount of economy that receives such a small remuneration for their labor. And I warn the hon. gentleman opposite that the farmers of the Dominion have found that the promises made to them in 1878 have not been fulfilled that we have a home market created, that we have not had better prices, that we have not had our population kept at home and that we have not had our produce consumed at home. There are certain things, however, that their policy has succeeded in doing. It has succeeded in driving the very best of our young men from the Dominion to seek homes across the line, it has succeeded in building up "rings" and "trusts" to an extent never known before, it has succeeded in compelling us to pay higher prices than in any country I know of for our manufactured goods, and although we are told that goods are cheaper to-day than they ever were in the history of the world, this same National Policy has deprived the farmers of the benefit of lower prices which should be secured them by improved machinery and improved methods of manufacture. The National Policy has also succeeded in taking a very large amount of money out of the pockets of the farmers in the shape of taxation, much more than was promised before the Government went into power. They, in fact, promised that there would not be an increase of taxation, only a readjustment of taxation. Let us see what this readjustment of taxation, which the Government promised the farmers, together with all other classes of the community, has amounted to, and what effect it has had on the agricultural class. We were told by the hon. Finance Minister before hon. gentlemen opposite assumed the reins of power, that they would not require those large amounts of taxation needed by the Government of Mr. Mackenzie. His language was: "In as much as we have ruled the country with smaller taxation in the past, we are prepared to rule it with smaller taxation in the future." The hon. First Minister said time and again there would not be an increase of taxation, only a readjustment of the tariff. What effect has that readjustment had? During the five years Mr. Mackenzie's Government was in power there was collected \$93,555,768 in taxation, or \$18,713,153 a year. During the last five years the present Government have collected \$134,030,883, or an average of \$26,810,176. This amounts to \$8,097,023 per annum more than was collected by the Mackenzie Government, that is to say, that in the five years an additional sum of \$40,485,115 was taken out of the pockets of the ratepayers. I hold that \$30,000,000 of that should never have been collected, and if the Government had increased the annual expenditure by only ten millions there would not have been a great deal of cause for complaint. But the evil has not ended there. In addition to that amount taken for taxation there has been a large amount taken out of the pockets of the people and placed in the hands of the manufacturers. Is it a wonder, under these circumstances, that there are stringent times in the Dominion, when there is such increase of taxation and burdens placed upon the people, because probably from twenty to thirty millions taken out of the taxpayers do not find their way into the public treasury. These are all causes of grave complaint against the present Government, and if the present condition of affairs continues for any length of time, such a sentiment will spring up that hon. gentlemen opposite will find it very difficult indeed to rule the country. Hon. gentlemen opposite tell us that the speeches of hon. members on this side of the House have driven the best of our population to a foreign country; but I tell them that if the advice given by hon. gentlemen on this side had been followed we would have had thousands of our own population at home more than we have to-day. We would have had the North-West more fully settled. What folly it is for the Government to spend \$500,000 a year to bring immigrants into the country, and when they get them in the North-West impose 35 per cent. taxes on the agricultural implements they use. That was a detriment to every farmer who went there with means to get a fair start, for it meant that he had to pay nearly \$200 of duty on his implements. Let me repeat briefly a conversation I had during the summer with an implement agent at Brandon. He said he could go to the other side and purchase Deering binders for \$100 each, but when he brought them to the Custom house they were valued at \$130, the agent stating that he had received order from Ottawa to value them at that sum. This brought their cost up to \$200 to the actual settler. When a farmer is compelled to pay \$200 for an implement which he can purchase for \$100 on the other side of the line, and when he has to pay 10 cents per bushel extra for the carriage of his wheat to market, a farmer comes to think that loyalty should begin at home. When a man has to move, what difference does it make to him whether he goes across the line or not, whether he goes to the United States and lives among people of our own flesh and blood whose traditions are our traditions and whose ancestors were our ancestors, so long as he is going to place himself and his family in a better condition, which I hold they have done in many cases. It is not the speeches of hon. gentlemen on this side, but the actions of one of the most extravagant Governments ever known that have caused this emigration. It is also owing to the Government granting a railway monopoly in the North-West, and granting Government lands in such a manner that every alternate section is owned by a wealthy company. I was one of the first settlers in the County of Huron, and I know the hardships we endured in making roads and building schools, and I can, therefore, judge of the great hardships that people must endure in the North-West when every alternate block is held by speculators, and especially when such land is not subject to taxation. These are the causes that have led to the depopulation of Canada. These are the causes that have sent our young men across the lines. Within a week of my leaving home to attend Parliament, a young man residing in the North-West came to my place and remained all night. He has been long enough there to perform his settlement duties, and he told me that unless the Government removed the restrictions both on implements and competition of railways at the present time, he would never go back to that country to settle, because he was not going to spend his life and energy to put money in the pockets of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Such, Sir, has been the experience of almost every individual who went to that North-West. I could name individual after individual, and family after family from my own township and county who went to the North-West to settle, but when they found the conditions under which they were to be placed they stepped across the lives. Hence the State of Dakota has gained in population over 300,000 people, while the Province of Manitoba has only gained some 43,000. I hold that the Province of Manitoba is superior land and superior in every shape to any of the States, and if they had but the same advantages under the Government of getting goods into that country the people would be more prosperous and successful. I hold, Sir, that the Province of Ontario to-day is one of the fairest spots upon the face of the earth, and I do not see what is the reason that Province cannot succeed better and why her population has not increased more rapidly than it has. Let me read a statement from a gentleman who is well known to any person who has paid much attention to the public men on the other side. The statement is made by David A. Wells, and he says:

"North of Lakes Erie and Ontario, and the River St. Lawrence, east of Lake Huron, south of the 45th parallel, and included mainly within the present Province of Ontario there is as fair a country as exists on the North American continent; nearly as large in area as New York, Pennsylvania and Ohio combined, and equal if not superior to those States as a whole in its agricultural capacity. It is the natural habitation this continent of the combing-wool sheep without a full, cheap and reliable supply of the wool, of which species the great worsted manufacturing industries of the country cannot prosper, or, we should rather say, exist. It is the land where grows the finest barley, which the brewing interests of the United States must have if it ever expects to rival Great Britain in its present annual export of over eleven millions of dollars worth of malt products. It raises and grazes the finest of cattle, with qualities especially desirable to make good the deterioration of stock in other sections; and its climatic conditions created by an almost encirclement of the great lakes, especially fit to grow men. Such a country is one of the greatest gifts of Providence to the human race; better than the bonanzas of silver or rivers whose sands contain gold."

I would ask, Sir, why the Province of Ontario, when it is the most fertile of all the Provinces, nay, when it is more fertile than any State in the Union, has not progressed more than it has? I think, Sir, I have a statement somewhere which shows the average products of some of the best grain-growing States in the United States of America, and compares them with the Province of Ontario. I would just say, Sir, that this comparison has been made for the United States' records. Of fall wheat per acre, in nine of the best wheat growing States in the Union, the highest produce is in the State of Kansas, which is $15\frac{1}{2}$ bushels per acre; in the Province of Ontario the produce was 21 bushels per acre, $5\frac{1}{2}$ bushels more than in the best State of the Union. In spring wheat, out of five of the best producing States in the Union, the highest was Dakota, and it produced 14 bushels per acre; the produce of spring wheat in Ontario was 16 bushels per acre, or 2 bushels of spring wheat in advance of the best State on the other side. In barley, out of six States in the Union, the highest is $24\frac{1}{2}$ bushels per acre in Wisconsin, and in Ontario the produce was $26\frac{2}{10}$ bushels, or $2\frac{7}{10}$ bushels more than in the best State of the Union. In oats, out of twelve States Minnesota was the highest. The produce was $34\frac{3}{10}$ bushels per acre; while in Ontario the produce was $37\frac{1}{10}$ bushels, or $2\frac{1}{2}$ more than in any State of the Union. Now, Sir, we have a more fertile soil, we have a better agricultural and grazing country, and we are situated on the line of commerce on the seaboard; we have all the national advantages that a Province could boast of and there must be some cause why the Province of Ontario is not growing more rapidly than it does grow. I think the causes have been plainly pointed out to the Government of the day. They have been pointed out in this manner, that it is impossible for a country to prosper when we are taking such large sums of money out of the pockets of the people and placing them in the hands of a few favorites. Unless the Government adopt a different policy to that which they have adopted with the Province of Ontario there will be developed such a sentiment of discontent that I cannot see where it will end. I believe myself that if a plebiscite were taken by ballot to-day in the Province of Ontario, as to whether or not we should remain a part and parcel of Confederation, or whether or not we should become independent or throw in our lot with the United States, the result might be different from what some people would think. I would not like to throw in my lot with the United States if I could help it. I left the land of my birth and I look back to that country with feelings of respect. Canada is the land of my adoption. I spent my youth and manhood here, and I would not like to leave this country, but if the Government continue to treat the country as they have done they will create such a spirit among the people that they will come to the conclusion that if we cannot get the markets of the United States to come and accept our produce we will either have to go to the United States ourselves or ask admission to the Union. That is the sentiment I believe which prevails to-day. Hon. gentlemen may clap their hands or laugh, but they will find later on perhaps that that sentiment will be too strong for them as the sentiment is too strong that has been developed in Manitoba. I was just thinking, Sir, when I saw two gentlemen sitting in this Chamber—a deputation from Manitoba to the Government—to see if they could arrange terms of peace in that Province with the Government at Ottawa, that the impression prevails that the Government has imposed on that Province, and upon the North-West such conditions as it has become a question whether or not the Province of Manitoba is about to rise in its might and assert its right to manage its own business in its own way, that perhaps Manitoba is not the only Province that will have to do that. Thanking the House very cordially for their kind and courteous attention to me while speaking I now beg leave to resume my seat.

Mr. PORTER. The question now before the House, and embraced in the resolution proposed by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), is certainly one of the greatest consequence and of the utmost importance. It is a subject, Sir, large with our national life and wide as our future in all the ages to come. And, Sir, when we consider that question and when we approach that question, we ought certainly to approach it as the hon. gentleman has recommended us to do, in the spirit of statesmen and philosophers. Sir, this question has been argued before this House in very many different ways, and all the different speeches bearing on this question have been presented to this House in eloquent and strenuous terms. For me, Sir, to go over the nature of the argument of the gentlemen who have preceded me, would certainly be futile and useless. However, I would crave the attention of this House while I address a few remarks in reference, more particularly, to the special subject of the last gentleman's discourse. It is claimed, Sir, that in this country the National Policy, which was indeed the great object of his attack, has been a detriment and injury to the farmers of this country. The hon. gentleman has presented that subject in every variety of view, and every form and every manner of way, in which it could be placed before this House, and the conclusion of all his arguments and the summing up of all his speaking, was that the National Policy introduced in 1879 was detrimental to the farmers of this country. Sir, what does he propose to do in order to relieve the farmers of this country from the burdens they are bearing under this National Policy? He proposes the heroic remedy contained in the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford. He proposes that we should be relieved from the sufferings we experience from the National Policy by transferring us to a country where a higher National Policy prevails. Sir, that is a most extraordinary remedy; it is scarcely such a remedy as any reasonable man would think for a moment of prescribing. We are also reminded by hon. gentlemen opposite how very necessary it is in any discussion of this kind that we should know precisely the meaning of the terms we are using, so that there will be no danger of confounding or misunderstanding them. The hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I., took to task members on this side of the House because, as he said, they were opposed to reciprocity. Sir, we are not opposed to reciprocity; we never have been; but unrestricted reciprocity and reciprocity are entirely different things. Reciprocity may mean a certain exchange of goods to such an extent as may be agreed upon, while unrestricted reciprocity means nothing more nor less than absolute free trade, without any restrictions of any sort, with the country with which we propose to enter into relations. It is just as well that that distinction should be borne in mind. We have been reminded by the hon. member for Queen's and by the hon. gentleman who last spoke of the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854; and it is very strange that when hon. gentlemen opposite speak of the period from 1854 to 1866 they forget some important events which occurred during that period, and which undoubtedly had great influence on the prosperity enjoyed in this country at that time. They forget that in 1854, when the treaty was about to come into operation, a great European war was going on; and I am old enough to remember, and I think the hon. gentleman who preceded me is also old enough to remember, that at that time the prices of the products of Canada were raised to a higher pitch than they have ever been since, and why? Because of reciprocity with the United States? No, Sir, it was simply because a great war was raging in a foreign land, and that that land required that we should raise the products necessary for its sustenance. More than that, to prove conclusively the truth of my statement, let me remind hon. gentlemen that at the conclusion of that great war there was such a tumble in prices, such wreck of fortunes, such a loss of gains in Canada, as is remembered to the present hour; and did the reciprocity of which we have heard so much prevent that dire evil falling on the people of Canada? No, Sir, it did not. There were other laws and other economic forces governing us besides the Reciprocity Treaty. Then, Sir, let me also call the attention of this House to another fact in reference to this question, that at that time Canada was awakening like a giant from slumber, and was beginning to put forth her natural energies and to realise the great possessions God had given her to develop and to transmit to posterity. She was beginning to construct long lines of railway; the Grand Trunk Railway was undertaken; and we know that millions of dollars were spent in the settled portions of the country. All that was an element in the prosperity of which we hear so much during reciprocity times. There was still another element in that prosperity which hon. gentlemen opposite leave out of consideration. We remember that in the year 1860, there were ominous sounds of conflict in the land to the south of us, and during the four years ensuing there waged in that great republic a war, fierce, lasting and desolating, and during that period the people, instead of being employed in the pursuits of peace and in the arts of industry and agriculture, were grasping each other's throat, and thrusting their bayonets through each other's hearts. What was the effect of that strife upon Canada? It was that we who were at peace with all the world, whose industries and trade were not disturbed or interrupted, were able to supply them with all the necessities they required. So that when these gentlemen speak of the reciprocity treaty, I think in all fairness to the people of this country they should have stated these facts; because they are not at present on public platforms attempting to get votes; but as men in council, desiring to arrive at the truth, they should neither express a false thing nor suppress a true thing, but they should give all the facts and all the reasons they know of bearing on the subject under discussion. I say these hon. gentlemen should bear in mind all these facts when they come to speak of the period from 1854 to 1866. Now, I have no doubt I have wearied the House with these remarks, because the facts I mention have no doubt often been heard before, but I think it is very necessary that they should be heard again in a discussion of this kind. Sir, the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, made the National Policy the principal point of attack, and, I must confess, the figures he brought before us were so numerous and so conflicting that it was almost impossible to follow him. I will therefore take a few points only. If the hon. gentleman had listened to the arguments of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries this afternoon, he would have omitted one point at least which he brought before the House. He says we pay the whole duty on every article we consume. Now, the hon. gentleman is a farmer like myself. He knows that the greater part of the wools he and his children wear are shorn from the sheep's backs, are taken to the mill and spun, and brought home and made up into clothing for himself and his family; and he knows that not one cent of taxation is paid on those goods. It was therefore not ingenuous in him to make the farmers believe that they had to pay duty on every article they wear. The hon. gentleman also said that goods manufactured in Canada are affected in their price by the price of the goods imported from foreign countries, and that the manufacturers charge more than they ought to do, and that the difference goes into their pockets. It is well known, Sir, that competition in trade undoubtedly reduces the prices of all articles, and it is only a short time ago, indeed, that the manufacturers in this country complained that over-production was causing them to sell at a great loss, so that articles could be bought for actually less than real cost price. But without dwelling on that subject at any length, I will simply touch on another point to which the hon. gentleman referred. In the course of his remarks he read a letter from a farmer in the County of Huron. The farmer congratulated the Liberal party, which has introduced this resolution, upon their policy, and declared that if such a policy as that was not embraced by this House, he would very probably become a citizen of the United States. Let me say this much: We have been asked to discuss this question without sentiment, and I am willing also to discuss it without sentiment. I believe it is a question of material progress to a very large extent; I believe it to be a question of material wealth to a very large extent; still, I am not ashamed to own that that sentiment has a certain influence over all my actions and thoughts. I believe in the fiber of every man, who is a manly man, sentiment certainly has a place, and we know from the world's history, we know from the history of the countries around us that sentiment has made nations brave and men successful. If we were to discuss this subject without sentiment, I believe we would discuss it without considering a most important element in the nation's welfare. I believe that we ought not to make sentiment the most prominent question, yet, after all, in the back ground of discussion there will remain always a something that will influence our decisions in a most important direction. However, I am willing to discuss this question without sentiment, and if the hon. member for South Huron is altogether devoid of sentiment, and for the sake of a few dollars would sell his allegiance to the United States, I believe that Canada is better without him. The hon. member who has just taken his seat has spoken of depreciation in the value of land. He has told us he was a valuator for a company, and that he had an opportunity of examining lands in the County of Perth and some other adjacent counties, and that values had decreased lately owing to the National Policy. In answer to that statement, I have here statistics taken from Mr. Blue's report and from the report of the Agricultural Commission of 1880, of which I believe the hon. gentleman was a member. From Mr. Blue's statistics, we learn that the average value of land per acre in the County of Huron, which I select as being the hon. gentleman's own county and it is better to particularise—from Mr. Blue's report, we learn that the average value of land per acre in the county of Huron was in 1886, $51.49, with buildings thereon, the land being worth $41.28, and the buildings $10.21. From the report of the Agricultural Commission of 1880, I find the value of 100 acres of farm land in the County of Huron, taking the three classes, the first, second and third into which the commission divide the land and making an average price,—I find from the report that for the whole County of Huron, the value of the farming land was in 1880 estimated to be worth $36.16 per acre, so that from 1880 to 1886 the land in question had increased $15.32 per acre in value. These facts and figures are taken from the statistics of hon. gentlemen's friends in Ontario, and I ask you, Sir, if they show any sign of depreciation in the value of landed property. Suppose we admit for the sake of argument that the land has depreciated, or rather that it has not risen in value, what do we find Mr. Blue saying? In his report of 1885, he says that the value of the land depends upon the value of the crops, and that when prices are low land is low. That is but a reasonable statement of facts in the mind of all impartial men. There is another test of the value of land, and that is the increase in the assessment values, as they appear from year to year in the reports of the municipalities. The assessed values of land in the County of Huron was:—

| In 1875 | $37 91 |
| 1876 | 28 76 |
| 1877 | 29 43 |
| 1878 | 29 54 |
| 1879 | 30 02 |
| 1880 | 30 01 |
| 1881 | 30 22 |
| 1882 | 31 07 |
| 1883 | 30 94 |
| 1884 | 31 42 |
| 1885 | 32 71 |

During the series of years, from 1875 to 1885, eleven years, the land was rising steadily in value, and it was rising steadily in value under the care and supervision of men who were interested in not going beyond its true value, lest the township would have to pay a little more taxes than it did before. These two facts show conclusively that the statement of the hon. gentleman and his friends as to the depreciation of land in the County of Huron, is not substantiated by the facts. It has been said to us repeatedly that the farmers are on the verge of starvation, that some of them are bereft of all hope in this world, whatever they will have in the world beyond. Other gentlemen may think that, although their condition is not so deplorable as this, their earnings are very trifling, indeed, compared with what they should be. Hon. gentlemen sometimes should remember that it is always well, in discussing a great question, to state exactly the facts, because when they do that there is no fear that any man can trip their statement. I find that an hon. gentleman on the Opposition benches last year, discussing the condition of the farmer, who in his blind fury was anxious to make a point against the Government in regard to the National Policy, adduced certain facts and statements to show how much the farmers had lost under the National Policy. In that statement I find a very healthy state of affairs indeed, and I think it shows that there is no necessity for the lamentations which the hon. gentlemen are making in regard to the terrible state of the farmers. I find that, in that discussion, the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) said that the average farmer in the County of Huron sold 200 bushels of wheat at 99 cents, $198; 150 bushels of barley at 68 cents, $102;

150 bushels of oats at 40 cents, $60; 75 bushels of peas at 67 cents, $50.75; 10 cwt. of dressed hogs at $7, $70; 10 dressed turkeys at $1.50, $15; 200 lbs. of butter at 19 cents, $38; 15 barrels of apples at $2.30 a barrel, $34.50; 50 dozen of eggs at 19 cents, $9.50; five tons of hay at $11, $55; 5 tons of straw at $8, $40; 50 lbs. of wool at 22 cents, $11; so that the whole of the articles which the average farmer sold, according to this hon. gentleman, on an average year from 1879 to 1887, was over $620 worth. I ask you to consider whether that is not a fair showing for the profits of a farm on an average number of years from 1879 to 1887. But the hon. gentleman did not complete his statement. If he undertook to state all the products from the farm, he should have gone further, and many hon. gentlemen are aware that the farmers in that county sell excellent horses, excellent cattle and excellent sheep, but the hon. gentleman never enumerated a single horse or a single sheep or a single fat beast. If we add these products to the others which he has given, we will then find that the average farmer in the County of Huron derives an income of nearly $900 per annum. I ask this House, or any hon. gentleman, if that is not a very fair showing indeed for an average farmer in the County of Huron to make. Perhaps I have not paid as much attention to the statements of the hon. gentleman opposite as they might deserve. I remember that in the County of Renfrew, when I was assisting in the election of an hon. gentleman who is now in this House, I quoted these statistics to show that the state of the country and the condition of the farmers in my own county was not as desperate as it might be. The hon. gentleman who replied to me said: "Why, it is absurd." I said: "My dear sir, the gentleman who uttered these words is the member for East Huron, a Reformer." He said: "I do not care what he is; the Reformers of East Huron have chosen a fool, and I think the people of West Huron have chosen another." Not only have I quoted this to show the condition of the farmers, but I may quote the words of Professor Brown in reference to the condition of the farmer. It is well known that that gentleman is in a position to understand the condition of the farmers of this country as well as any other man. His profession brings him into contact with them, his studies and his pursuits bring him in touch with them, and no doubt anything that affects their condition is known to him by a sort of magnetic or sympathetic influence, and this gentleman, drawing his facts and figures from Mr. Blue's report, sums up a letter, a long and able dissertation upon the condition of the farmer in these words, that he has no hesitation, after giving all the facts and combining them and showing the relation in which they stand to one another, in repeating: "That you, the farmers of Ontario, are not only doing well and making money, whether placed in the bank or in improvements or in mortgage, but you are all actually wealthy." That letter was attempted to be contradicted by men whose views it did not suit, and the professor again, on 3rd January, 1888, answered the statements, and in concluding he says: "If debiting and crediting can be stated on an average, I am of opinion that no class of farmers is so well off as those of Ontario." That is independent and professional evidence, and it is evidence given by a man who is thoroughly competent to understand what he speaks of. Another point to which I shall also direct the attention of hon. gentlemen for a short time is that of the mortgages on farm property. We heard a very doleful statement from the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) as to the burdens the farmers bear and the large amounts they pay to mortgage companies, and we are told that almost every farm in this country was burdened with a mortgage; but, before the hon. gentleman sat down, almost before he completed his sentence, he told us that the loan companies did not exactly show the amount of mortgages because many farmers took first-class mortgages as good security. Is it not extraordinary that ruined farmers are able to lend money on mortgages? Where do they get the money? If they are ruined in order to keep up the pomp and splendour of manufacturers, where do they get the money? I think the farmers of Huron are well able to hold their own, and if there is a shiftless or thriftless or intemperate or lazy man among them who cannot hold his own, they are quite willing to put their money upon his land. I may give a few moments also to a further consideration of some of the remarks the hon. gentleman has made. Amongst other things, he claims that unrestricted reciprocity would be of great benefit to the farmers of Canada—as all the others claim—by opening up a larger market, by placing within their reach the privilege of supplying the larger cities and populous communities along our southern border, and that thereby they might make a readier sale and receive a larger price. But, Sir, we know that Canada and many of the States south of us, produce agricultural products of the same class, and these latter to such an extent as to more than supply their own market. Therefore our products must seek the markets of the world where they may be disposed of at the best advantage. To assert that New York, Pennsylvania, Illinois, or any other State to the south of us, require for their own use our wheat, our oats, our peas, corn, beef or pork, is to mock the intelligence of our farmers. Now, let me call attention to a statement which the Minister of Marine and Fisheries also made in answer to the hon. gentleman, about our natural market. The hon. gentleman says that the United States is the natural market for the agricultural products of Canada. A natural market, as I take it may be defined as one that is either contiguous, co-terminus or adjacent. But it is one in which nature supplies either not at all, or to a very limited extent, the goods therein offered, and which are demanded and required by the people. Now, in which of these categories shall we place the United States? Shall we say that they do not produce breadstuffs, meats, and such like products at all; or shall we say that they do not produce them in such a rich abundance as to supply their own people? Sir, to make either assertion, in the face of the evidence that we only send to that country fifteen million dollars of agricultural products, and in face of the evidence of the commercial records of the United States, I say an assertion of that sort would be as absurd as it is false. We learn from the returns of the United States that the agricultural exports for the year ending 30th June, 1887, amounted to $484,500,000. Of this sum about 161 million dollars were breadstuff, ninety-two million dollars, beef, pork, butter and cheese, and nine millions were cattle and other products. Sir, I ask you is it possible that a country that produces these large quantities of agricultural products, really requires the products of Canada. Let me ask you to reflect on the innumerable bushels of grain and barrels of flour that leave the Atlantic ports of the United States for the hungry nations of Europe. Think also of the mountains of beef and pork which accompany this bread, and then how can any intelligent man say that the United States is a natural market for our surplus agricultural produce? No Sir, if we wish to dispose of these things we must go where they are required, and we shall find a market among these people who have outgrown the limits of their own food supply. To those countries must we look for the best customers of Canada. When the time comes, which is undoubtedly remote when the United States shall no longer export agricultural produce, or but to a very limited extent, then I acknowledge that we who live upon their borders may supply their wants with benefit to themselves and with profit to us. Until that time comes we must look to the populous nations of Europe, to them we must send our products, and from them receive the money or its equivalent, and in any case we must regard them as by nature destined to consume the fruits of our soil.

Mr. PORTER.

The hon. gentleman also spoke of the movement of population, and this seems to be not only a stock argument, but a never failing source of melancholy regret on their part. The hon. member for South Oxford last night quoted the Scriptures, apparently for the sake of making a joke, but I thought he was very unfortunately placed, because the copy of the sacred book he possesses must be a mutilated copy; it begins with Exodus and ends with the lamentations of Jeremiah. Sir, in that book of his there is no gospel for Canada, there are no beatitudes for Canada, and it would seem that he was born, like the prophet of old, not to bless, but to curse. Sir, the exodus of Canada has been very well explained, and I think if men will lay aside party spirit and political bias, which sway their judgments oft-times, unintentionally, they must acknowledge that a movement of population is going on the world over. Some of these hon. gentlemen know well that in the old settled townships of the county I represent, there is a movement, not on account of the poverty of the people, not on account of the want of enterprise of the people, not on account of the sterility of the soil, but on account of the ambition of the younger men to go where they can find homes for themselves, free and untrammelled, where they can find an opportunity to commence the world in a life of adventure, like their fathers before them. It is nothing to be regretted as has been well remarked, heretofore we have not been able to utilise that spirit of adventure in our young men because we had not in our possession the territory we required, and they drifted off, unfortunately for us, to the land of the Stars and Stripes. But while we regret the exodus of our young men, it is certainly a source of pride to every Canadian to know that though they have gone across the border, they have maintained the reputation of Canada for intelligence and trustworthiness. If we cannot keep them at home, we need not be ashamed of our export. If we raise the best wheat and the best horses in the world, we can also raise as good men, at least, as the United States. Sir, a remedy has been proposed for all the evils that afflict our country, more especially that afflict agriculture. It is a very drastic remedy, it is heroic treatment indeed. We were told, for example, the remedy would have the result of diminishing our revenue, and that by some possibility, although not admitted, direct taxation might be the consequence. The physician examined the patient, he made a diagnosis and found she was very ill, and in order to save her he bled her to death and then killed her by starvation. That is certainly most heroic treatment. If our revenues are to be taken from us, and then the little we have remaining is to go in the form of taxation that is heroic treatment unquestionably. I need not dwell on the question of manufacturing industries. I think it will be admitted by every hon. member, as it will be by every intelligent man in the Dominion, that no country can ever be a great country that is purely an agricultural one, but that every country to attain to the highest civilisation must possess a great variety of all the elements which occupy and employ the mind and intellect of man, every art, science and industrial pursuit. The finest, the most complete, the most artistic industries must be carried on before a country can attain to the eminence of a highly civilized country. I think, therefore, the importance and the necessity will be admitted of establishing industrial pursuits in this Canada of ours. Years ago we were nothing more than the clearers of the forest, then we were the pioneers who were clearing away the obstructions of nature; but now that these results have been accomplished and we have overcome the first difficulties in our way and we are about to lay the foundations of a great and, as I hope, a mighty empire, we should consider well and consider wisely by what possible means we can introduce all the varied branches of art, science and literature into the country, because by these means and these means alone shall we ever become a great nation. Wealth alone will not make us great, but wealth, arts, science and industry, and all the mechanical skill and enterprise which characterise the most advanced nations of men, they and they alone will make us great. I say, therefore, that these statesmen, especially the venerable leader of this House who nine years ago introduced a policy which had for its object that view and purpose, deserve the gratitude of the country not only now but for all time to come. If one could suppose that his wise scheme could miscarry and the people of Canada declined to follow the plan which he had laid down for them and the lines on which he desired them to go, yet I believe the time would come, if in a moment of excitement they were led away by the seductions of hon. gentlemen opposite, when they would recoil to the position they had already taken and reaffirm the verdict already made. If they were to do away with all those protections to the industries of the country and starve out our young industries, then I believe not many years would pass before they would be sorry they had so far forgotten themselves and would recall the memories of those days of 1879, and wish again for one hour with the venerable statesman who now leads this House. We are told that the introduction of the National Policy has been the means of establishing large institutions in this country which derive vast sums of money from the people. If it be unwise and unjust, if it be dangerous to the State to form an establishment in this country which by its command of an enormous capital is able to exercise its power to crush out its feebler rivals, I contend it is ten times more dangerous to the State to build up an institution of that kind in a foreign land over which we can have no control. No good can the people of Canada by any possibility derive, no compensation for the sense of injustice which our people will feel can be obtained for the insuperable obstacles which must be placed in the way of men equally as enterprising and energetic but not as wealthy under an arrangement such as is proposed by hon. gentlemen opposite. When we contemplate what the present policy has done for us we have every reason to be assured that we are working upon the right lines, we have every reason to be confirmed in our opinion that the time is not far distant when we certainly shall reap the benefits of all our labors and planning and scheming for the welfare of Canada. But suppose we admit that we are led aside by the seductive tones of the gloomy knight from Oxford, that the darkness of the shadows overcloud the intellect and we are led to vote for the resolution before the House, what then will take place? I contend that the passage of this resolution would retard Canada in mid-career, would have a tendency to destroy her industries, would reduce her capital, and would make us, although we aim to be something better, only producers of those raw materials which would be used in the manufactories and workshops of a foreign country, and Canada would be famed for her soil and the stupidity of her men. What true-hearted, patriotic Canadian can contemplate the melancholy picture of his country under the auspices of the scheme which those gentlemen propose? He must hang his head in deep humiliation, he must feel the glow of shame burning in his face at the result which must inevitably happen. But to that proud and worthy nation over the border into whose hands this resolution would certainly deliver us bound in brazen fetters, to those men I say our abject whining and cringing must be loathsome and disgusting. They themselves formulated a treaty of commerce between us which existed for twelve years, and which we were anxious to renew, and for twenty-two years they have refused to listen to the repeated requests of the Canadian people and Canadian Government. Canada wishes to trade upon fair terms and on a mutual basis with all the world, and when the people of the United States intimate their willingness to meet with us and discuss these matters, then we will meet them and discuss the whole question; but until that time comes, Canada must refuse to stand like a beggar cap in hand at the door of the American Republic. For these reasons, which I have imperfectly recounted, and because I believe that Canada's future depends upon her own efforts and her own wisdom and not another's favor, I will vote against the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford.

M. DESSAINT: M. l'Orateur, je regrette d'être obligé de prendre la parole à cette heure avancée de la soirée. Je prie mes honorables collègues de vouloir bien me pardonner si je me permets de prendre la parole au début d'une question aussi importante que celle qui est maintenant soumise à l'appréciation de cette Chambre. Ce n'est pas par ostentation que je le fais, mais étant obligé de m'absenter demain pour affaires urgentes, je serai privé de l'avantage de voter sur la proposition qui nous est maintenant soumise. C'est pourquoi je saisis cette occasion pour exprimer ma manière de voir sur cette question.

Comme représentant un comté essentiellement agricole je crois de mon devoir d'exprimer mon opinion, opinion que je crois être celle de la grande majorité des électeurs de ma division, sur la question qui agite maintenant l'opinion publique. Je tâcherai, M. l'Orateur, de le faire en aussi peu de mots que possible.

La proposition qui nous est maintenant soumise par l'honorable député d'Oxford-Sud (sir Richard Cartwright), est une proposition capitale qui intéresse hautement les intérêts de ce pays. Cette proposition a un retentissement immense dans le pays, et peut avoir des conséquences très considérables. Cette proposition, qui du reste n'est pas nouvelle, et dont le principe a déjà été admis dans ce pays, tend à demander une réciprocité complète de nos produits manufacturiers et des produits naturels du pays avec les Etats-Unis.

D'un côté, on vante la réciprocité comme devant donner de grands avantages au Canada au sujet des rapports commerciaux avec les Etats-Unis. D'un autre côté, on s'en défend de deux manières. Le premier moyen de défense que l'on invoque est celui-ci: on dit que le traité de réciprocité est impossible parce que les Etats-Unis n'en veulent point, et on nous donne comme preuve la demande faite par sir Charles Tupper, comme plénipotentiaire, lors de la dernière conférence des pêcheries à Washington. De plus, j'ai entendu dire devant cette chambre, et on le voit dans les journaux, que la réciprocité n'est pas dans l'intérêt du pays.

Eh bien! M. l'Orateur, je considère que ce sont là deux contradictions. Si la réciprocité n'est pas avantageuse pour notre pays, pourquoi sir Charles Tupper la demande-t-il? Si, d'un autre côté, ce traité de réciprocité est avantageux pour le Canada, alors pourquoi des hommes autorisés, des ministres de la Couronne, dans des discours savamment élaborés et respirant une bonne foi plus ou moins grande, viennent-ils nous dire que nous sommes dans le meilleur pays du monde, que nous sommes dans la prospérité, qu'avec le système protecteur actuel, nous n'avons plus rien à désirer? Je constate une contradiction flagrante et un défaut de conséquence entre ces deux moyens de défense.

Je crois que pour tous ceux qui ont suivi un peu ce qui s'est passé dans notre pays et qui connaissent les rapports qui ont existé et qui existent actuellement entre le Canada et les Etats-Unis, il faudrait être aveugle pour dire qu'une population comme la nôtre de cinq millions d'habitants n'aurait pas d'intérêt à avoir des rapports commerciaux avec un peuple comme celui des Etats-Unis qui se chiffre par soixante millions d'âmes. La géographie des deux pays démontre au contraire que nous sommes destinés à avoir des rapports continuels. Et naturellement le Canada a plus d'intérêt à avoir des rapports avec les Etats-Unis que les Etats-Unis n'ont d'intérêt d'en avoir avec nous. Nous sommes voisins ; il n'y a qu'une ligne imaginaire qui nous sépare depuis l'Océan Atlantique jusqu'à l'Océan Pacifique. Eh bien ! allons-nous dire que parce que nous ne sommes pas de la même nation, bien que nous ayons des intérêts identiques, allons-nous dire que nous devons maintenir une barrière entre nous et n'avoir aucun commerce quelconque ensemble ? Je crois que ceci ne serait pas dans l'intérêt de la nation canadienne. Je crois surtout que cela ne serait pas dans l'intérêt du plus grand nombre, c'est-à-dire de la classe pauvre. Ceux qui viennent dire que nous n'avons pas d'intérêt à avoir de relations commerciales avec les Etats-Unis, je crois pour ma part, qu'ils ne sont pas sincères et qu'ils font tout simplement de la politique. Les rapports commerciaux sont là pour nous démontrer les avantages qu'aurait le Canada à avoir un traité de réciprocité avec nos voisins.

Prenons les fluctuations du commerce depuis un certain nombre d'années. Je vais le faire aussi succinctement que possible et je prendrai trois périodes. Je placerai la première période de 1821 à 1846. A cette époque, nous étions sous le joug de l'Angleterre sous le rapport du commerce ; nous étions sous la tutelle complète de la Grande-Bretagne, et nous n'avions pas le droit, comme colonie, de faire des traités ou même de faire un tarif.

Eh bien ! quel a été notre commerce pendant cette période ? Dans ce temps-là, nous n'avons eu aucuns rapports ou presque pas de rapports avec les Etats-Unis. Il est vrai que la nation canadienne n'était pas aussi considérable qu'elle l'est aujourd'hui, mais en égard au nombre, voyons les rapports commerciaux qui existaient alors : de 1821 à 1846, le total des importations des Etats-Unis dans les provinces de l'Amérique du Nord, y compris Terre-Neuve, s'élevait à $90,124,195, et les exportations à $31,040,834. Donc, pendant vingt-cinq années que nous avons fait des affaires avec les Etats-Unis, nous avons exporté en moyenne pour une valeur annuelle d'un million et un quart par année, et, comme je l'ai dit, à cette époque nous n'avions pas de réciprocité et nous étions sous la tutelle commerciale de la mère-patrie.

En 1846, les liens qui nous rattachaient à la mère-patrie ont été relâchés un peu, et nous avons pu avoir des rapports commerciaux avec les Etats-Unis d'une manière plus directe. De ce moment-là, il a été question entre les hommes d'Etat des deux pays de nouer des relations commerciales plus intimes, et c'est de là qu'a surgi l'idée du premier traité de réciprocité qui a été fait en 1854. Dès 1847, les hommes d'Etat des deux pays se sont occupés de ces relations commerciales ; on en ressentait alors l'importance ; on comprenait les profits réciproques que les deux pays en retireraient. Malgré cela, ces propositions sont restées en suspens jusqu'en 1854.

Examinons maintenant la période qui s'est écoulée depuis 1854 jusqu'en 1866, c'est-à-dire pendant que le traité de réciprocité a été en force entre les deux pays. Prenons d'abord depuis 1850. Quelles ont été les importations et les exportations en 1850 ? Les importations ont été de $6,594,860, et les exportations ont été de $4,951,159. En 1866, à l'expiration du traité de réciprocité, les importations ont été de $20,424,692, et les exportations ont été de $34,770,261.

Eh bien ! M. l'Orateur, quelle est la réflexion naturelle que nous devons faire en face de chiffres semblables ? Ceci nous démontre que pendant cette période de réciprocité, nous avons prospéré d'une manière étonnante, et la conséquence que nous avons tirée de ces chiffres, c'est que si nous avions encore la réciprocité avec les Etats-Unis, l'augmentation de notre commerce serait proportionnée à celle qui a eu lieu pendant la période que je viens de mentionner.

Le traité de réciprocité a pris fin le 17 mars 1866.

Voyons maintenant si la progression du commerce a été dans la même proportion en 1867. En 1867, les importations ont été de $20,271,907 et les exportations de $25,553,800.

M. DESSAINT.

En 1886, vingt ans après, les importations ont été de $35,770,150 et les exportations de $26,997,914. Je ferai remarquer ici que les exportations de 1886 ont été moins considérables que les exportations de 1866. C'est-à-dire que vingt ans auparavant, lorsque nous étions sous l'empire du traité de réciprocité nous avons exporté pour au delà de $34,000,000, et vingt ans après, malgré la grande prospérité de notre pays que l'on vante tant, nous n'avons exporté que pour $26,000,000, c'est-à-dire $8,000,000 de moins après vingt ans que nous exportions sous le régime de la réciprocité.

Maintenant, M. l'Orateur, ceux qui nous vantent le système actuel, qui disent que nous sommes dans le meilleur des mondes possibles, et qu'il est impossible en quelque sorte d'avoir une plus grande prospérité que celle que nous avons, se mettent plus au point de vue des grands capitalistes qui semblent travailler non pas pour le plus grand nombre, mais pour le plus petit nombre, pour les manufacturiers. Or, nous, comme représentants du peuple, ce n'est pas seulement le petit nombre que nous devons protéger, mais c'est la masse de la population ; et pour ma part, je dis que si nous avions un traité de réciprocité aussi général que possible avec les Etats-Unis, la classe agricole y trouverait le plus grand avantage, parce qu'à l'heure qu'il est, M. l'Orateur, il y a des désavantages que nos cultivateurs ne peuvent surmonter. Ainsi, en vertu du tarif qui existe actuellement aux Etats-Unis,—un tarif de représailles,—nos cultivateurs ne peuvent vendre leurs produits sans payer des droits considérables que tous les honorables membres de cette Chambre connaissent comme moi. Je citerai quelques items pour démontrer que nos cultivateurs ont besoin que cette barrière qui existe entre le Canada et les Etats-Unis disparaisse afin que nous puissions avoir des relations plus faciles avec les Etats-Unis. Je parle plus particulièrement au point de vue de la classe agricole, et du comté que j'ai l'honneur de représenter, qui est un comté presque exclusivement agricole.

Le comté de Kamouraska en particulier récolte tous les ans une grande quantité de foin, de patates, et de grains de toutes sortes ; il s'y fait aussi un grand commerce de chevaux, de bestiaux, de moutons, et d'autres animaux. Je n'apprendrai rien à personne, et ce sont des choses qu'il est inutile de vouloir se cacher, en disant que nous sommes obligés de payer à la frontière américaine un droit de 20 pour cent sur les chevaux que nous vendons. Ainsi, un cultivateur vend un cheval à un commerçant pour $100, le commerçant qui le transporte aux Etats-Unis est obligé de payer 20 pour cent de droits. Or, s'il n'avait pas ce droit de 20 pour cent à payer, au lieu de ne payer que $100 au cultivateur pour son cheval, il lui paierait la somme de $120. C'est donc $20.00 dont bénéficieraient nos cultivateurs si nous avions un traité de réciprocité avec nos voisins.

Eh, bien ! M. l'Orateur, il en est de même pour tous les produits de la ferme, et, dans mon comté principalement, pour le foin et les patates. Ainsi on impose un droit de 15 cents par minot sur les patates, ou un pourcentage de 39.58 pour cent. Il en est de même pour le fromage sur lequel nous payons quatre cents par livre, c'est-à-dire 30.14 pour cent. Nous payons aussi sur le foin $2 par tonne, c'est-à-dire $2 par 130 bottes de foin, soit un pourcentage de 18.98 pour cent.

Si les commerçants n'avaient pas ces droits à payer à leur entrée sur le territoire américain, ils pourraient payer davantage aux cultivateurs canadiens, et ce sont les cultivateurs qui en profiteraient.

Je crois donc que nous devons premièrement protéger la classe agricole. D'ailleurs, il me semble que les manufacturiers y trouveraient eux-mêmes leur avantage. On a demandé beaucoup de protection pour les manufacturiers. Or, M. l'Orateur, depuis plusieurs années déjà que ces messieurs exploitent leurs industries, ils doivent être en position de pouvoir lutter avec les manufacturiers étrangers.

On vante beaucoup la prospérité de notre pays, on dit que nous augmentons sous tous les rapports ; cependant, je constate que s'il y a eu augmentation c'est seulement dans les grandes villes, parce que malheureusement, dans nos districts ruraux il n'y a presque pas eu de progrès sous aucun rapport.

Que voyons nous quant à l'augmentation de la population ? Le comté de Kamouraska en 1871 avait une population de 21,254 habitants, et en 1881 sa population n'était que de 22,181, c'est-à-dire une augmentation, pendant toute une décade, que de 927 habitants.

Prenons maintenant toute la population de la province de Québec pendant la même décade. En 1871 la population était de 1,191,116 habitants, et en 1881, elle était de 1,359,027, soit une augmentation de 167,511 habitants seulement. Eh bien ! va-t-on dire que c'est là une augmentation naturelle, que c'est là une augmentation qui donne pleine et entière satisfaction ? Je dis que non. Et quelle est la raison de ce défaut d'augmentation dans notre population ? C'est parce que nos campagnes se dépeuplent tous les jours ; tous les ans nous voyons un quart, ou peut-être un tiers de nos concitoyens prendre le chemin de l'exil et se diriger vers les États-Unis. Et pourquoi ? Parce qu'ils ne trouvent pas dans leur pays la protection suffisante ; parce qu'ils n'y trouvent pas des manufactures suffisantes pour leur fournir leur subsistance. Ceci est un fait qui est connu de tout le monde. Maintenant, qu'on vante tant que l'on voudra la richesse de ce pays, la preuve contraire est démontrée par le fait que nous avons aux États-Unis à l'heure qu'il est, au delà de un million de Canadiens. Eh bien ! je crois que si nous avons l'avantage de renouer des liens commerciaux avec les États-Unis, il s'établirait dans notre pays des manufactures avec les capitaux américains, et au lieu d'avoir à émigrer aux États-Unis, nous verrions nos frères qui sont là-bas dans l'exil revenir dans leurs foyers, y trouver de l'ouvrage et de quoi faire vivre leurs familles.

Pendant le discours qu'a fait l'honorable député d'Oxford-Sud (Sir Richard Cartwright), j'ai entendu une remarque faite par un honorable député de l'autre côté de la Chambre, ou plutôt une insulte a été lancée à la face de tous les Canadiens qui sont de l'autre côté de la ligne 45ème. On a dit que ceux qui avaient émigré aux États-Unis, n'étaient pas autre chose que des porteurs d'eau et des scieurs de bois. C'est là une injure gratuite, un injure qui ne fait pas honneur à celui qui l'a lancée, et qui démontre bien les sentiments qui existent, — je ne dirai pas chez tous les membres de l'autre côté de la Chambre, — mais chez quelques-uns d'eux à l'égard des Canadiens qui sont aux États-Unis. Ceci démontre bien qu'ils ne sont pas décidés à les encourager à revenir au pays, mais qu'ils préfèrent plutôt leur lancer l'injure à la face. Ceci est regrettable. Mais au nom de ceux qui sont là-bas je dois dire qu'on a eu tort de les qualifier ainsi ; car ceux de nos compatriotes qui sont aux États-Unis y sont là par nécessité, et s'ils ont été obligés de s'expatrier, c'est parce que nous avons une administration au pays qui ne leur a pas permis d'y gagner leur vie honorablement.

Je dis, M. l'Orateur, que non-seulement la réciprocité serait avantageuse à la classe agricole, mais qu'elle serait aussi avantageuse pour le développement de toutes les ressources que nous possédons. On dit avec beaucoup de raison que notre pays possède de grandes ressources. En effet, nous avons des mines très riches de toute sorte. Mais il faut avouer aussi, M. l'Orateur, que nous avons bien peu de capitaux dans la Puissance du Canada, et si nous avions des relations commerciales plus étendues avec les États-Unis, je crois que les capitaux qui y abondent viendraient dans le pays servir à l'exploitation de nos forêts, de nos mines et de toutes les autres ressources que nous possédons.

Un fait qui est arrivé dans mon comté démontre bien que c'est le défaut pécuniaire qui fait que nous ne pouvons pas toujours réussir, et que ce n'est qu'au moyen de relations constantes avec un peuple aussi riche que nos voisins que nous arriverons à la prospérité que nous désirons tous. Nous avons dans le comté de Kamouraska des montagnes de silex propres à faire du verre et nous avons aussi des couches considérables de sable employé dans la fabrication du verre ? Il y a quelques années à peine il s'est formé dans le comté une compagnie pour l'exploitation de cette industrie. Mais comme pour la plupart des entreprises qui se sont faites dans le pays, nous n'avons pu réussir faute de moyens.

Eh bien ! je crois que si nous avions un traité de réciprocité, si le marché américain nous était ouvert, si nous avions l'avantage de voir les Américains exploiter nos industries, ce serait une source de richesse pour le pays et pour le comté que je représente en particulier.

Maintenant, les grandes objections que l'on fait à la réciprocité sont d'abord que ce programme aurait dû être soumis aux électeurs avant d'être soumis à la Chambre. Je ne crois pas que cette objection soit sérieuse, parce qu'il ne s'agit ici que de la manifestation d'une opinion. D'ailleurs, les honorables membres de cette Chambre qui siègent de l'autre côté n'ont pas été aussi scrupuleux dans leur carrière politique. On se rappelle que lorsqu'ils ont formé la Confédération, ils n'ont pas consulté le peuple, et ils l'ont fait malgré les protestations des honorables membres de la gauche dans le temps.

Et plus tard, qu'ont-ils fait de leur programme de protection ? Quand l'honorable chef du gouvernement a commencé à soumettre son programme de politique nationale dans cette Chambre, était-ce après l'avoir soumis au peuple ? Non, M. l'Orateur. C'est durant la première ou la seconde session après les élections générales que l'on a adopté ce programme. Par conséquent, cette objection n'est pas sérieuse ; et si elle était sérieuse, ces honorables messieurs devraient faire un retour sur eux-mêmes et se rappeler qu'ils ont eu tort dans le passé ou que nous avons raison aujourd'hui.

La seconde objection que l'on fait, c'est que ce serait un manque d'allégeance, presque un cas de lèse-majesté que de nouer un traité de réciprocité avec les États-Unis au grand détriment de la Grande-Bretagne. Je crois que cette objection n'est pas sérieuse non plus. Quand les honorables messieurs de l'autre côté de la chambre ont mis en pratique leur tarif protecteur, leur grande question de politique nationale, ils n'ont pas alors consulté les intérêts de la Grande-Bretagne ; ils ont proclamé dans la presse, dans la chambre et partout, que leur programme était "le Canada pour les Canadiens." C'est-à-dire qu'il s'agissait de faire un tarif protecteur pour protéger les Canadiens et non pas les Anglais.

Eh bien, nous sommes aujourd'hui dans le même cas. Il s'agit de faire un traité de réciprocité, non pas pour protéger l'Angleterre, mais pour nous protéger nous-mêmes, et pour avoir des relations commerciales avec nos voisins.

La troisième objection que l'on fait, est une objection très sérieuse qui a été traitée particulièrement par l'honorable député d'Oxford-Sud (sir Richard Cartwright) et par les autres députés de ce côté-ci de cette chambre qui l'ont suivi.

Réellement, après le cours d'économie politique que nous a donné l'honorable député d'Oxford-Sud (sir Richard Cartwright) je crois qu'il me serait imprudent d'entrer sur un terrain aussi difficile. Mais le discours qu'a fait l'honorable député restera comme un monument dans les annales parlementaires de cette Chambre et je crois que les raisons qu'il a données pour répondre à cette objection sont tout-à-fait victorieuses. Je ne me permettrai que d'ajouter quelques mots.

On nous dit : mais où prendrez-vous des revenus pour remplacer les droits de douanes que vous allez abolir entre le Canada et les États-Unis ? D'abord, comme il a été dit devant cette Chambre, il faudrait de toute nécessité diminuer les dépenses que nous avons actuellement, lesquelles dépenses sont excessives. Nous dépensons de $37,000,000 à $38,000,000 par année lorsqu'avec une dépense de $26,000,000 je crois que nous pourrions satisfaire à tous les besoins de l'administration. Je me rappelle qu'en 1878, l'honorable M. Tilley qui était alors membre de la Chambre, critiquait particulièrement le gouvernement Mackenzie parce qu'il dépensait au delà de $23,000,000, et l'honorable M. Tilley disait qu'avec cette somme il se faisait fort d'administrer les affaires du pays et de rencontrer toutes les dépenses nécessaires avec un revenu de $26,000,000.

Et bien, quelles sont les raisons d'augmentation depuis ce temps-là ? Je crois, pour ma part, que si les affaires du pays étaient bien administrées au lieu d'engouffrer des millions pour encourager des compagnies qui veulent contrôler le pays, on pourrait pourvoir à tous les besoins de l'administration du pays avec une somme de $26,000,000.

Maintenant en ayant un traité de réciprocité, nous aurions évidemment une augmentation de commerce considérable ; les droits d'accise seraient augmentés par là même, et nos droits de douane avec l'Angleterre et tous les autres pays resteraient les mêmes qu'il sont actuellement.

Mais supposons pour un instant que les revenus de la douane seraient insuffisants pour rencontrer les dépenses nécessaires et indispensables. Je crois pour ma part, — malgré que je n'aie que peu d'expérience sur la matière, — qu'il y aurait moyen encore de rencontrer les dépenses, non pas en imposant une taxe indirecte sur le pauvre, mais en imposant des droits qui seraient supportés par le riche. Ainsi, nous avons des chemins de fer, nous avons des compagnies de télégraphe, nous avons des compagnies de navigation et d'autres qui font des affaires dans le pays. Eh bien, quels sont ceux qui profiteraient les premiers de la réciprocité, de l'augmentation du commerce ? Ce sont évidemment ces compagnies de chemin de fer, de navigation et de télégraphe. Or, à tout seigneur tout honneur ; et je crois qu'il serait à propos alors, si toutefois cela devenait nécessaire, d'imposer un droit ou une taxe sur ces corporations comme la chose se fait actuellement dans la Province de Québec. On se récrierait peut être contre une taxe comme celle-là. Mais à qui l'idée en est-elle due ? Elle est due aux conservateurs de la Province de Québec, qui ont passé la loi imposant une taxe sur toutes les corporations commerciales de la province. Et si je suis bien informé, cette idée a originé ici, à Ottawa ; car le gouvernement de Québec n'était alors que la succursale du gouvernement d'Ottawa. Je crois que ce serait un moyen d'équilibrer nos finances et en même temps de protéger la classe agricole que de faire payer ceux qui retirent les plus grands revenus.

Mais on nous dit que cela ferait un bouleversement complet dans le commerce si on mettait immédiatement en pratique le traité de réciprocité. Eh bien ! cela pourrait se faire graduellement, comme la chose a eu lieu lors du traité de 1854, et comme la chose devait avoir lieu en 1874, quand il y a eu des relations entre George Brown et le gouvernement des Etats-Unis pour le renouvellement du traité. On ne met pas un traité de cette nature en force immédiatement, mais on accorde un certain nombre d'années, un an, deux ans, ou trois ans, avant de le mettre en opération afin qu'il n'y ait pas une perturbation financière.

Maintenant on nous dit : mais les Etats-Unis ne veulent pas de traité de réciprocité. Eh bien ! je crois que ce serait à nous à faire le premier pas. Il ne faut pas se draper dans notre dignité et dire : "Nous, peuple de cinq millions, nous n'avons pas d'affaire à aller tendre la main aux Etats-Unis qui comptent soixante millions. Nous sommes trop fiers pour cela." C'est à nous à faire le premier pas pour la bonne raison que nous avons le plus d'intérêt à la conclusion de ce traité. En effet qui a retiré les plus grands profits des relations commerciales pendant l'existence du traité de 1854 ? Evidemment, ce sont les Canadiens. Et la preuve que les Etats-Unis n'y ont pas trouvé de profit, c'est qu'ils ont demandé qu'il soit abrogé. Je crois que c'est là une preuve suffisante pour démontrer que nous avons plus besoin du traité de réciprocité que les Etats-Unis. Et, par conséquent, si cela est plus avantageux pour nous que pour eux, c'est à nous à faire le premier pas.

Je crois que ceux qui prétendent que nous ne devrions pas faire les premières démarches ne sont pas sérieux et ne sont pas sincères. On a dit dans cette Chambre que nous n'avons pas plus d'avantage avec un traité de réciprocité qu'avec le système actuel. Alors, que l'on soit donc sincère. Si l'on ne trouve pas qu'un traité de réciprocité soit assez avantageux pour le Canada qu'on le dise franchement, et alors on saura à quoi s'en tenir. Je crois que les intérêts du pays devraient être discutés avec plus de loyauté et plus de sincérité. Ce serait le moyen de se renseigner les uns les autres et d'en arriver à une entente.

Maintenant, M. l'Orateur, j'ai prolongé mes remarques plus longtemps que je ne voulais le faire. Je n'avais pas l'intention de faire de discussion sur ce point. C'était plutôt une expression d'opinion que je voulais donner. Ainsi que je l'ai dit en commençant, comme représentant un comté essentiellement agricole, je crois qu'il est dans l'intérêt général de la grande masse de la population que nous faisons tous nos efforts pour en arriver à une entente avec les Etats-Unis. Et si nous arrivons à cette fin de pouvoir avoir des relations commerciales complètes avec les Etats-Unis, je crois que nous aurons une ère de prospérité générale dans tout le pays et surtout pour la classe agricole.

Comme je l'ai dit, je n'aurai pas l'occasion de voter sur cette proposition, étant obligé de m'absenter pour des causes absolument urgentes ; mais j'ai cru de mon devoir d'exprimer mon opinion sur cette question qui recevra de ma part et de la part des électeurs que j'ai l'honneur de représenter l'approbation la plus chaleureuse.

Mr. CHARLTON moved the adjournment of the debate.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Before the adjournment of the debate I would wish to ask the leader of the opposition whether there is any likelihood that the debate will be brought to an end to-morrow.

Mr. LAURIER. No, Mr. Speaker, as far as I can see there is no likelihood for the debate to be concluded to-morrow.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Is there any chance to have the debate end on Monday night ?

Mr. LAURIER. Hardly so, I think.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Can we come to some agreement on both sides about closing the debate say on Tuesday if that would be convenient for members on both sides. We can then go on with the debate as we have done during the last few days until it be finished.

Mr. LAURIER. I think we can agree that there will be no division on Monday. A great many of the members are going home to-morrow to pass the Saturday and Sunday at home and we can say that there will be no division on Monday, but as early as possible afterwards.

Motion agreed to.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to ; and the House adjourned at 12.30 a.m. Friday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 16th March, 1888.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 42) to incorporate the Pontiac and Renfrew Railway Company.—(Mr. Bryson.)

Bill (No. 43) to amend the Act incorporating the Shuswap and Okanagan Railway Company.—(Mr. Mara.)

Bill (No. 44) respecting bonds of branch lines of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.—(Mr. Small.)

Report of the Lobster and Oyster Commission.—(Mr. Foster.)

THE EMPEROR OF GERMANY.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to take the opportunity of enquiring of the First Minister if there is truth in the report which is circulated that the Crown Prince, the present Emperor of Germany, is deceased?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We have no information on that point. I am happy to believe that it is an error.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I thought probably it was.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The report arose, I fancy, from the flags being hoisted half-mast high. They were so hoisted on the reception of a communication from the Home Government, to honor the obsequies of the late Emperor.

RECIPROCITY WITH THE UNITED STATES.

House resumed adjourned debate on proposed motion of Sir Richard Cartwright, and on the proposed amendment of Mr. Foster.

Mr. CHARLTON. Mr. Speaker, the consideration of the question now before the House is a matter of great importance to this country, and it may truly be said, Sir, that no question has been debated in this Chamber since the date of Confederation of as great importance as that now under consideration. It is a question, Sir, which has recently attracted a very large amount of attention in the country; it is a question which to-day occupies in the public mind a more prominent place than any other public question. It is also a question, Sir, which has been discussed and considered for some months past not as a party question; it has been a political question indeed, but it was not a party question. Either of the great parties in this country were at liberty at any time to make this proposition a plank in their platform, or both of the great parties were at liberty to act in concert on this matter for the purpose of procuring what we believe would prove a very great boon to Canada. It is a question, Sir, that can only be said to have assumed the position of a party question, yesterday. It only assumed that position, Sir, when the Minister of Marine introduced his amendment to the motion made by my hon. friend at my right, declaring that in the opinion of this House reciprocity with the United States ought only be sought for upon conditions which would permit us to retain unimpaired the features of the National Policy, or, in other words, that it should only be sought for upon conditions that we are certain would be refused. That, Sir, makes a plain, square issue and makes the question a party question. My hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has introduced his motion, declaring that unrestricted reciprocity between Canada and the United States would prove to be a boon that we are warranted in seeking to obtain; and the Government meets that proposal by a counter-proposition declaring that we will not seek for it—that we will not accept reciprocity with the United States except upon conditions which the Government and the people of that country have distinctly informed us, time and time again and for years past, were inadmissible, and conditions upon which they would not grant it. It now, Sir, becomes a party question, and it is the party question of the day. It will be a party question in all probability for some years in the future, and, Sir, in my belief it is a principle that is bound to triumph in this country. In my belief, Sir, the hope of this country is intimately connected with the triumph of this principle. In considering this question it is well at all times to bear in mind our peculiar position, our peculiar environments and our surroundings upon this continent at the same time. No less than 65,000,000 of people speak the English tongue on this continent to-day, and that is at this moment North America is the great seat of Anglo-Saxon power. Some weeks ago I stood upon the plains of Abraham and looked upon the inscription on that simple shaft erected to the memory of General Wolfe:

“Here died Wolfe victorious, September 17, 1759.”

Well, Sir, 129 years have passed away since then, and the two and a half millions of English-speaking people that then dwelt upon this continent have increased to 65,000,000. When we come to make computations as to the probable increase in numbers and wealth of English speaking people on this continent and are guided in these computations by the experience of the past, the result of such computations would lead one to doubt whether he is waking or dreaming. It is certain, Sir, that in the near future there will be 100,000,000 of English-speaking people on the continent of North America, and in all human probability that number will be living on this continent when we reach the year 1910. It is morally certain that there will be 65,000,000 people in the United States at the next census in 1891, as certain almost is it that there will be 80,000,000 people there in 1900, and that there will be 100,000,000 in 1910. Now, Sir, this being the case, and the fact being apparent that this continent is to be the grandest theatre of Anglo-Saxon achievements and development of Anglo-Saxon power, it becomes us to consider our position as Anglo-Saxons living upon the continent of North America. We should approach the consideration of this question not in a partisan spirit; we should approach the consideration of this question with a view to the promotion of the best interests of this country. It is a question which, above all other questions, requires in its treatment and in its consideration the exercise of patriotic impulses and motives.

Mr. LANDRY. Hear, hear.

Mr. CHARLTON. My hon. friend says "hear, hear." I hope, Sir, he will never lose sight of this sentiment when treating this question. Now, Mr. Speaker, we have forty-five Anglo-Saxon commonwealths and fifteen territorial organisations, besides the commonwealths upon this continent. Part of these are under one flag and part of them are under another, but they are to-day, and they will be in all the days of the future, intimately bound together. The fate of one will influence the fate of the other and it is inevitable such will be the case. Their geographical situation is such that they must necessarily have commercial and social relations of the most intimate character, the one with the other. Now, Sir, in dealing with the question of a proposed commercial treaty with the United States, we have to take into consideration—and we shall find that at every turn of the argument that view of the case will crop up—the relative public burdens resting on the two countries, the amount of the necessary taxation in one and in the other, the burden of debt resting on one and on the other, and the expenditure of one and of the other. We shall have to enter into a process of self-examination to ascertain exactly what our position relatively to that of the United States is. To state the case briefly, we commenced in 1867 with a net debt of $75,000,000; on the 1st of March last our debt amounted to $229,000,000, an increase of $153,600,000 in round numbers, or 203 per cent., while our population did not increase more than 40 per cent. The increase of our debt in that time has been five times more rapid than the increase of our population. We commenced in 1868 with an expenditure of $13,486,000, and last year our expenditure was $35,658,000—that of the preceding year was much higher. That was an increase of $2,000,000, or 164 per cent., an increase of expenditure four times more rapid than the increase of population. Our taxation from Customs in 1868 was $8,578,000, and in 1887 it was $22,378,000, an increase of $13,800,000 or 160 per cent., an increase four times more rapid than the increase of population. Now, you will see that the increase in debt has outstripped the increase of population in a five-fold ratio, the increase of expenditure has outstripped the increase of population in a four-fold ratio, and the increase of taxation has outstripped the increase of population in a four-fold ratio; and the only period in the history of Canada when this course of things has not marked the administration of the affairs of this country, was during the administration of my hon. and most highly esteemed friend at my right (Mr. Mackenzie). Under his administration, though he was compelled, in order to carry out obligations incurred by his predecessors, to increase the debt of this country from 1874-5 to 1878-9, so that the burden of interest was increased $604,000, he diminished the taxation from customs from $15,351,000 in 1874-5 to $12,900,000 in 1878-9, a decrease in taxation of $2,451,000. Although the expenditure chargeable to consolidated fund increased in the same period, by a careful computation, almost exactly $352,000, the controllable expenditure was diminished by $1,782,000. I say, Sir, that period furnished the only instance in the history of Canada since 1867 when the affairs of this country have been administered in other than a reckless manner and a manner contrary to the dictates of economy and prudence. Now, Sir, one result of this extravagance, and of other circumstances to which I shall shortly allude, is to be seen in the exodus of the population of this country. I am aware, Sir, that hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House seek to belittle this loss. I am aware that the accuracy of the statistics furnished by the United States is impugned by them. I am aware that they deny that any unusual movement in that direction has taken place in late years. The hon. Minister of Marine stated yesterday that no unusual movement of late had taken place. The hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Porter) stated that there was a movement to a certain extent, and that the movement from his section was of young men who went to find homes free and untrammelled and cheaper than they could find them in Ontario. While they do go for that purpose, the fact is capable of demonstration that the exodus from this country has been of an alarming character. No person can visit the United States and travel with his eyes open without becoming aware that in the northern States a great percentage of the population is native Canadian. The statistics furnished at Washington show that the immigration from British America to the United States amounted in 1870 to 490,000 souls. The census of 1880 returned 700,000 souls, and 930,000 odd children born in the United States of Canadian parents; so that it is demonstrable that not less than 2,000,000 people are living in the United States who would have had their homes in Canada but for the exodus which has taken place from this country to theirs. This exodus is intimately connected with the administration of affairs of this country. It is caused to a large extent by the serious burdens imposed on the people of the country. It is caused to a still larger extent by the delusive promises made on behalf of the National Policy, which the people of this country are aware have not been and cannot be fulfilled. That National Policy, which was adopted in 1879, promised to the farmers of Canada a market for all their productions. They have not secured it; but on the contrary, instead of receiving higher prices, prices have continued steadily, and year by year, to decline. It promised to the farmers of Canada that American productions should be prevented from coming into competition with Canadian productions, by the duties imposed on the former. That also was a delusion and a snare. It promised that competition between manufacturers in Canada would lower the price of goods, and the truth is that to-day there is no civilised country in the world where the producer buys dearer and sells cheaper than he does in Canada.

Mr. HICKEY. It is not so; you cannot prove it either.

Mr. CHARLTON. It is so. In some cases goods may be absolutely somewhat lower in price than they were ten years ago; but there is no case in which goods are not relatively higher in consequence of the National Policy than they were then. There is no class of goods that it will not pay to smuggle into this country. There are no goods that are not sold in this country almost up to the limit at which similar goods could be imported; and I repeat that Canada is of all civilised countries the one where the great producing classes buy dear and sell cheap. That is the result of the National Policy, and one of the fruits of that policy is to drive from this country hundreds of thousands of its citizens. The hon. Minister of the Interior assured us the other night that the farmers of Ontario were in a happy condition. Well, Sir, I leave the farmers of Ontario to judge, and to say whether that is not entirely destitute of every element of truth, and whether it is not a cruel insult to that class of people. He proceeded to make a comparison between the prices obtainable for certain productions of the soil in Buffalo and in Toronto, and he succeeded in making a comparison in some articles that was favorable to Canada. Now, since the year 1879, when the National Policy went into operation, there never has been a time, in my opinion, after consulting the market reports, when agricultural productions of all kinds were not rated higher in price in the United States markets than in the corresponding Canadian markets, until the past summer; and during the past summer, for the first time since the National Policy was adopted. It has been possible to make a comparison that would be favorable to Canada in a few lines of agricultural productions. And what was the cause of this. It was because last year we had an unprecedented drought in Ontario, which dried up our pastures and caused the country to have a deficient crop; and as a result of that disaster, potatoes were imported from Manitoba, and Ontario became, instead of a producing country, with a surplus to sell, a consuming country which had to purchase supplies in order to meet its wants. Under these conditions, for a short time in the history of Ontario, prices were higher in some lines there than in the corresponding markets of the United States, and the hon. gentleman paraded before this House certain facts which were due solely to a great agricultural disaster, and upon these facts he felicitated himself on the unduly prosperous condition of the country. Well, although perhaps it is not exactly germane to the case, I will allude to the statement made by the hon. the Minister of the Interior with regard to the burdens resting upon the farmers in the western States. The hon. gentleman seems to have conceived that the Chicago Times is an authority of greater value than any statistical report in the country, and he quoted an extract from that paper stating that mortgages in the western States were placed at from 1 to 3 per cent. per month, and that the land in that country was rapidly being swallowed up by capitalists through the foreclosure of mortgages. Now, whether the hon. gentleman was aware of it or not, no statement could have been wider of the truth, and so far as it may have any bearing upon the question under discussion now, I pronounce it to be entirely unfounded. I know from personal experience and observation that 6 per cent. per annum on good mortgage security is considered a satisfactory rate in the States of Illinois, Iowa, Wisconsin, Minnesota and Missouri, and that only do high rates prevail in some of the newer territories, where the security to be considered is of a less solid character. The fact is, there is a plethora of capital in the United States which is seeking investment, at low rates, in any portion of the country where satisfactory security can be obtained, and the statement of the hon. gentleman that 3 per cent. a month is charged on good mortgage security, is utterly unfounded, even if it does emanate from that paper which has been called the Satanic press of Chicago, the Chicago Times. Another result of the policy of this Government is found at the present moment in the condition of our North-West. My hon. friend told us the other night that many Canadians had been entrapped into going to Dakota. Well, I do not know of any individual in this Dominion who has more effectually aided in entrapping Canadians into Dakota than the Minister of the Interior. I do not know of any cause that has operated more effectually to produce immigration to Dakota than the regulations of the Department of the Interior. True, they have been modified somewhat, and for the better, under the administration of my hon. friend. True, they were very much worse under his predecessor, but still those regulations to-day—and I wish that I may be able to impress this fact on the mind of my hon. friend—are of a character to aid most efficiently in entrapping Canadians into Dakota, because they are less liberal than the land regulations of the United States. They are less liberal with reference to homestead grants; they are less liberal as regards the prices of land. They charge as much again for land south of the Canadian Pacific Railway as is charged in the United States for land similarly situated. They charge 75 cents per acre more for land north of the Canadian Pacific Railway than is charged for similar lands in the United States; and these charges have operated most powerfully in diverting emigration from the Canadian North-West to the new territories of the American Union. Another influence that has operated to entrap Canadians into Dakota is the National Policy, which bears with unjust severity upon the people of our North-West. It is a policy which imposes upon them heavy taxation on the implements they introduce into that country, it is a policy which, while on the one hand taxing them mercilessly, denies them on the other hand the means for securing the transmission of the grain that lies piled up in millions of bushels along the Canadian Pacific Railway at the present moment. I visited Manitoba lately, and was informed there that the duty on agricultural implements amounted to over 50 per cent. of their actual cost, under the regulations of the department. Steam threshers and mowing machines introduced at the boundary line at their actual cost, are revalued; their value is increased, and the purchaser obliged to pay a duty of 50 per cent. or more on their cost. These things—these regulations with regard to land, the operation of the National Policy in the North-West, it is that have driven Canadians into Dakota and Minnesota, and that have led to there being more Canadians to-day in the single territory of Dakota than there are in Manitoba and all the territories in the North-West. So much for this diagnosis of the Canadian case. Now, to come to a direct consideration of the question under discussion, I wish to draw the attention of my hon. friends opposite to one most significant fact. The question of commercial or unrestricted reciprocity has been under consideration in the country for some time, and a great number of the farmers' institutes of Ontario, forty out of sixty, have pronounced unequivocally and by overwhelming majorities in favor of this principle embodied in the resolution now before the House. I hold a list in my hand of these institutes, but it is hardly necessary for me to take up the time of the House by reading it at the present moment. I have attended the meetings of some of those institutes, and have found that, in all cases, the sentiment in favor of commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity was of a most pronounced character, and I have found that this sentiment is by no means confined within party lines. The president of one of the institutes, at a meeting of which I attended, was a Reformer. He took the platform in opposition to the principle of unrestricted reciprocity, in reply to the arguments I made in its behalf. I had the privilege of the closing reply, and the vote that was taken showed there were only three present, in the whole meeting, who were opposed to the principle of unrestricted reciprocity. The people feel instinctively that a change is required. They feel that our interests require us to obtain closer trade relations with the United States, and that every impediment placed in the way of trade with that country is an impediment that reacts upon all the great producing classes of this country. Now, Mr. Speaker, as I said a few moments ago; our relative position in the matter of taxation, our relative position in the matter of expenditure and in the matter of debt, to that of the United States is a practical question of the utmost importance to the people of this country. It is a question that will become more and more important to us. It is a question which has a most important bearing upon the welfare of this country, because we have an intelligent people in this Dominion from whom it is impossible to conceal the true condition of affairs, a people who can come to a conclusion themselves as to the meaning of our debt burdens, which is two and a-half times greater than that of the United States, per capita, a people who can calculate for themselves what the increase of expenditure four times more rapidly than the increase of population means, a people who know, in fact, that the course the country is pursuing is one which threatens the gravest disaster; and when they compare the condition of this country with that of the United States, they are induced in a thousand cases to abandon Canada and go to that country. In view of that condition of affairs, I want to point out what the disparity in the burdens of the two countries is, and I do that in order to enforce the argument which I wish to impress upon the House, that the time has come for retrenchment and economy. On the 1st March, this present month, the gross debt of the United States amounted to $1,202,454,714. The net debt amounted to $1,092,927,581, deducting from the gross debt the principal and interest due from the Pacific roads, less their sinking funds. The gross per capita charge in the United States was $20.04, and the net per capita charge $18.22. But the argument which will probably be advanced is that this is not a fair comparison, and that it is necessary, in order to make the comparison a fair one, to add to the debt of the United States the debt of the various States, because, while we grant subsidies to our Provinces, the general Government of the United States does not. If we accept that as a correct statement, and include the debts of the States, funded and unfunded, which amounted in 1887 to $228,347,462, less $50,753,312 sinking funds and assets convertible into cash, or net debt amounting to $177,589,150, we find that the net debt, Federal and State all included, on the 1st March last, was $1,270,516,446, or a per capita charge of $21.18. Now, what is ours? On the basis of four and three-quarter millions of inhabitants, which, I presume, are as many as will be claimed, we find that our net debt of $229,409,430 is equal to a per capita charge of $48.29, or two and one-third times as much as the total indebtedness of the United States, Federal and State. That is a grave state of affairs. It involves taxing this people two and one-third times as much as the people of the United States are taxed. No, it is even heavier, because, while the 3 per cents. in that country are at a high premium, in this country the 3 per cents. are at a discount. Our credit is not as good, and the relative ability to meet the indebtedness is in the ratio of about two and one-third in Canada to one in the United States. Last year, the Government of the United States reduced the national debt by $103,471,097, and the State debts were reduced by $15,260,986, while we increased our indebtedness and made our position worse than it had been at the opening of the year. If we come to the question of customs, we find that last year we raised by customs duties to the amount of $22,469,705, which is a per capita charge of $4.73. In the United States they raised the amount of $217,286,893, or $3.62 per capita. But of that $217,000,000 they applied $103,471,097 towards the extinguishment of their national debt, leaving a net taxation from customs applicable to expenditure of $113,815,796, or a per capita charge of $1.90 against a charge of $4.73 a head in Canada. Under that condition of things, with an actual taxation from customs three times as great as that in the neighboring country, what is likely to be the inevitable result? Is it not time to call a halt in this country and to cease this reckless course of extravagance, this piling up of our debt mountains high, this rushing the country at railroad speed into expenditure, which must lead to financial destruction. The expenditure of the United States did not reach the present expenditure of Canada till that country had more than 20,000,000 inhabitants. The United States never owed more than half of our present debt until it had 32,000,000 inhabitants, except during two years, 1816 and 1817, just after the conclusion of the war with England, when its debt was a trifle more than half our present debt. The practical difficulty between any commissioners appointed between this country and the United States to arrange for reciprocal trade would be this very question, that to arrange an assimilation of our tariffs it would be necessary to do away with the disparity which exists between the two countries as to the revenue required from taxation to meet the expenditure of the two countries. We need to-day to raise almost as much again per head as they do meet our current expenses, and the disparity in this respect is growing every year as we drift wider and wider apart in the matter of debt burden which is resting upon the people. It is undeniable that our progress for the last twenty years has been slow. It is undeniable that it has been slow as compared with the progress of the United States during that period of their national existence which corresponds with ours during the last twenty years. In 1790, that country had a population of 3,900,000. In 1810, twenty years later, its population had increased to 7,250,000. During all that time, it is estimated that the accession to the population from immigration did not reach 140,000 souls. Now, have we as satisfactory an exhibit to present as that? We would have had, if we had not lost two million people—one million who left us and their progeny who would have been with us if we had not lost that population. We do not present so favorable a record as that by two or three million souls. Is this progress, this unsatisfactory rate of progress that we have made, due to inferiority of race? No, it is not. The hon. member from Huron (Mr. Porter) very truthfully said last night that our emigrants to the United States maintained the reputation of Canada wherever they went. So they do. There is not an element in the population of the United States more progressive, more highly esteemed, more successful than the native Canadians who are in that country. We are losing the life-blood of this young country, we are losing the most energetic of our population, who are going to swell the resources, to swell the wealth and increase the might of that great power which has already some 60,000,000 of a population. We can only regret that we have not those men here. We can only deplore the circumstances which have led them away from our soil, but we can seek to arrest the course which has led to this. Is it due to lack of natural resources? There is scarcely a country in the world which is more abundantly blessed by Providence and nature than ours. Its fisheries, its timber, its minerals, its agricultural lands, the boundless prairies of the west, show that this country was designed by Providence to be the home of millions of men and to become a great and wealthy power, and it is failing to reach the destiny which Providence and nature designed to give it, not because of a lack of natural resources, but through the lack of men to develop those resources, who have been driven from the country by the stupidity of the Government of the day. What is the remedy for this state of things? We require various things—honesty in the administration of the country, economy, retrenchment, and we require access to our natural markets; we require continental free trade, and without continental free trade, without access to the markets of 60,000,000 of people to the south of us, we cannot progress satisfactorily. Our geographical affinities are not with the nations across the Atlantic, but with the kindred commonwealth to the south of us. The Maritime Provinces have followed the dictates of nature and geography; they export their potatoes, their fish, their lumber, their coal and their various other productions to the sea-boards of the Atlantic, and they bring back from those seaboards such articles as they may be able to buy at advantage in that country. It is their natural trade. Geographical affinities say they shall trade in that direction, and it is only artificial barriers that prevent their carrying on a lucrative trade with those seaboard cities. Ontario and Quebec, that lie right alongside the great markets of the American Union, the great centres of population and wealth; alongside the State of New York, with nearly 6,000,000 of inhabitants within its borders, and the great metropolis of this continent, possessing three times the wealth of the whole Dominion of Canada,—there is our natural market. Geographical affinities say we should trade there. Our railway lines lead to that country, everything invites us to trade there except tariffs, which prevent our availing ourselves of the advantage that nature designed we should reap. Manitoba is naturally a portion of the Mississippi, and would naturally trade with St. Paul, and Minneapolis, and Chicago, and St. Louis, and to debar Manitoba and the North-West from access to those great markets, and the shortest routes to the great markets of the east, is burdening them with restrictions not calculated to promote their interests. British Columbia, with its timber, its fish and its coal, finds her natural markets down on the Pacific coast, in Oregon, in California, the most natural markets that province can seek or obtain; but the hostile tariffs between the two countries forbid British Columbia to enjoy the advantages that nature designs she should reap from commercial transactions with those Pacific States. What is the character, Mr. Speaker, of the United States domestic commerce? It is a commerce enormous in its magnitude and varied in its character. The country possesses almost every kind of climate, almost every kind of soil, almost every production of nature, and the commercial transactions between the several States of that nation are so enormous that they would be scarcely credited, if they were stated in detail. Now, we are shut out from that commerce, we are debarred from participating in that trade which has contributed to the so rapid advancement of that country. In order to participate in that trade, we must have access to those markets, and when we do have access to those markets, then we will move along side by side in the steps of progress, abreast of these American States, progressing as rapidly as they do, and unless we do obtain that access to our natural markets, we shall be cribbed, cabined and confined by the restrictions placed upon us here. Now, as I stated a few moments ago, we have 5,000,000 of people, in round numbers, in the Dominion; there are, speaking within limits, 60,000,000 in the United States. There will be 65,000,000 in a few years hence, and 80,000,000 before the end of this century. Now, this people, who will amount to 100,000,000 in 1910, this nation is to-day the richest nation in the world. The actual value of its property is $58,000,000,000; that of Great Britain, $48,000,000,000. The wealth of the United States is $10,000,000,000 greater than that of the United Kingdom. The earnings of the people of the United States last year were $1,050,000,000; the earnings of the people of the United Kingdom were $280,000,000 less; the earnings of the people of France $350,000,000 less, and the earnings of the people of the German Empire over $400,000,000 less than the people of the United States. Well, if this great nation, right at our doors, with more wealth than any other nation, with nearly twice the population of the United Kingdom, with its prospective growth—if there is anything that can compensate us for the loss of access to the markets of that nation, I would like to be informed what that thing is. I do not believe anything can compensate this country for the loss of access to the markets of that country. Now, the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Porter) told us, last night, that we should be sorry if we proceeded to starve our infant industries. I suppose the hon. gentleman proceeded upon the assertion that we are creating those infant industries in order to furnish a home market for the produce of the soil in this country. Well, if that is his object, I can explain to him how he can obtain a short road to that result. The United States have been engaged for twenty-five years in developing a home market. They have now a greater manufacturing interest than any other nation in the world. The United States is the great manufacturing nation of the world; it exceeds England. According to the census of 1880, the productions of the manufactures of the United States were $5,369,000,000; in 1882, the productions of the manufactures of England were $4,092,000,000. The United States, in 1880, produced $1,279,000,000 more manufactures than Great Britain did in 1882. Now, if it is desirable to have a market, if it is desirable to foster our infant industries at a great cost for the time being in order to create a market for the future, is it not more desirable to take a short cut to a market already created, created at a great cost, and created through the operation, if my hon. friend's theory is correct, of a protective tariff during twenty-five years, a market which produces more goods in a year than the manufactures of England do. I say it is not desirable to obtain access to that market by a short cut, rather than to spend years in a futile endeavor to create a market here which never can equal in importance the market already created and opened to us there? Now, Sir, the practical question is, how shall we reach this market? The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries told us last night that we had given the United States the strongest invitation to reciprocity that could be given. He asks, what can be a stronger invitation to reciprocity than our standing offer of 1879? Now, the hon. gentleman is Minister of Fisheries, and I wonder, Sir, if he is not sufficiently astute as a fisherman to change his bait when he is fishing for nine years without getting a nibble. This offer has been standing since 1879—an inducement so strong, he says, that we could not make it stronger; and yet, time and again, the Americans have spurned the offer, they have told us they would not consider it, that they would not 'bite,' and we may keep the offer standing until doomsday without their ever considering it. Sir, the hon. gentleman is attempting to mislead the country when he asserts that we have made an offer as strong as can be made, inviting the American people to reciprocal trade relations. They know that our offer is not a desirable one; we have made an offer that we know they will not accept; and the hon. gentleman is not—well, I won't use the word I was going to use—the hon. gentleman is taking a course in this matter that is not calculated to give the country a proper impression as to the course this Government is pursuing. This Government is not seeking reciprocity, this Government does not want reciprocity, except on inadmissible terms; it will not take reciprocity on such terms as it can be obtained, and that is made perfectly apparent by the motion made by the hon. gentleman, pitting the National Policy against unrestricted reciprocity. Yes, Mr. Speaker, the gauntlet thrown down we have taken up, the challenge given we accept, and we will fight the issue out before the people of this country upon that line alone.

Mr. HESSON. You will have a good time of it.

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes, we will have a good time of it, and the hon. gentleman from Perth may have a little participation in that good time. Now, Sir, this is a matter that requires careful consideration. If this celebrated standing offer that we have had on our Statute-book for nine years is not acceptable to the United States, it is our duty to ascertain what the Americans demand. Will they grant reciprocity on any terms whatever? It is our duty to ascertain how that case is, how we are to meet them. What probability is there of achieving success under any circumstances whatever? We have indications which point most unmistakably to the conclusion that reciprocal trade with the United States can be obtained. We have the letter of Mr. Bayard, we have the declarations of several public men in the United States. We have the introduction of two Bills, one by Mr. Butterworth and one by Mr. Hitt, the one corresponding in its essential features with the proposal we have under discussion now; the other, that by Mr. Hitt, proposing an arrangement equal to commercial union. We have the fact that the last named Bill was reported yesterday unanimously. I am led to believe that the great mass of American public men will look favorably upon the consideration of any proposal that involves the granting of reciprocal trade arrangements with Canada upon a basis which will not be, like the old Reciprocity Treaty, only advantageous to one side. They simply ask in this arrangement that their own interests should be considered as well as ours, that the arrangements should not be exclusively advantageous to one side but mutually advantageous to both, and as honest men I do not think we would feel disposed to ask more. In his speech the other night the Minister of Interior was good enough to quote a certain statement made by myself in Haldimand in definition of what constitutes commercial union. I do not know that I would have alluded to the subject but for that reference made by the Minister of Interior. He told us that commercial union meant—and the hon. gentleman will correct me if I do injustice to him in the statement—the same duties to be collected against the outside world in Canada as were now collected in the United States. That was the distinct statement made by the Minister of Interior—that commercial union simply meant the adoption by Canada of the present tariff of the United States. If the hon. gentleman made that statement deliberately understanding what he did mean, he either did not understand what commercial union meant or he made a statement calculated to mislead the country. No advocate of commercial union either in Canada or the United States assumes or proposes that the present tariff of the United States is to be adopted by either one country or the other. No advocate of commercial union assumes that an arrangement will be made that does not involve a re-arrangement of the tariff, an arrangement satisfactory to both powers and consented to by both powers, and neither one power or the other is obliged to enter into an arrangement for commercial union unless the arrangement is satisfactory—it must be made satisfactory, and it does not imply that the present tariff of the United States will be adopted as the tariff to be levied under commercial union.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Will the hon. gentleman allow me. I understand him to say that I implied that the proposition was that the present tariff of the United States was to be adopted as commercial union. I did not so state and did not so imply. What I did state was this: I inferred from the statement of the hon. gentleman that whatever was the tariff of the United States, that would be the tariff of Canada; that is to say, we would have the same tariff, whatever that tariff might be, against all other countries, with free trade as between these two countries. Is that the proposition now before the House by hon. gentlemen?

Mr. CHARLTON. No, it is not. I was led to discuss that question from the fact that the hon. Minister had alluded to it; and if he would add that the tariff would be one consented to by Canada and acceptable to Canada, then he would have made a fair statement of the case.

Mr. BOWELL. It would be against the rest of the world, would it not?

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes.

Mr. CHARLTON.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. By mutual agreement.

Mr. CHARLTON. I might as well define what I understand commercial union to mean. The definition read by the Minister of Interior, quoted from the speech made by me in Haldimand, is exactly what I do understand commercial union to mean. I understand commercial union to mean an arrangement between two or more powers or as many more as choose to join—for in the commercial union of Germany there were all the German States—an arrangement made between two or more countries whereby they adopt a common tariff and common excise laws, abolish all commercial restrictions between themselves, abolish all customs lines between themselves, collect a revenue at any point where the goods may be entered from any material, throw that whole revenue into one common fund, divide that fund, after taking out the cost of collection, either upon the basis of a per capita division or upon such other division or upon such other basis as may be mutually agreed upon by the contracting parties.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I do not desire to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but perhaps he will go further and state whether that is the proposition now before the House by the hon. gentleman.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman has been told most distinctly, and it has been stated a dozen times on this side of the House, that it is not the proposition. I can add that the hon. gentleman and his followers must have been even more stupid, if that is possible, than is usually the case.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am not so uncharitable as my hon. friend. I do not accuse the hon. gentleman of stupidity, but he evidently believes that the country is considerably stupid and that he can mislead the people upon this question by dragging a red herring across the trail. So much for the question of commercial union arising indirectly on this question, owing to the remarks made by the Minister of Interior.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh! oh!

Mr. CHARLTON. Some hon. gentlemen say "Oh, oh," as if this was a question we would not dare to discuss. I am ready to discuss this question, I am not afraid of it. It is not, however, the question under discussion. The resolution under the consideration of the House is a resolution with regard to unrestricted reciprocity; but that is only a means of arriving at commercial relations between two countries that may be arrived at in some other way. We have adopted that because we consider it preferable to the others simply for that and for no other reason. With respect to unrestricted reciprocity, let us define what we understand that to mean. We understand—at least I understand by unrestricted reciprocity—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh! oh!

Mr. CHARLTON. I do not profess to speak for the world and for all men, I speak for myself. I understand by unrestricted reciprocity an arrangement that would admit into the United States all the natural productions of Canada, all the manufactured productions of Canada, all the productions of Canada of any nature, character or name whatever, free of duty; an arrangement which would reciprocally admit into Canada all the productions of the United States of the same character; that we leave the United States free to impose such duties as they choose upon the productions of other countries imported into that country; that we leave Canada free to do the same thing, and raise its revenue from importation duties in such a way as it may choose, on such scale of duties as it may choose to impose, leaving both countries perfectly free to carry out its own arrangements except in so far as reciprocal trade between the two countries is concerned in the productions of the two countries. I do not know whether that is sufficiently definite for the hon. gentleman.

Mr. WHITE. (Cardwell). Is that your proposition?

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes, as I understand it.

Mr. BOWELL. Do you include articles produced in the United States and not produced in Canada vice versa.

Mr. CHARLTON. Certainly. The United States produces a good many articles that we do not, and we produce some that they do not. The arrangement contemplates a perfect reciprocal trade, a reciprocal trade that admits all the products of one country into the other. Now, I would ask, Mr. Speaker, can reciprocity, the question which we are discussing, be considered a mere theoretical question? Do we know anything about the operation of this system? We know that in 1787 thirteen States comprising then the American Union entered into an arrangement which was practically equivalent to reciprocal trade between those States. Those States, it is true, existed under a Federal Union, but each one of those States, and all the States subsequently admitted to the American Union, retained their distinct dominion. Each State retained control over its criminal code and its civil code, and, in fact, the jurisdiction of their Legislatures is much more wide than the jurisdiction of the Legislatures of the Provinces of this Dominion. They were thirteen nations then—they are thirty-eight nations now, banded together for certain common purposes; and those thirty-eight nations, commencing with thirteen, have existed and progressed since 1787 with unrestricted trade existing between all these States. What is the result of that unrestricted reciprocity? In 1884, as my hon. friend at my right informed the House, the internal commerce of that country, according to Mr. Nimmo, amounted to \$10,000,000,000. Last year the internal commerce amounted to \$11,500,000,000, based upon the increase of tonnage transported upon the railways of that country. Now, Sir, how does that compare with the total commerce carried by the total shipping of the world exclusive of the United States? Do you suppose it equals the commercial transactions of England, France, Germany and all the Maritime States of Christendom, excluding, of course, the United States? Yet, Sir, the commerce of all those countries last year amounted to \$4,213,000,000 as against \$11,500,000,000 in the United States. The internal commerce of the United States in reality had two and a-half times the volume of the entire commerce of all the nations of the world, leaving out the United States. That is an astounding statement. Including England, including every country except the United States, this latter country last year had a vastly greater volume of commerce than all the others. 149,000 miles of railway have moved last year 482,245,000 tons of freight. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance informed us last night we had moved the same year in Canada 16,000,000 tons, or one three-one-hundredth part of the freight moved upon the railways of the United States. The amount of freight moved by all the nations of the world, exclusive of the United States, was 92,432,000 tons, which is less than one-quarter the freight moved on American railways. The earnings of the United States railways were \$824,000,000 last year; the earnings of all the shipping of the world, leaving out the shipping of the United States, amounted to \$535,000,000; the railways of the United States earned on freight \$287,000,000 more last year than all the shipping of the world, excepting the shipping of the United States. Those facts enable us to form some dim conception of the vast volume of that commerce created by one hundred years' experience of the system of reciprocity between the commonwealths composing that great confederation. Do you think, Mr. Speaker, that a tariff would be tolerated between the eastern groups of those States and any of the other groups, or between the middle group or any of the other groups, or between the southern or Pacific groups? Do you think that a tariff would be permitted by the States of the Union to exist between any one of those groups? No, Sir, it would be detrimental to their interests and never would be permitted. I would like to ask, Mr. Speaker, in what does this great northern group, extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific oceans and embracing all the Provinces and territories of the Dominion—in what respect, geographical or natural, this northern group differs from either the southern, the middle, the western, the eastern or the Pacific group of the great American confederation? Geographically we are the same, our interests are exactly the same as theirs, and to debar us from that continental trade enjoyed by all those States is to inflict upon us the same injuries that would be inflicted upon any one of those groups of States if they had not their internal commercial relations with their sister States. I repeat, Sir, that our interests in this great continental group of Anglo Saxon commonwealths are identical with the interests of every group of commonwealths in this great constellation, and that to debar the States which comprise this Dominion from free access to the markets of the country south of us is just as detrimental to our interests as would be the attempt, which would be resisted by every State in the Union, to place any particular State under similar disabilities to those which are forced upon us. Reciprocity, Sir, is not a mere theory; it has worked the most beneficent results in that great country, it has increased the population from 3,900,000 to 61,000,000, and it has produced those astounding results in trade and commerce which I have laid before the House. It has made that country the wealthiest and most powerful nation in the world, a nation which in 1862 contained but a little more than one-half the population and considerably less than one-half the wealth it does to-day. It enabled that country to place in the field two and a-half millions of armed men and to incur an expenditure of \$6,000,000,000, which is nearly wiped out to-day. Now, notwithstanding natural laws and notwithstanding artificial restrictions, I say that natural laws do assert themselves. When those artificial restrictions were temporarily removed to a partial extent in the period extending between 1854 and 1865, that increase in the commerce of this country with the United States as explained by my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) yesterday, was prodigious. The total trade of Canada with the United States ran up from \$20,000,000 in 1854 to \$84,000,000 in 1865. Since the restrictions have been reimposed that trade has fallen back, and after a lapse of twenty-four years the total trade between Canada and the United States is some \$2,000,000 less than it was in 1865, showing the beneficent results produced by reciprocity and the opposite result by restricted trade measures. Mr. Speaker, if we were to adopt unrestricted reciprocity we would have the same ratio of increase as the United States, and if unrestricted reciprocity went into operation this year, by the year 1900 our trade with the United States would be \$325,000,000 with the same ratio of increase. You must bear in mind, Sir, that the proposition before this House contemplates the throwing off of all shackles which existed during the reciprocity treaty. That was only a partial reciprocity treaty, a reciprocity treaty merely in natural products; but now the proposition we are discussing contemplates the admission of all the products of both countries, and there is no reason, Sir, for supposing that under the operation of such a treaty that commerce between the United States and Canada would not equal \$500,000,000 in the year of our Lord 1900, but notwithstanding the restrictions imposed upon trade there is still a great amount of trade transacted between those two countries. Last year, of the total amount of imports into Canada, 42 $\frac{1}{10}$ per cent. came from the United States, of the total amount of exports from this country 42 per cent. of all went to the United States. We are importing from the United States \$45,000,000, in round numbers, and exporting \$37,000,000, with the result that the volume of trade inward is $42\frac{2}{3}$ per cent. of the whole, and outward 42 per cent. of all our trade, as I have said. Now I shall come to the consideration, Mr. Speaker, of the most practical part of this question, the one that interests the great producing classes of Canada, and I would proceed to the consideration of this branch of the question by asking, what do we sell them? We sell them horses, cattle, sheep, peas, and on those articles a duty of 20 per cent is levied. We sell them fish, and by the United States returns, the duty on fish last year was 21.72 per cent. We sell them barley, rye, oats, and buckwheat, and the duty on each of these articles is 10 cents a bushel. We sell them potatoes, on which the duty is 15 cents per bushel. We sell them hops, on which the duty is eight cents a pound. We sell them wool, on which the duty is 10 cents a pound; hay, on which the duty is \$2 a ton; lumber, on which the duty is \$2 per ton; butter, on which the duty is four cents a pound; iron ore, on which the duty is 75 cents per ton; coal, on which the duty is 75 cents per ton; and salt, on which the duty is 12 cents per cwt. in bags, and six cents per cwt. in bulk. We sell them all these articles and many more. The American statistics are not kept as well as ours, I am sure my hon. friend the Minister of Customs will be glad to hear, and it is impossible to ascertain from them with exactness the amount of duties collected on Canadian imports last year or any preceding year. They give the amount in mass, but do not distinguish countries as we do in our statistics, and there has been no change in their practice in that respect since 1920. But we can arrive with a fair degree of accuracy at the amount of duty paid to the American Government on Canadian imports, and that amount was last year in all about \$5,500,000. Now, the practical question that interests the people of this country above all others is, who pays this duty? If it can be shown that the American consumer pays the duty—that for these articles which we export to the United States we get just as much as we would if no duty was imposed, I think one reason we urge for adopting unrestricted reciprocity would cease to exist; but if it can be shown that in the majority of cases the prices we received for these various articles is just so much less than it would be by the amount of the duty, then we have a very practical interest in the question. Now, we will consider this question first, in the light of the farmer's case, next in that of the fisherman's, next in that of the lumberman's, and then in that of the miner's. Now, I will trouble you with a few figures, showing the quantities of articles imported from Canada into the United States last year, because this is a very important point, and I wish to attempt to demonstrate the position I take. I give the quantities of certain articles imported, and I compare the volume of those imports with the production of the same articles in the United States, as shown in the census of 1880, except that in the case of barley I take the production of 1886, as I was able to obtain that:

| Barley..... | 9,437,717 bush. | 10 cts. | $943,771 | 60,000,000 bush. |
| Beans..... | 197,764 " | 10 " | 20,680 | |
| Pease..... | 405,358 " | 20 " | 66,268 | |
| Wheat..... | 341,508 " | 20 " | 68,300 | 459,483,137 " |
| Malt..... | 182,176 " | 20 " | 34,435 | 18,273,102 " |
| Potatoes..... | 1,276,809 " | 15 " | 191,520 | 169,458,539 " |
| Hay..... | 69,460 tons | $2 | 138,900 | 35,205,712 tons |
| Horses..... | 18,225 | 20 p. c. | 442,867 | 10,357,488 |
| Cattle..... | 45,765 | 26 " | 177,551 | 35,925,461 |
| Sheep..... | 363,046 | 20 " | 194,896 | 35,192,074 |
| Wool..... | 1,297,867 lbs. | 10 " | 129,786 | 155,681,751 lbs. |

These figures show that we sold them one bushel of barley to every seven they produced; one bushel of wheat to every 1,200 bushels they produced; one bushel of malt to every 100 bushels they produced; one bushel of potatoes to every

Mr. CHARLTON.

130 bushels they produced; one ton of hay to every 500 tons they produced; one horse to every 600 they raised, one head of cattle to every 700 head they raised, one sheep to every 100 they raised, and one pound of wool to every 130 they produced. I do not think any one will say that the removal of the duties charged by the United States on these articles which we sold to them would have the effect of reducing the price of their own productions. I do not think you can convince the common-sense yeomanry of this country that it would, because they know that the volume of our exports to the United States is so small compared with the volume of the United States productions, that the imposition of the duty has little or no effect on the price in that country. Upon these articles which I have enumerated there was collected last year \$2,500,000 of duties; and in addition to the articles I have named, we sold them buckwheat, rye, oats, turnips, vegetables, hops, flaxseed, seeds, poultry, butter, cheese, mutton, meats, &c., &c. The duties paid on all the articles sold by the farmers of Canada in the United States last year amounted to no less than \$3,000,000, and the proportion these articles bear to the total quantity in the United States is infinitely small. It is preposterous to suppose that the removal of the duty from these articles, the quantity of which is so small compared with the total raised in that country, would seriously affect the prices of the bulk of these goods produced in the United States. Then with regard to the fishermen's case. Last year we exported to the United States fish to the amount of \$2,717,509, the duty on which, estimating it at an average of 20 per cent., which is $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. less than the rate given in the United States returns, was \$543,500. Now, the United States production of fish in the same year amounted to \$43,046,053. We sold them therefore one-sixteenth of the quantity of fish they consumed, and they themselves raised or produced fifteen-sixteenths. It will hardly be maintained that the removal of the 20 per cent. duty on one-sixteenth of the entire product would affect to any appreciable extent the value of the remaining fifteen-sixteenths. With regard to the lumbermen's case, we sold to the United States last year 508,304,000 feet of plank boards and joists, the duty on which amounted to \$1,016,608. In addition we sold to the United States lath, hardwoods, lumber, deals, spruce lumber, deal ends, pickets, staves, shingles, &c., and I have no doubt that the total amount of duty collected in that country on the product of our forests reached \$1,200,000. While we sold to the United States that quantity of lumber, they produced themselves, according to the census of 1880, 18,000 mille feet, and the production last year was undoubtedly much greater. Our exports to them, therefore, averaged but one thirty sixth part of their total produce of lumber. I do not think that the removal of the duty on our small percentage of one thirty-sixth would at all affect the price of the balance, and the result is that we pay the duty on the lumber we export. Let us look at the miners' case. Last year we sold to the United States 404,042 tons of coal, on which the duty collected amounted to \$303,032, and the production in 1880 in the United States—a production which has since largely increased—was 70,480,426 tons of coal. Last year it must have reached 10,000,000 tons. I doubt very much whether the removal of the duty of 400,000 tons would seriously affect the price of 10,000,000 tons. Of iron ore we sold last year to the United States, 23,385 tons from the Lake Superior ports, and the United States produced in 1880, 7,061,829. Last year no doubt the production in that country reached 10,000,000 tons. The trade in iron ore last year from the Lake Superior ports was of vast volume, reaching a value of over \$30,000,000. It employed over one-third of the total tonnage on the lakes. You could go to Erie, Cleveland, Black Rock, or Buffalo, and in each port you would find vast fleets of ore-carrying vessels. The business was one of enormous magnitude, and which conferred great advantages on the commercial community of all the States bordering on the upper lakes, and while the volume of that trade amounted to 10,000,000 tons in these ports, we have to show on this side this paltry figure of \$23,000 tons as the total export of our ore to the United States. And this in face of the fact that there is lying at Coes Mine, at the head of the Ontario and Central Road, actually over 30,000 tons of iron ore, which have been lying there for the last two years. We have on the Canadian side an enormous quantity of ore of the best quality, and but for the restriction placed on the trade, our export would amount to millions of tons annually; it would give employment to thousands of men and millions of capital and furnish traffic to new railway lines. Instead of that, we have, owing to the restriction imposed on our export trade, but the beggarly show to make of 10,000 tons shipped to the United States. We pay the duty on what little we do send. If we did not, we would send to the United States vastly more, because there would be an enormous demand for it, and the quality of our ore being superior to what is obtained in the States. Let the restriction imposed on our exports of ore be removed, and an enormous demand for it will spring up. Turning to the article of copper ore, I find that last year we sold 5,267 tons to our neighbors. We have an enormous quantity of this ore on our shores, but the duty of 2½ cents effectually bars the trade. Of salt, last year we sold to the United States 106,335 cwt., while the United States production in 1880 was 29,805,293 cwt. Our salt obtained the small sale it did in spite of the duty, and solely on its merits, because it is of a superior quality, and if the duty were removed it would force its way into American consumption. But for the duty an enormous trade would spring up in the salt districts of Lake Huron. One of the best demonstrations of an increase in trade which will be sure to follow the removal of the duties, is furnished by the trade on eggs. In 1870, our export to the United States amounted to \$314,000, in 1873 it reached \$631,204, and in 1887, \$1,821,464. That little item has grown to be one of the most important articles of export in Canada, simply because the duty was removed on the importation of eggs into the United States. So much for the question of who pays the duty upon what we export to the United States. I repeat that, in my opinion, the volume of our exports to that country is so insignificant in comparison with the vast bulk of the production of that country, that the duty imposed is simply extracted from the prices received by the producer in this country. Our trade with the Americans last year amounted to \$45,107,066 of their productions. What did we buy? We bought cotton goods, coal, furniture, tools, implements, machinery, hardware, books, coal oil, manufactured brass, cotton, tobacco, hides, &c., and the duty on these imports amounted to \$7,99,591. To what extent did the duty on these articles enhance the cost to the consumer? Did he get them for the additional cost of \$7,290,000, being the amount of the duty? What would they have cost, in other words, had the duties not being imposed? This brings out one of the objectionable features of indirect taxation that I am about to demonstrate. Every dollar imposed by this Government in the shape of duty means an enhanced cost to the consumer of \$1.50. The \$1 of duty is added to the cost of the article by the wholesale dealer when he receives the article in his store. Then he proceeds to figure up his profit on the cost of that article, and assesses his profit, not on the cost in the invoice, but on the cost with the duty added, which is part of what he pays for the goods. If, therefore, his profit be 20 per cent., that article goes to the retail merchant, costing him \$1.20 more than it would have cost him had there been no duty. The retail merchant, when he places the article upon his shelf, figures his profit of 25 per cent. on the total cost of the article, so that he adds 25 per cent. on \$1.20—not on a dollar—and the consumer has to pay the profit in each case on the duty, as well as on the invoice price of the goods. I maintain, therefore, that every dollar of duty levied by the Government implies a loss to the consumer of \$1.50, unless the wholesale dealer's profit is less than 20 per cent., and the retail dealer's less than 25 per cent.

Mr. BOWELL. Except in the United States.

Mr. CHARLTON. In all countries. I am demonstrating that the duty of $77,000,000 levied upon our importations from the United States last year, meant more than an enhanced cost to the consumer to the extent of the duty alone. It meant an additional tax of 50 per cent. on the duty imposed, and last year this tax must have reached $10,000,000. Our imports from the United States last year of goods not manufactured—perhaps the hon. the Minister of Customs will correct if I am wrong—amounted, in round figures, to $21,000,000, and our imports of coal, corn, hides, tobacco, settlers' effects, amounted to $15,200,000. The imports of manufactured goods, if that statement be correct, would amount to $24,000,000, on which this duty of $7,292,591 was imposed. Now, the question is, who paid the duty? It may be said that if we claim that the duty on exports from Canada is paid by the producer in Canada, we must admit that on imports from the United States into Canada the American producer must pay the duty. But the cases are not analogous. While we export to the United States an amount of our productions which is scarcely felt in their market, we buy from the United States an amount which is equal to $1 in every $223 produced in that country, because the production in the United States in 1880 was $3,369,579,191, and our imports amounted to about $24,000,000. So, if that trade was destroyed, if we bought nothing from them, it would make very little difference in the volume of their business or in the prices asked in the country. If this theory is correct, and I contend it is, and I believe that the thinking, practical classes of people in this country will see that it is, then the loss to Canada from duties which are imposed on the exports from this country and on the imports into this country amounts, in regard to the producing classes of this country, to at least $15,000,000 a year. In addition to that, there is another feature to which I wish to draw the attention of the House. For every shipment from Canada to the United States, no matter how insignificant the amount may be, the shipper must obtain a consular certificate, and that involves trouble and cost. In every entry made at custom houses in the United States, the shipper must run the risk of seizure and trouble with the custom house authorities, and that feature of the trade deters a great number of men who would be buyers and operators in the market from engaging in the business at all, and it deprives this country of the advantage of competition to a marked extent, it deprives us of a class of men who would be our most valuable dealers and would pay the best prices for our productions, but on this account they will not come to this market at all. If either of these bought a drove of horses or a herd of cattle and entered them at a custom house in the United States, and it was claimed that the entry was under the amount of the proper value, and the animals were detained there, and the dealer had to summon witnesses to prove that his entry was correct, it is clear that that is a class of trade that a great many people will avoid; and my belief and my practical knowledge of this matter warrants me in saying that we lose half as much from the lack of competition in regard to our commodities as we do on the duties which have to be paid on those commodities. If we lose $5,500,000 in duties, we probably lose $3,000,000 a year by the lack of competition, by the repelling of these competitors who would otherwise engage in the trade, by the custom house restrictions. We lose something else besides this. We not only lose the benefit of the competition we would have but for the absurd restrictions upon trade, but we lose the great benefit, which we cannot estimate, which would accrue to this country from the increase of trade. If our trade with the United States last year was $82,000,000, and if the adoption of this policy would run it up in twelve years to $300,000,000, what amount are we losing? The loss is greater in that direction than the loss from duties or the loss from want of competition, and we can scarcely measure or compute the loss which Canada sustains through the duties which are imposed, and through the regulations which hamper the interchange of commodities between the two countries. I will conclude this branch of my subject by saying that unrestricted reciprocity would, beyond all question, benefit the farmer, that it would benefit the fisherman, that it would benefit the lumberman, that it would benefit the mine owner, that it would benefit the laborer, and, of the 287,000 people in Canada who were given by the census as belonging to the industrial classes, the great majority were blacksmiths, carpenters, shoemakers, masons, bakers, brickmakers, and so forth, all of whom would be benefitted by this arrangement. In fact, it would benefit ninety-nine out of every hundred in this Dominion. In fact, it would benefit all except the rings and the combines and the pet industries which have been fostered and pampered by this Government, and have been permitted by this unjust legislation to prey upon their fellow citizens. I have no doubt that the adoption of this policy would increase the value of farm property in a few years by at least 30 per cent. I have no doubt that it would increase the value of mine property beyond computation. I have no doubt that it would increase the value of the timber lands in this Dominion by at least 50 per cent. I believe the adoption of this policy would stop emigration, that it would bring back to us a portion of the million Canadians whom we have lost through emigration to the United States. I believe it would lead to a rapid increase of wealth, and would be in every respect an unmixed blessing to the vast majority of the people of Canada. Now, I propose to consider the question as to whether unrestricted reciprocity would injure the only remaining class that I have not alluded to, I mean our manufacturers. I have no doubt that a change as radical as this would be would unsettle some lines of business. I have no doubt that it might prove injurious to some manufactures. Common fairness compels me to say that I believe this might be the case, but I believe that the result of this policy, the average outcome of it, would be the conferring of great advantages on the manufacturing class as a whole of this Dominion, and I shall proceed to give to the House the reasons I have for this belief. There is no doubt that its adoption would rout the combines. It would rout the sugar combine and the cotton combine, and all those other combines that our friends on the other side of the House have felt compelled to have a committee to deal with.

Mr. HESSON. Have they not combines on the other side?

Mr. CHARLTON. I think they have, but they are about to strangle them there, while here they are the result of the hon. gentleman's own policy, they are his own offspring, and he would hardly attempt to deal with them in that way.

An hon. MEMBER. It would be infanticide.

Mr. CHARLTON. An hon. gentleman says it would be infanticide, but these combines are hardly infants, they are monsters. I would like to enquire, why our manufacturers in Canada cannot succeed. Are we a people of less intelligence or of less enterprise than the Americans? Are we unable to compete with them in an open race in a fair field, with no favor shown? We will hardly admit that. Have we not as cheap labor as they have, and have we not as cheap capital as they have? I hold that we have, and I hold that in any industry in Canada that was adapted to the country, that was a natural industry, we could compete with the Americans, and I believe that opening the markets of 60,000,000 people to our manufactures would lead to a vast increase in the manufacturing operations of this Dominion. We have unrivalled facilities in this country for the manufacture of boots and shoes. We have the hemlock bark and we have innumerable hides in this country. We have also unrivalled opportunities for engaging in manufactures of wood, and millions of dollars could be profitably employed in that direction. The various productions of wood in the United States employ over $100,000,000 of capital. We have great advantages in this country for the production of a superior quality of tweeds, of blankets and of woollen goods of various kinds. We raise the best combing wools on this continent, which is a branch that could be indefinitely extended if we had access to the markets of the United States. We have great advantages for the manufacture of paper and of wood pulp. We have the forests, we have the raw material in abundance, and this might become a very important branch of manufacture in Canada if we had the market of the United States open to us for the sale of these articles. We have unlimited opportunities for engaging in the business of manufacturing charcoal iron. We have the ore, we have the forests to convert into charcoal, and the Americans are nearly destitute of that necessary article in their business, and the producing of charcoal iron might, and would speedily be transferred to Canada if the restrictions upon trade between the two countries were removed. We have great advantages for engaging in the business of fish canning. We might do almost all that business for the continent. We could supply 65,000,000 of people with canned fish and productions of our fisheries. I do not need to dwell upon the various means of manufacturing for which this country is peculiarly adapted. I repeat that wherever there was found a line of manufacturing for which Canada was adapted, a great expansion in that particular business would speedily follow the adoption of reciprocity with the United States. Now, a dread seems to possess some of our friends that it would be in the highest degree dangerous to come into competition with the manufacturing establishments and with the great aggregations of wealth in the older manufacturing States like Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York and Pennsylvania. It is apprehended that great danger would lie in the fact that while our own establishments are comparatively weak, while we have no great aggregations of capital such as exist in those States, we would be brought into competition with enormous establishments, with millions upon millions of capital, with unlimited resources and with perfected processes. Well, there may be something in this. At first sight it would seem, Mr. Speaker, that this was a serious objection and it occurred to me that some light might be thrown upon this matter by looking into the statistics of the progress of manufacturing in the newer States of the American Union, States similarly situated with Ontario and our Provinces. Well, I investigated the manufacturing returns of Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, Illinois, Iowa, Minnesota and California, and I expected to find in those new States, the most of which have only been settled recently, that the comparison between them, and the older States would be unfavorable to the newer States, and I was surprised to find that such was not the case. Now, the increase of the productions of manufactures in the Dominion from 1871 to 1881 was 83 millions, equal to an increase of 40 per cent. The following table shows the increase between those dates, in Ontario and several States of the Union, with the percentage :

Mr. CHARLTON.

| Pennsylvania :—1870 | | $711,894,000 | |
| 1880 | | 744,818,000 | |
| Increase | | 32,984,000 | = 4½ per cent. |

So, Sir, we find that in the eight States I have mentioned, in the period between 1870 and 1880, the increase in the manufactured products was $561,000,000, or an average of 62 per cent., against the increase in the Dominion of 40 per cent., and an increase in Ontario of 38 per cent. Then, taking the old manufacturing States which produce more than one-half the goods produced in the whole Union, the States of Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania, I find that the increase during the same period was $515,000,000, or about $50,000,000 less than in the eight new States I have mentioned, and that the ratio of increase was 21·6 per cent., against 64 per cent. in the new States. This is a striking result, and it demonstrates that the ratio of increase in manufacturing is more than as rapid again in those new States, and the newer they are the more rapid the increase; the most rapid increase was in Minnesota, 228 per cent., the increase in Illinois was over 100 per cent., and in California over 74 per cent. Now, Sir, is there anything in the condition of Ontario, or in the condition of this Dominion, that exposes us to a more relentless competition with those old manufacturing centres than those new States were exposed to? Are we not as capable of making progress as these western States in the establishment, development and growth of manufacture? I hold that we are, and when I examined the statistics with regard to the growth and development of manufactures in the cities of the west, I was again struck with the wonderful result I discovered. The following table shows the value of manufactured productions, in 1880, in the principal cities of the west:

|----------------------------------|---------------|
| Buffalo manufactures, 1880 | $ 42,937,000 |
| Detroit do | 30,181,000 |
| Cincinnati do | 105,259,000 |

Statistics show that the ratio of increase is many times more rapid in these cities of the west than it is in the older cities of the east. In view of these facts, I think that we are needlessly alarmed, that there is no ground for the alarm that exists in the minds of some men, that the manufacturers of the Dominion are not capable of competing with those old manufacturing centres in the eastern States. The results in the western States give the lie to such an assertion. We may disabuse our minds of any fears as to our abilities to compete with those centres and to successfully maintain and sustain our manufacturing interests. The fact of it is, Mr. Speaker, that our manufacturers, as well as our lumbermen, our farmers, our fishermen and mine owners, need the blessings of continental free trade. They need a wider market. They are confined here to a market of 5,000,000 of people. They need the adoption of a policy that will break down the barriers and open to their access 60,000,000 of customers more, and there can be no doubt that they would derive vast advantages from the removal of those restrictions. So much, Sir, for the question as regards the benefits that are to be realised by this country from unrestricted free trade. As I said at the commencement, this is a question which requires candid treatment, it is a question which requires fair treatment. It would be dishonest, it would be criminal on the part of any public man discussing this question, to seek to delude or mislead the people of this country. They have a right to demand of every patriotic citizen that he shall, at least, state what he believes to be true; and in discussing this question, Mr. Speaker, I would scorn to adopt a policy that was calculated to deceive my countrymen, for the purpose of securing a transient political advantage. Now, I propose, Sir, to examine candidly all the objections, so far as I am aware, that are urged against this proposal of unrestricted reciprocity. First of all, it is urged that it is disloyal. Well, Sir, to whom is it disloyal? It may be disloyal to Manchester, it may be disloyal to Birmingham, but is it disloyal to Canada? That is the question that concerns us. We are not charged with the guardianship of the interests of Manchester, of Birmingham, of England; we are charged with the guardianship of the interests of Canada. If we do not guard those interests expressly given to us they will not be guarded. Time and again our interests have been given away to advance Imperial interests, and it is our business to guard our own interests; and if this policy is loyalty to Canada, if it is calculated to promote the interests of Canada, that is as far as I care to enquire with respect to the question of loyalty. Now there are 4,750,000 people in Canada. What are they? They are British subjects, and they are just as much entitled to consideration as 4,750,000 British subjects in England. How many British subjects in England are there who can possibly be affected by this proposed change? We imported from England last year $4,496,000 worth of goods. Suppose they were all the products of manufactures, suppose they were all the productions of the skilled labor of England, how many men would it take to produce that amount of goods? I stated, in reading over the development of manufactures in the western States, that in 1880 Milwaukee produced $4,500,000 worth of goods; within a fraction of the entire amount we import from England. How many inhabitants had that city? It had 115,000; and I venture to say that not one-third were engaged in manufacturing. How many people does it take to produce the $44,000,000 worth of goods we import from England? In 1880, according to the returns, the production in the United States was $1,950 per head for each man, woman and child engaged as factory operatives in that country. Upon this basis the production of that amount of goods means the employment of 25,000 operatives, it means that at the very outside 75,000 people in England are dependent upon the production of the goods that have been exported to Canada and sold in this country. And we are asked to do what? We are asked to place in one scale the interests of 75,000 people in England and in the other scale the interests of 4,750,000 people in Canada, and to decide that the claims of the 75,000 people shall out-weigh the claims of the 4,750,000. That is the kind of loyalty in this connection. I do not care for that kind of loyalty. I am engaged in looking after the interests of my constituents, and I care a great deal more for them than for nabobs in Manchester. What do you suppose is the amount of profits derived from this business in England? It may be $4,000,000 or $5,000,000, or even a little more. How much British capital is invested in Canada? I am told there is $560,000,000 invested. Now, the interests of those men who have made investments in Canada are intimately connected with the prosperity of this country, and even admitting that we were to sacrifice the interests of those people engaged in manufactures, would we not be benefited? How much money is there invested in England to produce the goods sent to Canada. The investment, at the outside, of $30,000,000 will produce that amount of $44,000,000 worth of goods. The ratio in the United States was $2,790 of capital to $5,363 of products, nearly two of products to one of capital; and it is a liberal estimate to say that $30,000,000 of capital invested in England is all that is invested to produce the goods sent to Canada. Place in one scale the men having $30,000,000 of capital engaged in producing goods sent to this country, and place in the other scale the interests of English investors in this country to the extent of $560,000,000, besides the interests of all the people of this Dominion, and we are asked to say that we will consider the interests of the owners of $30,000,000 of capital invested in manufactures paramount to the interests of the other class who have invested $560,000,000 here, besides the capital of the people of this country. That is not the kind of loyalty I intend to stand by or advocate. It is assumed upon this hypothesis on which I have been dealing with this question, that unrestricted reciprocity would abolish imports from England. It will do nothing of the kind. It may temporarily check those imports, but the increased prosperity which will be sure to be given to this country will lead to increased trade. It has ever been so and ever will be so, and the result will be that in a very few years, instead of abolishing English trade, there will be a large increase of English imports into Canada. I can remember the time, Mr. Speaker, when hon. gentlemen opposite were not so superloyal. I can remember when we were discussing the National Policy, and when it was urged that that policy was a disloyal one as regards England, that it threatened British connection, those hon. gentlemen said: "So much the worse for British connection." I rather suspect the motive which prompts hon. gentlemen opposite on this occasion to make such a leading cry of this cry of loyalty. There is another feature of this case to which I might be permitted to allude most briefly in connection with the charge of disloyalty. I believe it is a matter of interest to the whole Anglo-Saxon race, to every English-speaking man, whether he may be in America, or the United Kingdom, or Australia, or New Zealand, or the Cape of Good Hope, or Hindostan, or wherever he may be on the face of this broad earth, for they are scattered over the whole face of it,—I believe it is the interest of every English-speaking man that cordial relations should exist, that friendly relations should exist between the two great branches of the Anglo-Saxon family. I believe that any policy that will draw closer the bonds that connect the United States and England, that will increase the cordiality existing between those two great powers, that will have a tendency to bring those two powers to act in concert and in alliance, is a policy that should receive the commendation and the support of every man, not only in Canada, but in every English-speaking country in the world. I do not need to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that no question is likely to arise—no question for many years, except the Alabama question, has arisen between England and the United States, threatening to dis-ruver the amicable relations between those two countries—that has not had some connection with Canada. The Fisheries dispute—we cannot say it ceases to exist—which so lately was an ominous question, threatening the relations between those two countries, was purely a Canadian one; and if we adopt any policy that brings Canada and the United States into closer commercial relations and removes the danger of friction between this country and the United States, we adopt a policy that is likely to lead to that result which we consider so desirable, the drawing closer together of these two great branches of the master race, I believe that a powerful argument in favor of unrestricted reciprocity can be founded upon that view of the case. I believe we would be justified in entering into negotiations and seeking to draw these two peoples closer together, closer in commercial and closer in social intercourse, if no other consideration had weight in the premises. So much for the disloyalty objection. Now, the next objection urged to this proposed arrangement is that it would lead to annexation. Lead to annexation!

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. CHARLTON. I hear somebody say, "hear, hear." What does that objection admit—what does it tacitly, inferentially admit? It admits that it would be such a splendid thing we would want more of it, that it would work so well we would not be satisfied with a half measure but would go the entire distance.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CHARLTON. I say that it admits that it would be a good thing. Perhaps it would; but it would not be a good thing to the extent of bringing about annexation. It would have a direct tendency, on the contrary, to prevent annexation.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CHARLTON. I repeat it—it would have a direct tendency to prevent annexation. I remember when I was a boy that the annexation sentiment in this country was rampant. I remember a manifesto issued in 1849 signed by hundreds of prominent Conservatives in this Dominion, and it put the arguments in favor of annexation with great power and force. I know, Sir, that annexation was debated and discussed and that the great mass of the people in that section of the country in which I live believed in annexation. I attended as a member, a little Lyceum Debating Society in the village of Ayr, in the present county of Waterloo, and we had a question of the advisability of annexation debated there, and I was surprised to see that nine-tenths of the people present were ardent annexationists. What was the cause of it? Was it because they considered the political institutions of the United States superior to those of Canada? No, Sir, I think not. It was because they desired freer commercial relations with the United States and that they saw in annexation the only mode of obtaining it.

Mr. BOWELL. It had nothing whatever to do with it.

Mr. CHARLTON. It had everything to do with it, and I will show you how it had to do with it. In 1854, when we got freer commercial relations with the States, annexation died out. We never heard of it then. It was not a desire for annexation on political grounds, but the sentiment was created by the desire to obtain free commercial intercourse with the United States, and by that desire alone. Now, Sir, we have an annexation sentiment to day, and it is growing in this country, and it is growing because of the mismanagement, the recklessness, and the extravagance, and the corruption of the party in power. If there is any one thing that actuates the public mind and that has a tendency to spread this annexation sentiment in Canada, it is the desire that is felt by the farmers, and lumbermen, and other producing classes of this country to obtain free trade with the United States. It is that, Sir. It is not because they do not believe that our political institutions in Canada, if honestly managed, are not as good as those of the United States, for, Sir, nine out of every ten of the people of Canada believe our institutions are better, as they have a right to believe. It is the desire for unrestricted commercial relations that promotes the sentiment in favor of annexation. Now, Sir, you secure an arrangement by which we can obtain unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, and if you do not find as a result of that arrangement that agitation for annexation dies out completely, you may take me to the block and take off my head. This would be the inevitable result of such a policy, and it is the way to put an end to the annexation agitation altogether in this country if we can have through a commercial treaty all the material advantages that can result from annexation. So much for that objection. Then there is another objection made, and so far as I have heard it made, it is made by Conservatives, and it is this: it is that it would be a bad thing, because it would prevent our getting good terms for annexation in the future when we want it as we otherwise could. Well, Mr. Speaker, all I have to say to that is, that it may be an objection that will have weight with some friends on the opposite side. We are not looking for terms of that kind and the objection has no weight with us. Then, Sir, another objection urged is: "Well, we cannot get it and there is no use talking about it, and besides it would not be dignified to ask for it." That is what our friend from Huron (Mr. Porter) said the other night. He said that our abject whining and cringing must be disgusting to the Americans, as they had refused overtures for free trade. Sir, it is not abject whining, it is not cringing to come openly and boldly like a candid, truthful man and say to another: "I believe that we can make an arrangement mutually advantageous, and I approach you with a proposition for an arrangement which I believe will be advantageous to both of us." What do those gentlemen want? What would they ask? Would they ask that 60,000,000 in the United States should come to 5,000,000 in Canada, because it would not be dignified for 5,000,000 to go to 60,000,000. They must indeed have an extraordinary sense of their dignity when this would stand in their way. I do not see anything undignified or improper in either one of those peoples making proposals to the other. If we contemplate any arrangements which we, on this side, conceive could be effected to our advantage, it is neither undignified nor improper, on the contrary, it is in the highest degree dignified, to make approaches to our neighbors and lay before them what we believe to be the reasons that ought to actuate and influence us in entering into an arrangement for our mutual advantage and benefit. But, Sir, whether we can get it or not there is one thing we can do, and that is we can try. This word "can't" is a word that is not made use of very much by energetic business men. The way to ascertain as to whether you can do a thing or not is not to say "I can't do it, and I won't try to do it." The way to do it is to go like men and to try and do it, and see what the chances are. If you fail to accomplish it you cannot accuse yourself for having been false to your own interests, and for not having made the attempt. But, Sir, there is another reason which will not warrant any man who is acquainted with the chances of success in saying or admitting that we cannot do it. We are warranted in believing that the Americans are ready to make a fair and equitable arrangement. We have, in fact, official assurance from the State Department of the United States that such is the case. We have assurances from public men of that country that such is the case. We are, in point of fact, invited to make our proposition, and we are decidedly assured that this proposition, if reasonable, will be favorably entertained. Then, the next objection made is, that we cannot make a treaty on advantageous terms. Well, Mr. Speaker, we never need make a treaty that we do not consent to, and we never need consent to a treaty that is not satisfactory; and we never can tell whether we can make a satisfactory treaty or not until we have made the trial. Then, the next objection is a very important objection. It is, that this arrangement will not yield us enough revenue. Now, Sir, I do not know whether I had better examine into this question on the basis of both a proposal for unrestricted reciprocity and on the theoretical basis also of commercial union, or not, for as a theoretical disquisition it might be interesting to take up the question on the basis of commercial union. However, Sir, I will proceed to show what would be the probable outcome if we made the arrangement contemplated by the resolution now before the House—unrestricted reciprocity. It would be admitted, I presume, that we would sacrifice the duties upon American importations, amounting last year in round numbers to $7,300,000, the total revenue from excise and customs last year being $28,687,000; deduct from this the collection of duties on imports from the United States and it leaves a balance of $21,388,000, which would be the revenue with the loss of the American duties. Now, Sir, in 1880 our revenue from customs and excise was $18,479,000. On this basis I have named, admitting the loss of $7,300,000, we would still have a revenue of $2,902,000 more than we had in 1880. Our revenue in 1881 was $23,942,000, and upon the basis I have mentioned our revenue would be $2,545,000 short of the amount of revenue collected in 1881. Now, Sir, the revenue in 1881 was $2,000,000 higher than the revenue in 1878, and the expenditure in 1881 was actually greater than this country was warranted in making or is warranted in making to-day. The question, Sir, is, can we under this arrangement go back to the scale of expenditure that existed in 1881? If we can do that, Sir, if we admit that we lose from our revenue $7,300,000, and if we admit it is not possible to readjust our tariff, and that it is not possible to supplement that loss by increased revenue from other sources which undoubtedly it is possible to do, if we admit that for the sake of argument, we are still warranted in saying that it is possible to go back to the expenditure of 1881 and that we would have revenue enough without any change in our tariff even with unrestricted reciprocity. Now, would it be possible for us to effect retrenchments? We who have run up our expenditure from $13,486,000 in 1868 to $36,000,000 in 1887; we who have increased our expenditure four times as fast every year as the population has increased, is it possible to retrench in this country? Well, Sir, if it is not possible to retrench, it is not possible to avert ruin; if it is not possible to retrench, the country has got to go to the dogs; if it is not possible to retrench in this country, we may as well give up the case—the whole case. Now, I hold that it is possible. I will tell you where you might effect some retrenchment. You might abolish that sum of all political villainies, the Franchise Act, and you would save $400,000 at one stroke, and you would also save your character, and your consciences would be clearer. You might get along with a little less expenditure on public works and buildings. I believe that in the United States, with all its wealth, there are about 60 cities only where they have public post offices. They only give post offices to large commercial cities such as New York and Buffalo.

Mr. FOSTER. How much do they take to build one post office?

Mr. CHARLTON. It does not matter. They have a good deal of money, and they have to build larger ones, because they do not build any in small towns. They do not go into the business of building little $6,000 post offices as bribes to the people; they have not got as low in the scale of humanity as that. Well, we might save very largely in the expenditure on public works and buildings; we might cut it all off, the whole thing, lock, stock and barrel. We could save by abolishing the vicious system of superannuation.

Mr. BOWELL. How much?

Mr. CHARLTON. It amounts to between $200,000 and $300,000 now. We could save on railway subsidies, and avoid the enactment of such little scenes as occurred in No. 8 a few years ago. We could save by putting an end to that system of bribery which character in giving grants to useless railway lines of $3,200 a mile. We could cut off the whole thing with advantage to our treasury, advantage to our morals, advantage to our charter, and advantage to our hopes in the future, not only in this world, but in the world to come. We have been spending millions of dollars for the purpose of carrying immigrants to the United States through this country, and we could cut off the whole of that appropriation with advantage to the public.

Mr. LISTER. What would the newspapers do without that?

Mr. CHARLTON. That is a question I cannot answer; I am afraid some of them would rat. Then, Sir, we could reduce somewhat, I think, the cost of the civil service. We have a great many incumbents in the service of this country who are most valuable officers, who, in fact, are underpaid, and we have a great many whose services are not worth a shilling a year—a great many useless appendages; and I venture to say that a business man could take charge of the departments of the civil service of this country, administer them on business principles, increase their efficiency 20 per cent., and reduce their cost 65 per cent. Then, if we had amicable relation with our neighbors, we could reduce the cost of the militia system by $1,000,000 a year, and what we might spend beyond that would be mostly wasted. We could reduce the cost of legislation. If it became necessary to revise our system, I think we could do with one member to represent 40,000 instead of 20,000; we could get along with half the number of members in this House; and as for the Senate, we might get along with any number you could name from half-a-dozen to sixteen, as it is only a little junta of very little use. We could get along with a reduction of the mail subsidies, and then my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who has been fishing these nine years without any bait on his hook for reciprocity —

Mr. CHARLTON.

Mr. FOSTER. I have a good bait.

Mr. CHARLTON. Not bait enough to get a nibble. He caught a gudgeon at Washington, and it was the only thing he got. Yes, it is possible to reduce our expenses by the entire loss we sustain from the American duties. We could reduce our expenses $7,000,000 a year, with advantage to ourselves, advantage to our morals, and advantage to the taxpayer, and have a better Government than we have today. We could do it by cutting off the means of corruption which the Government enjoys and so lavishly uses in the management of this country at present. And then you must bear in mind that whatever policy increases the prosperity of this country will increase the tax-paying resources of the people. Whatever policy increases the wealth and population of this country will inevitably increase the imports; the man who has an ample income will consume more goods than a man who is straitened in his circumstances; and if we can make the great producing classes of this country prosperous, and at the same time vastly increase their numbers, we need have no fears of the revenue more than perhaps a temporary derangement of one or two years while we are getting ready to cut down our expenses. As I said before, I estimate the saving to the producing classes of this country in the mere matter of duty at $15,000,000 a year. I also estimate that a vast amount is lost in the duties we have to pay on the goods we export to the United States; and a further sum is lost in placing an extinguisher on the growth of the population in this country. Suppose it was necessary to resort to direct taxation, the necessity of which I deny; but suppose for argument that it should be necessary, here is a policy by which we propose to save to the people of this country directly $15,000,000, and indirectly as much more. The question is, can the people of Canada afford to give three or four dollars for thirty dollars? Can they afford for the sake of gaining advantages amounting to from $15,000,000 to $30,000,000 a year, to submit to a direct taxation of $2,000,000 or $3,000,000 a year temporarily? I should say that if the necessity existed, the people would cheerfully submit to the imposition; but the necessity does not exist. It would be, in short, a godsend to the country if we were compelled to retrench—to lop off many of these expenses which are neither for the good, nor the honor nor the prosperity of the people of the Dominion.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 15) to incorporate the Nisbet Academy of Prince Albert.—(Mr. Macdowall.)

Bill (No. 37) respecting the Lake Nipissing and James' Bay Railway Company.—(Mr. Cockburn.)

KINCARDINE HARBOR TOLLS

Mr. ROWAND moved second reading of Bill (No. 30) to authorize the town of Kincardine, in the county of Bruce, to impose and collect certain tolls at the harbour in the said town.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Will the hon. gentleman give some explanation of the purport of this Bill?

Mr. ROWAND. I understand the object to be to renew the power of the town of Kincardine to impose certain tolls.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

RECIPROCITY WITH THE UNITED STATES.

Debate on the motion of Sir Richard Cartwright and the proposed amendment of Mr. Foster, resumed.

Mr. CHARLTON. I must apologise for the length of time I have occupied in discussing the resolution before the House. My excuse is that it is a large question, and I do not know that I could have shortened the time very much without failing to deal with some of the questions which I thought were essential to the discussion. I hope the House will not judge me to have been guilty of wasting its time, and I shall not trespass very much longer upon its patience in connection with this discussion. When you left the Chair at six o'clock, I was engaged in discussing the question whether the adoption of unrestricted reciprocity would leave Canada in a position where a sufficient amount of revenue could be secured to meet our actual necessities and wants, and I was endeavoring to point out the absolute necessity that rests upon this country, entirely apart from all considerations in connection with unrestricted reciprocity, to curtail its expenditure and diminish its expenses. I had pointed out during the afternoon the fact that we are in many respects competitors with the United States. We, as well as that country, offer homes for immigrants; we, as well as that country, expect to promote our growth by attracting to our shores people from the continent of Europe, and, in order to enter upon this race with any prospects of success, it is necessary that we should not be handicapped by expenses of administration and burdens of debt greatly in excess of those resting upon the shoulders of the people of the United States; and for this reason I now repeat what I said before that it is in the highest degree essential to the prosperity of Canada that we should retrench our expenses. I find, after deducting from the taxation of the United States the amount applied by them to the extinguishment of their public debt, that our duties of customs and excise exceeded those of the United States last year by $2.15 per head. We raised $6.03 per head, and the United States $3.88 per head, aside from the amount which they applied to extinguishing the public debt. We must bear in mind also that the United States are called upon to provide for certain expenses from which we are free. They have their diplomatic and consular expenses to provide for as a nation, and the only thing in this line for which we have to provide is the cost of the High Commissioner in London. Then they have to provide for an army and a navy. Last year, they expended on their pension list $75,029,000; upon the army, $34,561,000; and upon the navy, $15,141,000. Our expenses on similar items were, $102,000 for pensions, $1,974,000 for the militia and mounted police, and $205,000 for ocean and river service, making a total of $4,281,000 as against $123,721,000 in the United States. To have made our expenditure on these services equal to theirs in proportion to population, we should have expended $9,419,000 more than we did, and yet our taxation from customs and excise is $2.15 per capita more than theirs. Whatever light we look upon this question in, we must be impressed with the necessity which rests upon this country, if it desires to avoid going to ruin, to bring down its expenses somewhere in the region of those of the United States, ever bearing in mind that that great country is our competitor and will continue to be our competitor, that we lie side by side with it, and that, if we are to secure immigration and to people our great wastes, we must offer inducements to the population of the old world nearly, if not quite, equal to those which are offered by the United States. In considering the objections that are raised to unrestricted reciprocity, I shall next refer to the seventh objection, which is the assertion that is made, that it will ruin our manufactures. I will refer to this briefly, because I have already referred to it in discussing the question whether our manufactures are likely to be able to compete with those of the United States, if trade restrictions are removed. I have pointed out my belief, and I think with reason, that our manufactures are able to compete with theirs, but even if they were not, I say the country would not be warranted in foregoing the advantages which would be derived from unrestricted reciprocity in order to promote the interests of so small a fraction of the people of this Dominion as those engaged in manufactures. Even if the manufacturing industries of Canada would be obliterated by the removal of these restrictions, which is not the case, still the great mass of the people of Canada would be benefited, and we would be acting in conformity with the principle that we should adopt the course which will do the greatest good to the greatest number. The next objection made is that this would injure our shipping interest. I deny emphatically that unrestricted reciprocity would have any such effect. Those familiar with the shipping on the great lakes are aware that Canadian shipping on those lakes is not worth within 30 or 40 per cent. as much as American shipping, because Canadian vessels are debarred from the most profitable trade on these lakes, which is the coasting trade. A Canadian vessel cannot clear from Chicago for Buffalo, or from Chicago for any other American port on the lakes, and is debarred from transporting ore, which amounts to a trade of several millions of dollars per annum, from Lake Superior to the lower ports. In fact, Canadian boats are debarred from the most lucrative trade on the lakes; and, if we had reciprocity, it would open to them a business from which they are entirely precluded now. On the sea coast it is the same thing. The most profitable trade is the coasting trade, from which we are now entirely excluded, and in that matter we would derive enormous advantages from the adoption of reciprocity. The next objection is one which was raised by my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior, and it is an objection which has had great weight with some portion of the mercantile classes in the large cities. That is, that the adoption of unrestricted reciprocity would injure the wholesale trade in this country, that it would put an end to the distribution of supplies to the retail dealers scattered throughout the country by leaving them free to make their purchases in the great marts of the United States. I do not know, but I apprehend that this objection, like most of the others, would be found to be nearly if not entirely groundless. I am not able to say definitely and with certainty what the effect might be on the wholesale trade, but I wish to point out the result in this regard in the American markets themselves. If the result were to be in Canada to compel or to lead all retail dealers to buy in New York, that ought to be the result now in the United States, where no trade restrictions exist. But that is not the result in the United States. The cities of Buffalo, Cleveland, Cincinnati, Detroit, Chicago, Milwaukee, St. Paul, Omaha, San Francisco, St. Louis, Nashville, New Orleans—

all these natural centres seem to supply almost exclusively the country adjacent to them with the goods it requires. Scarcely a retail merchant in a thousand goes east to New York from the west of Chicago to buy goods, and it is found to their convenience, and to their advantage, to go to a wholesale market quite near to them rather than go to a distant one. The character of the trade now is to buy frequently, to sort up, as merchants term it, to buy in small quantities, and keep their stocks complete. In doing this it is not to their advantage to go to a distant and expensive market. The course of trade leads them to buy either of travellers or to send in their orders themselves, and the result in the United States is, that the wholesale trade of that country is distributed among the various commercial centres scattered over that country, and these commercial centres supply almost exclusively the retail trade of the country adjacent. Well, if the same rule would hold good in Canada in the case of unrestricted reciprocity, trade would not be removed from the actual commercial centres where it is now. The trade of New York and the trade of Chicago, to a considerable extent, consists in the supply of jobbing houses, jobbing sales, sales to large wholesale mercantile establishments in the interior, and a great number of these extensive New York houses would not care to be troubled with the small business of a great number of small retail houses; they would rather sell to jobbers direct than to supply these houses. And I think for these reasons that the fears entertained by the wholesale trade in Canada that the business would centre in New York, are entirely groundless. The next objection made is this: Well, we are quite prepared to take reciprocity, we are anxious to get it, we have been ready at all times, and we are ready now, to have reciprocity in natural products. Well, Mr. Speaker, I can say truthfully that we also are ready for that. If it were possible to secure reciprocity in natural products, I would be in favor not only of having a standing offer to that effect on our Statute-book, but I would be in favor of publishing that offer in every city of the United States, of putting it upon every door post; I would be in favor of making that offer known by placing a circular before every voter in the United States, if we could secure reciprocity upon the terms upon which the hon. gentlemen are willing to take reciprocity. But we cannot get it, it is futile and useless to talk about it, and when they say: Oh, we are willing to take reciprocity on such and such terms, it is equivalent to saying: We will not have reciprocity and do not want it—because they only propose to take it on such terms as they know they cannot get it. What is the arrangement these gentlemen would be glad to make? The arrangement they would like to make would be an arrangement that could not be called an equitable one as far as the United States are concerned. The reciprocity treaty which was in existence from 1854 to 1865 was almost exclusively to the advantage of Canada. We sold to the United States everything that we could desire to sell to them, but they could sell to us nothing that they had to give us in exchange for the produce we sold to them. They were called upon to pay us in gold for the production of our farms, our forests, our mines and fisheries. Now, they said, that is not a fair system of trade. If we are to buy the products of your labor, we want to have the privilege of giving you in exchange the products of our labor. It is reasonable that they should have that privilege, and it is for that reason we cannot get a renewal of that treaty. It is for that reason we must admit the products of their labor into this country, in return for the privilege we ask of them to have the products of our labor admitted into theirs. Now, the last objection I shall refer to to-night is, that we can get something better. We do not need to look for this at all, it is said; it is all useless to talk of reciprocity when we can easily secure an arrangement that will be infinitely better to Canada. What is it? Why, we can secure Imperial Federation, and that will be infinitely better, it is asserted, for the interests of this Dominion than unrestricted reciprocity with the United States. Well, Sir, what is implied by Imperial Federation? What do the advocates of that scheme in Canada propose to secure? Why, they propose to secure, on the part of Great Britain, the imposition of differential duties in favor of the colonies, they propose that England shall impose duties upon raw materials, upon food, upon lumber, upon wool, and upon all the raw materials that are imported into that country from all nations except the colonies. Well, does any sane man suppose that England is going to return to the corn law system? Does any man suppose that England will impose duties upon any raw material whatever for the benefit of her colonies? I think it is preposterous to suppose it. I do not think any party in England would venture to make such a proposition, and the scheme of Imperial Federation is not only not within the range of probability, but it is not within the range of possibility, as understood by the advocates of the scheme who propose it as an arrangement preferable to securing unrestricted reciprocity with the United States. Now, Sir, I am through with dealing with the objections raised to the consummation of this scheme. I think that I have met these objections fairly, that I have stated them to the House without withholding any argument that can be raised against the scheme. I have striven to deal with this question in the spirit of fairness. I believe that it is in the interest of the party to advocate this matter and deal with it in that spirit. I believe that the case is so strong that we have but to state the arguments, have but to state fairly the advantages that would flow from the scheme, have but to meet fairly the objections that are raised, and to state reasons why they do not lie, in order to convince any candid and unprejudiced mind that what this country needs, that what will conduce to the prosperity of this country above all things else, is the very thing that the motion of the hon. member for South Oxford declares would be beneficial to Canada. Now, Sir, when this debate commenced, I confess I had my doubts whether this issue would be placed fairly before the people of this country. I was afraid there might be something kept back in connection with these fishery negotiations. I felt that it might be possible that the eminent gentleman who occupies the position of Finance Minister, and who was also one of the British Commissioners at Washington, might spring upon us during this debate, some document which would give color to the claim that he had actually attempted to get reciprocity in the natural products, and that we might be placed in a position where it would be difficult to combat a cunningly framed argument of this kind. But, Sir, fortunately for the party on this side, fortunately, perhaps, for the party on the other side, fortunately for the country, certainly, the issue is a distinctly defined and sharply cut issue. When the Government amendment was placed in your hands last night there was no longer any doubt as to the character of the issue. It is a clearly defined issue between Unrestricted Reciprocity and the National Policy of this country, nothing more and nothing less. That resolution says:

"Canada, in the future as in the past, is desirous of cultivating and extending trade relations with the United States, in so far as they may not conflict with the policy of fostering the various interests and industries of the Dominion, which was adopted in 1879, and has since received, in so marked a manner, the sanction and approval of its people."

In other words, The Government of this country is in favor of obtaining reciprocity upon unobtainable terms, and upon unobtainable terms only; they do not wish to obtain reciprocity on any other terms, except such terms as they know are not acceptable. That is the analysis of the position of the Government with regard to this question. They are not in favor of reciprocity upon any conditions on which reciprocity can be obtained. They consider the National Policy, that gigantic failure which has produced great national disaster, is preferable to unrestricted reciprocity, and they prefer to go on increasing our debt, piling up taxation, sending thousands and hundreds of thousands of our citizens from our country, and doing without the blessings of continental free trade—they prefer to pursue this line and continue the National Policy rather than to impair any portion of that policy by seeking continental free trade. That is the issue. I am glad the issue is so squarely defined. I may say for myself, and I think, for the party on this side of the House, that we shall be glad to meet the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House upon this issue. The country cannot misunderstand it. The issue is clearly defined. Men may take a position honestly on either one side or the other, and no doubt hon. gentlemen opposite have honest convictions on that side of the question, as we certainly have on the other. We will put the issue before that great jury, the people, and will leave it to that jury to settle the question which so intimately affects their own well-being and prosperity.

An hon. MEMBER. You may change your mind before another election.

Mr. CHARLTON. The House will no doubt be glad to hear that I am about to conclude my remarks, and I must thank the House for the very great courtesy to which hon. members have listened to me. I have to promise the House, moreover, that the occasions will be very rare when I shall trespass on its patience so far as I have done on this occasion. I am happy to say, in conclusion, that I believe this country has great resources. I believe this country is destined by Providence to have a grand future, and that consummation can only be thwarted by its own folly and mismanagement. But I believe our autonomy cannot be preserved if we go on in the way we have been going. I believe that to persevere in the course we have been pursuing for some years past, to follow that course for a very few years more, would entail irretrievable ruin upon the Dominion. I believe our path is beset with difficulties, and I am sorry to say that the greater number of those difficulties are of our own creating. We have created them, we must bear the consequences of having created them, and we can only remove them by energetic methods, only by subjecting ourselves to the very unpleasant experience of retrenchment, of economy, of dismissal of officers, and of reducing the expenses of Government. It was said by Artemus Ward that Brigham Young was a very much married man. We are a very much officered nation. We have in every department of the Government at least two officers where we require one; it is the case in the civil service, it is the case in this House. We have Custom house officers, Excise officers, weights and measures officers, you can scarcely count the number of officers in the pay of the Government, and one-half of them are useless officers. As I said before recess, a business man or business men organising this Government on business principles could carry on the public business with greater efficiency at very much less cost than is now incurred. We have, in addition to maintaining that great number of officers, got into the habit of adopting very corrupt methods.

Mr. HESSON. Hear, hear—on that side.

Mr. CHARLTON. That is the innocent side. I was down the other day in the County of Prince Edward. I found there a gentleman, late a member of this House, now thank Heaven a member of this House, who had been unseated for what? Because an indiscreet friend had paid a drunken loafer, who voted against the Reform candidate, on the night subsequent to the election a dollar to get rid of his importunities.

Mr. BOWELL. That was only one charge.

Mr. CHARLTON. That was the most serious case and all the other charges were withdrawn, he was unseated on that charge. Now, what did I find going on in that county? The Dominion Government were dangling promises in the shape of bribes to the extent of thousands of dollars before the electors. I found the inhabitants of Pictou were promised a new post office, and a gentleman who was in the way of the regularly nominated candidate had, as I understood, and it can be denied if it is not true, been promised that he would receive a good snug sum for the site for the post office if he retired from the contest. I see it is not denied.

Mr. BOWELL. Does the hon. gentleman mean to assert that the Government made the promise?

Mr. CHARLTON. The Government I understand sent an emissary, and I understood he had made the promise?

Mr. BOWELL. There is not one word of truth in it.

Mr. CHARLTON. Then I should like to know what means were used to retire Mr. McCuaig. There were some means used.

Mr. BOWELL. I am not in his secrets, so I cannot tell you.

Mr. CHARLTON. I found in addition to the post office promised to Pictou that the people were to have the harbor channel deepened.

Mr. BOWELL. No.

Mr. CHARLTON. And a bridge was to be built from Prince Edward across Quinté, and an extensive marsh was to be drained and a channel was to be dredged out—all these things were to be done if the people of Prince Edward County would return a supporter of the Government. Those were the influences used there. They were told that they could not have one cent if they did not return a supporter of the Government, that they could not have a new post office, the harbor deepened, the marsh dredged or the bridge built. These methods I condemn. They are having a most ruinous and demoralising effect on the voters of the country. The Government are increasing expenses uselessly, and it is time the people turned out of office men who resorted to those methods, and many worse, at the expense of the taxpayers.

Mr. HESSON. Explain the Glengarry case.

Mr. CHARLTON. When the courts give their decision the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Hesson) will be enlightened on that matter.

Mr. BOWELL. Then you will tell us it is the case of a drunken loafer.

An hon. MEMBER. He was spending his own money anyway.

Mr. CHARLTON. In addition to those methods pursued by the Government in elections we have the costly mistakes that the Government have made. No less than $42,000,000 were expended on the Intercolonial, and the Government has since been engaged in spending more millions to destroy that property by building the Short Line. Then there was the expenditure on the Canadian Pacific Railway; and there are whispers now and hints that that portion of the road from Sudbury Junction to Port Arthur is to be abandoned. It might as well be abandoned, but we have expended tens of millions of dollars on its construction. Of our total debt of $219,000,000 no less than $80,000,000 were thrown away on the different mistakes made by the Government. We have this wildly extravagant expenditure, this mountain of debt, this terrible drain of the exodus, and we stand to-day a young nation in shackles, in fetters, borne down by this mountain weight placed on its energies and progress, it is time the incubus was removed. The hour is not yet too late, but the hour may speedily come when it may be too late, and to remove this incubus requires courage and requires determination. The evils that confront us are of the gravest character. We cannot remove them merely by willing that it should be done, but we must make an effort and it must be a great effort too, and we must write upon our doors the saying, wise and old, "Be bold, be bold and everywhere be hold." Be not too bold, but better the excess than the deficiency, better the more than the less, better

"Like Hector on the field to lie
Than like perfumed Paris turn to fly."

Yes, and the resolution, Mr. Speaker, which has been placed in your hands by my hon. friend to my right (Sir Richard Cartwright) points the way to extricate this country from these difficulties, and the admission of Canada to participation in the commercial and business advantages arising from unrestricted reciprocity would mark the commencement of a new era, a new epoch in our history. Combined with retrenchment, Sir, and economy and the management of public affairs it will stay the tide of humanity now ebbing from our shores; it would bring back again most of those who have left us, it would bring in capital, it would necessitate enterprise, and it would make of this country that great nation which the bountiful gifts and the boundless resources of nature have placed in its possession and designed that it should be.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I have listened, Sir, with great pleasure to the speech of my hon. friend. That speech, in which he has gone over the whole ground, from his point of view, has occupied him nearly three hours, and I must ask the indulgence, not only of my friends but the indulgence of the gentlemen on the opposite side of the House when I attempt to answer such a veteran parliamentarian. In rising to reply to my hon. friend, whom I met in 1882 on other fields of fight, I am conscious how arduous is the task which is before me, for he is cunning in fence and a great master of figures and details. Now, Sir, I confess I was struck by the fact that on this occasion, as on so many other occasions, the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, when they come to deal with the affairs of Canada, with its present and its future, have done this time what they have done on so many other occasions, they have rung the changes on the old set of bells. My hon. friend who has just sat down tells us that this question is to go before the electorate on the next occasion, and he, I suppose, anticipated winning on this horse. Well, Sir, all I have to say to him is this, that we have very recently come from fighting the battle along the whole line, and practically the same issue that is raised here to-night, or was raised the other night by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) was before the country and has been before the country on three successive occasions, and the electorate have given their verdict on it with no uncertain sound. I am glad, Sir, that my hon. friend is so well pleased with the definiteness of the conduct of the right hon. gentleman who leads the Conservative party. In the conclusion of his speech he said he was delighted that the question had been put so fairly and squarely, and with no ambiguity from this side. But what do we find on the other side? Under which king are you fighting, gentlemen? What horse are you to win on? Is it the horse of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), or is that which the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has just trotted on the field? Oh, I will not say he is either foundered or spavined; I will not say that. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), in his speech, said:

"It has been made a grave ground, it has been attempted to set up as an extraordinary ground for objection, that when you propose to enter into a treaty for unrestricted trade with the United States you must thereby of necessity discriminate against English manufacturers and manufacturers of all other countries except the United States. Now that is true I admit that."

What did the hon. gentleman the member for Norfolk say last night, when my friend the Minister of the Interior asked him what he meant by unrestricted reciprocity? He told us that he meant by unrestricted reciprocity—I have his words here—"leaving the Customs duties of each country free." Now, which is your policy? Is it the unrestricted reciprocity of the member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) who says that you are to let all the goods of the United States, whether they are such goods as are produced in Canada or not, in here free, and that the United States should let all the goods of Canada in free, or that we are to have our respective tariffs. Which is it? We have the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) here now, and he ought to get up and tell us. He ought to enable me to pronounce the same eulogy on him and on his party for honesty and fairness and definiteness that the member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) pronounced on our amendment to the motion made by the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). Sir, when I heard the ex-Finance Minister speaking the other night, and also when I heard my hon. friend who spoke last, I could not help being struck by the similarity between their demeanor and the doctor in Le malade imaginaire, when the doctor gets dismissed he gets into a fearful temper and he threatens the unfortunate patient with destruction. You were physicians for five years, you were the doctors of this country, you had the prescribing for this country, and the country found, to use the elegant language of my friend a moment ago, that under your treatment it was going to the dogs. It dismissed you. The country dismissed you and instantly you became angry. You declare that the country is in a terrible condition, and ever since that you have been ringing changes on these lacrimonious and lugubrious statements, but the country has gone forward in spite of you; and I do not think, Sir, it is very likely that the discharged doctors will be taken back. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken seemed, in fact, to be conscious of the person that I have just referred to, and conscious of the similarity between him and the doctor in Molière's famous comedy, for he said: "I will make the diagnosis of the case." Why, Sir, they have been making the diagnosis of the case for some years, and not only have they made the diagnosis but the prognosis as well. Their diagnoses were wrong, and their prognoses have not amounted to anything, for, as I have said, the patient is going on flourishing. Now, Sir, I shall endeavor to refer to some, or all, of the points made by my hon. friend. He lays down very properly the proposition—and it is the only proposition that has been laid down on that side since the commencement of this debate that will bear discussion—he lays down the proposition that the proposal which we are here discussing is one that intimately concerns the well-being of Canada. Yes, indeed, Sir, it intimately concerns her well-being, whether we adopt the views of those gentlemen, or whether we go on in the path of progress or extension, confident in our future, and with that boldness, which, in the language of Longfellow, my hon. friend has eulogized. Why, Sir, the very thing that we have been is, that we have been bold, but not too bold; we have had faith in the country, but those gentlemen would have us go forward with a timid step, and in such a tentative manner that the very danger of annexation, which hangs on the mind of some people when discussing this question—but which never hangs on my mind, for I have the utmost faith in Canada—would be imminent. If we had gone on in the way they wanted us to go annexation would have been inevitable. So that is a proposition that I entirely endorse. Some of the other propositions that have been made I could not endorse, because as I will show as I go on, there is scarcely a proposition made by hon. gentlemen opposite that has not a major premise which, when stated, shows not only that the syllogism is fallacious, but that it is ridiculous as well. The hon. member said we should look at our environment, and I have no objection to look at the environment of Canada. I have no objection to look at what Canada is, at her resources, her surroundings, her opportunities; and the more I look at them the more confident I become in her future. Then the hon. gentleman referred to the growth of the United States. He told us he would compare the burdens of the two countries, and he took for his argument, I think, very fallaciously the per capita comparison, just as he has concluded his speech with a per capita comparison; and as the reasoning of himself and his friends on this subject is fallacious when they have recourse to facts, which is very seldom, they nearly always misstate the case. The hon. gentleman made the statement that our taxation amounted to $6 and a fraction per head, and he stated that that was something like $3 and a fraction more than the taxation of the United States.

Mr. CHARLTON. No.

Mr. DAVIN. Well, what did he say?

Mr. CHARLTON. I stated that the taxation of this country from Customs and Excise was $6.03 per head, if I remember rightly, and that that was $2.15 more than was expended in the United States from Customs and Excise, aside from the amount paid on their debt.

Mr. DAVIN. Well, the hon. gentleman spoke very low at the time, and I did not catch accurately what he said; but I caught what he said in the beginning of his speech. And now let me state to you that the taxation of Canada in 1886 was $25,226,456, or $5.26 per head, while the total taxation in the United States was $309,819,193, or $5.28 per head, 2 cents in favor of Canada. But, Sir, it would never do for any hon. gentleman opposite when speaking on the condition and prospects of Canada, to bring forward a fact that would be in Canada's favor. Now, Sir, when the hon. gentleman comes to make a comparison of Canada with the United States—with a country that is highly organised and that is nearly a hundred years older than Canada, what is the major premise, to talk in the language of logicians—and the hon. gentleman who brought forward this question is a ripe scholar—what is the major premise in his mind? Why, that a federation which commenced its career some twenty years ago with 4,700,000 people ought to make as good a showing as a federation of 60,000,000 that commenced its career a hundred years ago. That is his major premise, and the moment you state it, it sounds ridiculous and the whole argument disappears. The true comparison—and then, of course, you have to take into account the age of Canada—would be Canada's population plus her organised wealth, plus her inchoate wealth, and the population of the United States plus her inchoate wealth and her organised wealth. Of course, we could not for one minute think that the organised wealth of Canada would compare with the organised wealth of the United States—that would be perfectly absurd; but the inchoate wealth of Canada—the wealth of British Columbia in its mines, the wealth of our vast, rich prairies in the North-West, with its millions of wheat fields, the undeveloped wealth of our fisheries, timber and various other resources—will compare advantageously with that of the United States; in fact, we have more undeveloped resources than the United States. Therefore, the comparison when made properly is a comparison that tends to the advantage of Canada. Then the hon. gentleman made a comparison as to population, and tried to make out that Canada has not progressed as rapidly in population as the United States. In fact, he took the tone that is always taken, that we are not doing well, that we are going back, that ruin is staring us in the face, that, to use his words, we are going to the dogs, but that everything is halcyon and progressive and satisfactory in the United States. I am sorry the hon. gentleman is not in his place, because I would like to read to him a few sentences, not spoken by a member of the party of which I happen to be a humble member; but I will read them for the edification of the party opposite, and meanwhile I will conceal the name of the man who uttered them until I come to the close. This is what he says:

"The statistics show that the exports of Canada per capita were greater than those of the United States, and her per capita imports are also greater than our own. Her per capita railway mileage is about the same as those of the United States. Her growth of population from the date of our Declaration of Independence up to the present day has been equal to our own, ours at that date being about 3,000,000, and hers being less than 300,000.

"The records of her criminal courts show that she has a smaller percentage of crime than we have. She is the only country in the world whose national debt is not a war debt, with the exception of two or three millions expended in putting down the recent Riel rebellion. The whole of her debt has been incurred in the development of her internal improvements. In addition to her line of railway extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific, her Government is subsidising a fast line of steamships to ply between Halifax and Liverpool, and the Imperial Government has agreed to subsidise a line to run between Vancouver, Yokohama, Hong Kong, and Australia. A company has been organised to lay an ocean cable from Vancouver, via Sandwich Islands, to Yokohama, Hong Kong, and Australia. An Atlantic ocean cable is to be owned by the same company which owns the Pacific cables.

"Thus her great railway, by means of the steamships which will ply between Halifax and Liverpool in connection with it, and the Pacific line subsidised by the English Government, which will also run in connection with it, will have both under its control. Its railways are reaching out for the carrying trade of the two hemispheres. Not only this, but the transcontinental telegraph system and both the Atlantic and Pacific cables, of which I have spoken, will be under the control and owned by her railways.

"These are not visions of the future. Most of them are realities of to-day. Already we can step into the most luxurious car which runs on this continent to Vancouver, on the waters of the Pacific, and ride continuously in it for a distance of 3,700 miles until you reach Halifax, on the Atlantic. This country has also a great inland water way from the mouth of the St. Lawrence, in the Atlantic, to the head of Lake Superior, and all her own, except the locks at Sault Ste. Marie.

"These great lines of commerce traverse broad stretches of our own country, will tap almost every important centre of trade on our northern border, and are now stretching their arms across the State of Maine to the seaboard, south to St. Paul, and the vast interests that centre in these grand transcontinental lines that are knit together by them, invite to other fields of conquest this side of the great lakes, until Portland, Oregon, St. Paul, Chicago, Buffalo, New York, and San Francisco pay tribute to these interests and share in their wonderful growth and development; and it may astonish some present to know that to-day the Dominion Government has subsidised, and is now subsidising, a railway in connection with this vast system across the State of Maine, to shorten the route to the cities of the eastern seaboard.

"Look for a moment to the unlimited resources of that country, with her great lakes and rivers, and forests; with her natural storehouses of gold and silver, of coal, iron, copper, and lead. Her pastoral and agricultural resources are unlimited, and 1,500 miles north-west of St. Paul we find actually the great wheat fields of this continent, and which, when fully developed, will not only equal, but far surpass the great Odessa region in Russia, and 40,000 square miles of coal underlie this same territory."

I need hardly tell you it is not a Canadian Reformer that speaks; at all events, it is not a Canadian Reformer who has a seat in this House. The gentleman who speaks is Mr. S. J. Ritchie, of Ackron, Ohio. That is the way an American, a highly instructed American, looks at our resources, and I am only sorry that a countryman of his is not present to hear what he said. If my hon. friend who spoke last were here, I am sure that would edify him; and I was rather surprised that my hon. friend did not wax a little conscious of the parent source whence he draws his life blood and say something in reply to one of his leaders, who, last night, sneered at immigrants, for, after all, the hon. gentleman is, like myself, an immigrant. The hon. gentleman spoke of the exodus. That was almost the first thing he took up, just as did the hon. member for South Oxford, when introducing his resolution. That hon. gentleman indeed, had so much to say about the exodus that he was almost through his speech before I became aware that he was discussing the tariff. I thought at first it was an immigration speech that the hon. gentleman was delivering; in fact, I thought he had got hold of a manuscript copy of a pamphlet which the hon. the Minister of Agriculture was likely to publish on immigration questions, and had misconstrued it, and quoted it here. Hon. gentlemen opposite talk of the exodus. These pessimists derive great consolation from the exodus, forgetting entirely that nothing was more natural than that there should have been a large emigration from this country to the United States, as I shall show, Sir, in a moment. A great deal of that emigration to the United States took place before our Canadian Pacific Railway was built. We have in Canada, I am glad to say, a most highly organised system of education; in fact our educational appliances are in advance of our position in many ways. Our educational appliances are in advance of our organised society, and the result is there has always been in Canada a large number of highly educated men, men educated at our normal schools, chiefly at the Government expense, who, when they do not find in Canada scope for that kind of activity for which their training fits them, turn naturally to a country in which communities are more highly organised than they are in a great part of this country. In the United States, a similar movement is visible. What takes place here, happens to the Eastern States. Yet we do not hear of the New England States being destroyed because there is a large emigration from them to the Western States. The fact is, that the line of emigration goes not on lines of longitude, but on lines of latitude. It goes from east to west, and it was natural, when we had no Pacific railway, that this emigration, on which hon. gentlemen opposite dilated at such length, should have taken place. That emigration from the Eastern States is still going on. I have here a report of a Governor of Dakota, in which he says:

"Early in the spring a large colony of settlers coming direct from Vermont and New England points located in Hangar county, about 25 miles south of the Northern Pacific."

And the Governor of New Mexico tells how another colony went from the New England States. I do not believe, Sir, that if you were to enter into any legislative body in these States, you would find gentlemen standing up and declaring these States were going to the dogs because the more energetic and restless spirits, persons who could not find scope for their abilities at home, took Horace Greely's advice to go west. The argument that because a portion of our population has gone to the States, there must be something wrong, has been stretched too far. Did no one leave for the United States when hon. gentlemen opposite were in power? Did no migration take place to the States from Canada then? Did no migration take place before they came into power? Why, Sir, this thing has been going on for 25 years, and so long as we have in our brains the restless, aggressive, and enterprising pioneer blood of the Norman, Gaul and Saxon, so long shall we find this emigration taking place. The hon. gentleman then proceeded to deal with the North-West. He seemed to think that the North-West was in a very bad way, and would be greatly benefited by unrestricted reciprocity. Well, one of the first consequences of that policy would be that the American ranchmen who are now at their wits' end to know where to get food for their vast herds, would come across the lines and swamp our ranches. Do you suppose they would leave any money in this country or do anything to develop this country? They would not. In ten years, our vast grazing areas of the west would be eaten clean off, and these people would have sent the money they made out of the cattle to the States, to go into the pockets of the millionaire ranchmen living in New York, Chicago and St. Louis. That is what would take place in that part of the country under unrestricted reciprocity. Then, when the hon. gentleman went to the North-West, he dealt with the progress of population, and, of course, could see nothing but darkness and despair. But what are the facts? Manitoba, in 1870, had a population of 18,995, including Indians. Manitoba was admitted into Confederation on the 15th July, 1870, and what her population would have been to-day, if the policy of my hon. friend, the right hon. the First Minister had been carried out, and the Canadian Pacific Railway built in accordance with the agreement made in 1873, it is impossible to say with exactitude, but it is certain that Manitoba would to-day have a very much larger population than she has. Nearly ten years elapsed before the railway was built, and since the railway has been completed, not quite ten years have passed. What are the facts? The census of 1886 showed a population of 108,640, and the census of 1881 showed a population of 65,954, or an increase in five years of over 60 per cent., and that notwithstanding the reaction from the boom of 1882-83. In the same period the occupied dwellings increased 86 per cent. Let us compare that with the hon. gentleman's favorite Dakota, with the territory that the hon. gentleman can never mention without going into paeans of joy. In 1860 that territory had a population of 4,837. In ten years it had only reached 14,181, or an increase of less than 10,000. In 1880 its population was 135,177, so that their favorite territory has not done much better than Manitoba. Washington Territory, in 1878, had a population of 50,154, and, in 1883, a population of 92,508. In those years it increased only 42,354, while Manitoba in the same time increased 44,686. British Columbia has greatly increased its population in the same period. In about three years it ran its population from 36,247 up to 49,459. It only got the railway about that time ago, and that is the progress it has made since; and with that progress and with the extraordinary attractions of the Province of British Columbia, with its mining wealth, with its farming attractions, with its fisheries, there cannot be the least doubt that that Province will go ahead with giant strides. Take Utah again. It has three lines of railway, and in 1887 immigrants only increased 11,074, and its present population is 106,500. Montana, those who would boom it say has a population of 130,000, and last year had a population of 120,000, but I am assured that the population is really not above that of Manitoba, and it has three lines of railway. New Mexico in 1860 had a population of 27,000, and in 1870 of 91,870, being a gain in ten years of 4,840. In 1880, after an active year of railway construction, it had a population of 119,565. Idaho again had a population of 32,610 in 1880, and now it is estimated that its population is about 90,000. Arizona was shown by the census of 1880 to have a population of 40,000, and now the population is estimated at 80,000. It has three lines of railway. Now I do not think that a comparison with those territories reflects any discredit on the progress made by Manitoba or the North-West Territory. My hon. friend, when speaking of the North-West Territory and of Manitoba, spoke about Minneapolis, and Milwaukee, and St. Paul, and said that our settlers should have access to those markets. Why, if our settlers had access to those markets, if you break down the wall, if you break down the tariff, if you take away the protection, if you destroy the policy of the Conservative party, which I can assure the country, if I were addressing the people outside, can only be maintained as long as its friends are maintained, what will happen? All chance of Winnipeg becoming the Chicago of the west will disappear, and whether Winnipeg or some other city is to attain that eminent position, there can be no doubt whatever that the time must come when we shall have, west of Lake Superior, a great commercial city like Chicago; but there is no chance of it if you destroy the tariff. Milwaukee, Minneapolis, St. Paul—these will be the markets to which the people of Manitoba and the North-West will go, and what will happen then to our farmers? Our farmers will not have a home market. They will not have what we find in Winnipeg to-day, and what will soon be in every town along the line, manufacturing energies and manufacturing industries, and the mouths to be satisfied and the stomachs to be fed which manufacturing industries produce. Now, speaking of Dakota, I read something of what a United States gentleman said. I am going to read something from the Globe for hon. gentlemen. I am sure it will prove most edifying. It used to be the bible of the Reform party. Whether it retains that rank at present or not I really do not know, but at one time it held a very eminent position as the organ of that party. The Globe sent a correspondent into Dakota. Probably the Globe told the correspondent to go into Dakota in order to get facts, booming facts for these districts for hon. gentleman opposite, facts probably to be used in this debate. I do not know, but here we have the special correspondence of the Globe, and this is what the special correspondent of the Globe says:

"I made it my first business to enquire into the existence of the so-called exodus of disappointed Canadians, or newly arrived immigrants into the United States; and as the result I have no hesitation in saying that such an exodus does not exist. From the Custom house officials and old residents on both sides, I learn that for some years there was a regular emigration of this kind; but last year no person crossed southward to settle, except a few so-called 'beats,' who left Canada per force, and for Canada's good, and even these were counter-balanced by a similar number of persons who had got on the wrong side of the American law, and were obliged to begin life again in Canada. For some time past there has been no movement of immigrants in either direction. How, then, it may be asked, is the undoubtedly more rapid population of Dakota, and especially the large number of Canadians, settled in it to be explained? In this way, before the Canada Pacific Railway reached Manitoba, a few years ago it was impossible for any settler to get there except by way of the American railways through Chicago and St. Paul, and then by team or water up the Red River into Canada. Manitoba, of course, was to these intending settlers little but a name; and along the whole line of their journey, from St. Paul northward, they were waylaid by American officials and dealers in real estate, who described to them in extravagant terms, the Arctic climate of Manitoba, and the distances and difficulties of the journey that remained, and so induced the majority of them, without difficulty, to remain and take up land before crossing the boundary. Since it is now easier to reach Manitoba than to reach Dakota, these influences have, of course, ceased to be effective, and Manitoba is undoubtedly filling up faster than either of the American States at the present day. I have spoken several times of the indebtedness of the farming class—"

I hope the hon. gentleman who spoke last night, the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) is in his place, because I am sure this will interest him. I listened with great pleasure to his speech. It illustrated what I have often known, that farmers are constitutional grumblers, but, when I heard the vigor of his language, and saw how admirably he could state his case, I saw that we had in him a fine specimen of the settlers and yeomen that Scotland gives us, and, notwithstanding his lugubrious view of the situation, I believe him to be a successful man and to be surrounded by successful men. Now, I ask his attention. I know it will do him good. In case the glance he took into the abyss of misery, the caldron of unhappiness that hon. gentlemen there brew, should have disagreed with him, this will certainly act as a salve to his wounded feelings:

"I have spoken several times of the indebtedness of the farming class, and although this is a matter in which it is everybody's interest to suppress the facts on both sides of the boundary, I have many reasons to believe that the Dakota farmer is very much worse off in this respect, and that almost without exception, he is the prey of a shark-like class of jobbing money lenders of which I neither saw nor heard of an example in Manitoba. Certainly there is nothing so half so significant or unpleasant there as the printed list I saw posted up in the elevator at Gretna, a list of 100 farmers on whose machines one machine company, (if I remember right, a threshing machine company, of Racine, Wisconsin) have chattel mortgages."

These are the friends of the hon. member for North Norfolk, the cheapness of whose machines, and the delicacy of whose commercial transactions he is never tired of eulogising.

"This was a warning to every one, especially the elevator proprietors, not to purchase the crops of these men, as they were mortgaged to the above company, and side by side with it was the warning of the elevator people, that they would prosecute for fraud any mortgaged farmer attempting to sell them his crops, as these crops could, of course, be distrained upon by the mortgagor. Thirty per cent., too, several people assured me, was a common rate of interest exacted by the money lenders. In one case I was even told of a loan renewed at the rate of 70 per cent."

My hon. friend the Minister of the Interior was able to quote the Globe the other night as really coming round to the side of Canada, and I am glad to be able to quote the Globe to-night as also doing some justice to Manitoba and the North-West, and some justice, also, the pet states and provinces of hon. gentlemen opposite. Now, Sir, as I told the House, I had the pleasure on several occasions in 1882, of hearing, and meeting, and fighting the hon. member for North Norfolk. And, Sir, he is a gentleman of great logical power, he is a very able man, he is full of statistics, he is so full of them that he sometimes misquotes them. He is not always accurate. Now, he stated here to-night: "There has never been a time when the prices of agricultural products were not higher on the other side of the line—in Chicago, I think he said—than on this side. Now, he made a similar statement in 1882 at Tilsonburg when I met him there, and a similar statement when I met him at Norfolk. It was at Tilsonburg he made the statement that on the very day he was speaking the price of wheat was higher in Chicago than in Toronto. That was on the 29th May, and the quotations in the Toronto papers the following morning sent up from Chicago were to this effect: Chicago, spring wheat, $1.23½ to $1.25½. Toronto, spring wheat, $1.33 to $1.37, or a difference in favor of Toronto of 9½ cents to 11½ cents. On that occasion he said: And it has always been so since that policy became operative—meaning the National Policy. Sir, very frequently since then, the price of wheat in Toronto has been largely ahead of the price in Chicago. So much so for my hon. friend's accuracy. He also spoke about Dakota and Manitoba, and the North-West farmers being greatly injured because they have to pay too much for their machinery. Why, Sir, my hon. friend the member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly) when speaking on this topic, dismissed, by facts, statements of that kind. I was up in Winnipeg in 1879. I know something of what the price of machinery was at that time, and I can assure the House that instead of the price of machinery having gone up the price of machinery has gone down. So the statement is entirely erroneous that the farmer in Manitoba or the farmer in the North-West has to pay more in consequence of the National Policy. My hon. friend, at this period of his speech, stopped, and he thanked God that we had an intelligent people. Well, Sir, I am thankful, also, that we have an intelligent people, because if we had not an intelligent people, I am afraid the views of hon. gentlemen opposite now being put forward, might be put into practice disastrously for this country. The hon. gentleman also reverted frequently to the exports and imports, and to the inter-state trade of the United States. We admit that they are a rich and a prosperous people. I have stated that the question is not whether five millions are as rich as sixty millions, but whether we are better developing the country on our own lines than if we were to jump into the maw of the United States. That is the question. He asks: Have we a satisfactory exhibit? All I have to say is this: I should say we have. And then having talked in this way of Canada, without having shown that the patient is suffering, having come, as it were, for the doctor, having come to a perfectly healthy individual and saying: Oh, you are very bad, you have this and you have that—he then prescribes, and what is the remedy? He says: Honesty, economy, retrenchment, access to our natural markets. Well, Sir, at the next election we can discuss honesty and retrenchment, but it is more germane to the question now before the House to discuss the subject of access to our natural markets. There is, I find, a remarkable consistency, after all, in the Reform party. I have in my hand here a speech made at New Glasgow, N.S., in August, 1881, by the ex-leader of the Opposition, a man whom I am sorry this House has even temporarily lost, because no one, whether he is opposed to the hon. gentleman, or whether he is a supporter or a friend of his, can doubt his ability, or fail to see what a gap he must leave in any assembly. Mr. Blake, speaking at New Glasgow, said :

"Your natural channel of trade is with the neighboring Republic. Your exports will find the best market there, and your imports should come from there."

Now, Sir, that is the remedy, that we are to seek our market in the United States, we are to get our imports from the United States. The hon. member for North Norfolk says that our geographical position is of such a sort that we cannot do other than seek our imports from there and send our imports there, if we want to succeed. A great deal more is said of our geographical position than is warranted. In the first place, the argument of geographical position is greatly discounted by the fact that we live in an age of railways and telegraphs. That makes all the difference in the world. It has made a difference in the sites of towns; it is no longer absolutely necessary to choose a river bank for the site of a town. Again, the telegraphs have brought places nearer each other. British Columbia was almost an infinite distance from the Maritime Provinces before the era of railways and telegraphs. It would be impossible to cross the Rocky Mountains with any sense of national connection if there were not railways and telegraphs. But if there is any force in that argument let me call the attention of the House to this: that the argument tells as much against the United States as it tells against Canada. Does not the United States stretch across the length and breadth of the continent? Has it not the Rocky Mountains; has it not a vast stretch of barren territory, too—I use the language of the hon. member who introduced the motion—separating one part of it from another? And if we are to go to geography, to topical argument in regard to national development, why the geographical feature of North America would suggest, not one vast federation, according to the utopian dream of some people, but three great republics or empires, one on the shores of the Atlantic, one on the shores of the Pacific, and one in the centre, with its outlet to the sea in the Gulf of Mexico, and probably one north with its outlet in Hudson Bay. That is the division, if you are going to follow geography. But it is too late, it is as absurd for a young nation like ours to be thinking always of what might have been as it is for a man to do so. A man of twenty-five or thirty may think that if his education had been directed into different channels he might have had advantages that he had not obtained and matters might have been different with him; but a man thinking of the past is a very foolish man. The only thing over which we have any control is the present; that is the only thing on which we can make any impact, and if we are sensible men it is the only thing with which we will busy ourselves. So it is with a nation. It is useless to think about these geographical features. It is all very well for Mr. Goldwin Smith, who is a student, in his library, who is not a man of action, who is not engaged in governing the country, to sit there and discuss difficulties of this or of the other kind, and say that a geographical difficulty exists here and a geographical difficulty exists there, and that certain laws will operate in this way and certain laws in the other. But for us here, who are practical men, the question is really, and it is behind this whole question, shall we, to use the language of hon. gentlemen opposite, throw up the sponge, or shall five millions of men, the chief elements of which belong to the greatest nations of the world, the nations that can stand before any nation that ever existed, whether these five millions, with the vast wealth of Canada, with its millions of acres of fertile lands, with its mines, its lakes, its rivers, are to develop this country, or whether they are to shrink from the task on account of the bug-bears raised by a student in his library about geographical difficulties. Too much altogether has been made of that. Geographical difficulties indeed! Why the French-Canadians, with some of whom I have the pleasure of sitting side by side in this House, did not shrink from the greatest possible difficulties, and in the land whence I come, in the North West, say it is true of the whole of Canada,

"Our tiniest rill, our mightiest river, Roll mingling with their fame for ever."

It is absurd to suppose that the descendants of those men, to suppose that French-Canadians, that descendants of the Anglo-Saxons, that descendants of the Celts in this House and in the country, that five millions of men, with the opportunities we have, should shrink from the great task we have before us of building up a great nation, because that is my hope, and if I did not believe it would occur, I would throw up the sponge at once and would not care about the task.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. DAVIN. But I say "yes." I was not sure that it was an hon. member, but I thought that it was another species that interrupted me. Canada is described as having length without breadth, as an eel-skin, as a few miles of fruitful and fertile territory stretching along the boundary line. But the facts are thus set forth by a well-known authority, Mr. Griffin:—

"About 100 miles north of the great lakes is a belt of rocky country, the greater part of which is of little value for agricultural purposes; but there are rich mines, vast areas of timber and valuable fisheries, and grasses grow with such luxuriance that it must become some day one of the greatest stock-raising countries in the world. This region extends northward to the height of land, the water-shed separating the waters flowing into the great lakes from those flowing into Hudson Bay. On the other side of the height of land a fertile, well-wooded country slopes down to the Hudson Bay. The rivers all rise in the neighborhood of the rocky section. If it were as smooth and fertile as other parts of the country it would soon be stripped of timber near the sources of the rivers, and the country would be subject to floods such as those which have devastated Ohio and other sections of the United States owing to the destruction of forests. But the Ontario Government, having wisely recognised the necessity of preserving the forests (under the guidance of my friend Mr. Phipps) can easily keep that region at the sources of the rivers always well-timbered. The mines and the fisheries can be developed, lumbering can be carried on under the supervision of a government forestry bureau, and stock raisers can avail themselves of the succulent grasses. North of that narrow strip are millions of acres of fertile farm lands. The country between the height of land and Hudson Bay only requires a railway to develop it, and a railway has already been chartered. According to the reports of Professor Bell and other well known scientists there are immense deposits of iron and anthracite coal side by side along the rivers emptying into James' Bay. The distance from Toronto to James' Bay via the Northern Pacific Junction and James' Bay railways will be 575 miles. When the railway to James' Bay is completed anthracite coal will be brought from the northern mines to the people of southern Ontario. Near the city of Ottawa is a mountain of the finest iron in the world. The coal mines of the James' Bay region will be connected by railway with Ottawa, and also with the rich iron mines on the north shore of Lake Superior, less than 300 miles away. South of the anthracite coal region are enormous beds of lignite coal, peat and porcelain or China clay of superior quality."

Canada has breadth as well as length, and if they will only pay half the attention to the capacities that Canada possesses as they do to the United States they will be able to grow as enthusiastic about their own country. This year has brought painfully before us the superior advantages of Canada: painfully I say, because there was a loss of life on the part of many American citizens in that great blizzard which visited the American North-West. Our whole Dominion lies north of the cyclone belt. Three-fourths of the land adapted to the production of wheat is in Canada, and Mr. Wiman, one of the inspirers of this movement, in fact he is the corypheus of the movement, tells us that we have two hours more sunshine in the North-West than they have in the land below the line, and that under those circumstances he says that we have great advantages for wheat growing. Now, the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) dwelt on the inter-state trade of the United States as enormous, and he seemed to think it was a fair thing on his part to compare the inter-state trade of the United States with the export trade of other countries. But, Sir, when he compares the inter-state trade of the United States with its own export trade he will know, what he would have known had he compared as he might, Mr. Blue's report—although our statistics, I am sorry to say, are not in a first rate condition—but if he took Mr. Blue's report for the Ontario Government, and if he took Mr. Blackeby's report to Sir Leonard Tilley in 1885, he will see that the internal trade of Canada was enormously greater than its export or import trade. How comes the United States to have this great inter-state trade? How comes it to have the home market that he lauded so much? It is, Sir, because of that very protection that he wants us to forego. He does not seem to have observed for one minute that when he was pouring on the States all the applause that he could, about their development and internal wealth, that this only shows that the policy of the United States, which Alexander Hamilton and Madison and Webster, from one time to another advocated was the true one, and the policy that the hon. gentleman himself advocates because he believes in protection. Well, Sir, what does his argument prove? It proves that if we want to become a great nation, if we want to develop our resources in such a manner that the internal trade shall be a great factor in our life, we must imitate the United States and pursue the same policy of protection. Now, Sir, what did one of the Cobden tracts says in regard to the United States many years ago? It said:

"It is our guarantee that if America will put down monopolising manufactures, when our election time comes we will lay Manchester and Sheffield alongside Indiana and Illinois, the finest States of the Union. These artisans and these mechanics will manufacture for them and they may grow food for us."

Now, Sir, we know very well that it does not make much matter what the form protection takes to help an industry, provided it is protection. It is well known that a time came in the history of England when actually free trade was the surest way of protecting its manufactures, and that the way to give protection to those manufactures was to open the doors to cheap food. The fact that manufactures are more advanced, are richer and are more highly organised in any set than in another is sufficient protection. If we should adopt the course suggested by the hon. gentleman what will happen? Our manufacturers will be placed in competition with the manufacturers of the United States, who are protected as compared with our own manufacturers, not only by the fact that a great deal of what articles they deal in are patented, but by the fact that the United States manufacturers are enormously richer, are more highly organised, and that they are in fact long come to maturity, while our manufacturers are only in an adolescent state. The result would be to place us in the position sketched out in the Cobden Club Paper. That policy would bring St. Paul and Minneapolis and other cities of the United States, near to portions of our country, with the result that they will manufacture for us and we will grow food for them. I will show you bye-and-bye the market that those gentlemen think is so valuable is a treacherous one, and there is no guarantee whatever that the demand will continue for the class of articles that we export to the United States. Mr. Hitt is a United States statesman who takes much interest in our affairs, and he is of course in favor of commercial union. Indeed, I think judging by the speech of my hon. friend the member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) that he, too, is in favor of commercial union.

Mr. BOWELL. Of course he is.

Mr. DAVIN. In an interesting speech, which I remember reading, the hon. gentleman said that "whatever the Liberal party would do he was determined to stand by commercial union, and he nailed his colors to the mast." What do we find here to-night? His colors are not nailed to the mast, but they are come down. I am sure that the ship is just the same, but he gave her another coat of paint and put another name on the bowsprit, and the hon. gentleman sits in the poop with the sails flapping against the mast waiting for a breeze. But, Sir, the breeze is not to be coaxed by any such metamorphosis as the ship has undergone. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman, for a man so well informed in figures, is sometimes very reckless in his statements. He said that the treaty should not be like the old reciprocity treaty, which, he thought, was all on the one side. He declares that that was a one-sided treaty, that it was a juggled treaty, and the advantage was on the side of Canada. I have here in my hand the tariff and Mr. Brown's statements in regard to what took place, and the figures, Sir, are irrefragable, because I have tested them by authentic sources. It is impossible they should be wrong, because they would have been exposed at once. This is a memorandum by Sir Edward Thornton, K.C.P., and the Hon. George Brown on the commercial relations past and present of the British North American Provinces with the United States of America. I find from this that in the thirteen years of the operation of the reciprocity Treaty the Provinces purchased from the Republic, according to the United States returns, commodities to the value of $346,180,204, and the Republic purchased from the Provinces $325,726,520, leaving a gross cash balance in favor of the United States of $20,454,246, yet the hon. gentleman has said that the treaty was all on the side of Canada. In speaking of that treaty I confess I thought the hon. gentleman was a little disingenuous; I do not use the word offensively, as he knows well, because it is not in my nature to say anything offensive to anyone. He spoke of the enormous volume of trade that existed in favor of Canada during the continuance of that treaty. There was an enormous trade done between Canada and the United States at that time; but, Sir, the hon. gentleman never told the House—I do not suppose he would treat his constituents in the same way—what is one of the conditions of a true view of the case, that during that time the Grand Trunk Railway was building, that during that time there was a great war going on below the line, that millions of people were taken from the factory and workshop to fight on battle fields, and that therefore the people of the United States had to go where best they could get their goods. I think when those things are taken into account, it will probably be found that instead of $20,000,000 being in favor of the United States in ten years under a treaty of that sort, under ordinary and normal circumstances there would be a far larger sum. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman spoke about the market of the United States for Canada, and it seems to me that there is a great fallacy in the way hon. gentlemen speak about the market. To refer again to the language of logicians, that is what is called the fallacy of division; it is distributing one term in one premise, and leaving it undistributed in another. It is assuming that what would be good for one man or one set of men in a country would be good for all men in that country. The hon. gentleman refers to our export of horses, rye, barley, oats, and what not to the United States, and he argues with curious inconsistency that when we import from the United States we pay all the duty on what we import, and when we export to the United States we pay all the duty on what we export. Well, Sir, that is a most extraordinary state of things. It revolutionises political economy. But the hon. gentleman who is leading in this debate said the other night that "nice customs courtesy to great kings," and I suppose such heaven-born geniuses as are leading in this debate can revolutionise political economy and overturn the laws of exchange. But, Sir, I am inclined to think that that is a mistake. The Hon. James Young, who is a prominent member of the Reform party, and an exceedingly able and honest man, dealing with this question, says it is perfectly absurd to say that we pay the duty on the horses that we send across the line. Now, Sir, dealing with this question of the market, I will ask the House to bear with me while I bring before them the relative markets that we have. Our aggregate imports and exports from 1873 to 1887 inclusive, were as follows:—

|--|-----------------|
| Aggregate imports and exports..... | $2,864,000,000 |
| Trade with United Kingdom..... | $1,243,000,000 |
| do United States..... | $1,230,000,000 |
| do other countries..... | 396,000,000 |
| do countries other than United States..... | $1,639,000,000 |

Our aggregate exports for the same period were:

|---|-----------------|
| Aggregate exports..... | $1,305,000,000 |
| To United Kingdom..... | 650,000,000 |
| United States..... | $529,000,000 |
| Other countries..... | 126,000,000 |
| Countries other than United States..... | $ 776,000,000 |

Now, our imports for 1887 were:

|--|---------------|
| Total imports..... | $112,892,236 |
| From the United Kingdom..... | $ 44,962,233 |
| do other British countries..... | 1,704,200 |
| Total from the British Empire..... | $ 46,666,433 |
| From the United States..... | $ 45,107,066 |
| do other foreign countries..... | 13,865,929 |
| Total from foreign countries..... | $ 58,972,995 |
| Total from countries other than the United States..... | 60,532,367 |
| Our aggregate trade..... | 202,408,042 |

The percentages on home consumption for 1887 are as follows:—

|---|----------------|
| United Kingdom..... | 42·6 per cent. |
| Other British countries..... | 1·6 do |
| Total British Empire..... | 42·2 do |
| United States..... | 42·8 do |
| Other foreign countries..... | 13·1 do |
| Foreign countries..... | 55·9 do |
| Countries other than the United States..... | 57·3 do |

Our aggregate trade for 1887 was as follows:—

|--|---------------|
| Total aggregate..... | $202,408,047 |
| With United Kingdom..... | $ 89,534,079 |
| do other British countries..... | 5,151,010 |
| do British Empire..... | $ 94,685,089 |
| do United States..... | $ 82,767,265 |
| do other foreign countries..... | 17,702,885 |
| do all foreign countries..... | $100,470,150 |
| do countries other than United States..... | $112,387,974 |

Now, Sir, it will be seen that our trade with countries other than the United States, that our trade with the British Empire, is an exceedingly valuable trade; and as the hon. gentleman specified the goods we exported to the United States, I will ask his attention to tables that have been prepared by Mr. McGoun, of Montreal, for 1885, and I found in testing them that they were perfectly correct, and that about the same ratio of figures would apply to last year, and therefore I make no scruple of adopting them. The first table shows the principal exports for 1885, from Canada to the United States. The exports amount to the sum of

Mr. DAVIN,

$12,642,000. Amongst these we find eggs which the hon. gentleman spoke at some length. Now, Sir, the second table is that of the chief exports of Canada to the United States of articles of which the United States export to the world at large exceeds the United States import from Canada; and I call the hon. gentleman's attention to this, because he stated that the question before us was a very important and critical one. He said nothing could be more solemn than the nature of the question we are discussing, and, therefore, I may assume that if I can show the hon. gentleman he is mistaken in the view he takes, he will show, by turning from unrestricted reciprocity, the great righteousness he displayed in turning from commercial union, and we shall find him voting with the Conservative party and supporting what is really the affection of his innermost heart, a protection policy. I will take first the item of coal, of which the export from British Columbia to the United States amounts to $1,178,000, and the exports of the United States of coal reached in value $1,999,000. Copper ore, we exported to the United States $245,000 worth, and the United States exported $4,759,000 worth. I call the attention of the House to that item, because the hon. gentleman, echoing Mr. Wiman, declared that if we had unrestricted reciprocity, any amount of copper ore would be sent from Canada to the United States, yet, as I have shown, the United States export copper ore to the value of $4,739,000. The same remark applies to iron ore. The hon. gentleman's dulcet utterances are still ringing in my ears, as he declared that we would send any amount of iron ore to the States, were his panacea applied. Well, we exported iron ore to the States to the value of $132,000, and the United States exported to the value of $12,891,000. Take horned cattle. Of horned cattle, we sent to the United States $1,411,000 worth, and the United States exported $12,906,000 worth. Hides, horns and skins, we exported to the extent of $459,000, and the United States exported $4,153,000 worth. Peas and beans, we exported to the United States to the value of $484,000, and the United States export of these articles reached the value of $522,000. Wheat, we sent to the United States $268,000 worth, and the United States exported $72,933,000 worth. Yet, that is the country where we are to obtain an enormous market for our farm products. Is the hon. gentleman aware that within the last ten years the development of wheat growing in India has made such strides that the English and the other European markets are menaced by it, even to the exclusion of the United States wheat. Why, at a farmers' convention held a month ago in Chicago, the probability was discussed of the time coming when not a bushel of wheat would be sent across the Atlantic. Only that I do not want to trouble the House with more statistics than are necessary to prove my case—and I have the statistics showing the progress made in wheat growing in India, I would enter into this part of the question. Of rye, we sent the United States $150,000 worth and they exported $12,000,000 worth. In potatoes, our export to the United States reached the value of $108,000 as compared with an export from the United States of $265,000. I understood the soul of the hon. member for Queen's, Mr. Davies, was troubled the other night in the matter of potatoes. Let me point out to the hon. gentleman that the United States export more potatoes than we send them, and therefore the glowing vision that rose before his imagination of any amount of potatoes going to the United States is born entirely of an uninstructed fancy. Wood staves and headings, we sent to the United States $31,000 worth, and they exported $1,950,000 worth. Other lumber, we shipped to the United States to the value of $184,000, and the United States exported to the amount of $1,182,000. Household furniture, we exported to the United States to the value of $147,000 while the United States exported $2,128,000 worth. Other wood manufactures, we sent across the line $221,000 worth, and the United States export was $1,590,000. The total export of all these articles from the United States from Canada amounted to $5,300,000, while the total exports of the United States to the rest of the world reached $119,298,000; and yet that is the market those hon. gentlemen say we are about to capture. I would call the hon. gentleman's attention to another table which is still more instructive, and that is a statement of the articles that we export to the United States and of which the United States retain the whole or the greater part. Wood planks, we exported $6,805,000 worth and the United States exported $6,575,000 worth. Laths and palings, we exported to the United States $220,000 worth and they exported $48,000 worth. In shingles, our export amounted to $133,000, and the United States export reached $132,000. Barley we exported to the extent of $4,477,000 as against the United States export $346,000. Of hay we exported to the United States $1,181,000 against their export of $204,000. Malt, we exported to the United States $290,000, and they exported none, and malt was one of the articles the hon. gentleman dwelt upon. Horses, we exported to the States $1,524,000 worth, and they exported $367,000 worth. Sheep, we sent to the States $773,000 worth, and the United States exported $572,000 worth. Wool, we exported to the United States $186,000 worth, and they exported $88,000 worth. The American returns show that their import trade with Canada, in these articles I have mentioned amounts to $157,575,000, while they exported to the value of $8,433,000. The total import—and I would call the hon. gentleman's attention to this—of these articles, according to the United States returns for 1885, was $20,507,000 worth, and according to the same returns our total exports to them was $17,575,000. Now, these are the only things for which we could find a profitable market in the United States, and yet what is the fact? We sent them $17,500,000 worth out of the $20,000,000 which they imported, so that at present, even with the tariff, such as it is, we control the only part of our trade with the United States which is really valuable to us. In regard to all the other things, in regard to things that we send them which they send away, what is to prevent Canadians, with the enterprise that the hon. gentleman said our manufacturers should have, with the energy which our manufactures should have, what is to prevent these gentlemen finding out the markets themselves and keeping the profit in Canada which goes to the middleman in New-York? The hon. gentleman asked in connection with this, who paid the duty. I have already pointed out the absurdity of saying that we pay all the duty on our exports to the States, and that we pay all the duty on our imports from the States. That is a very jug handled affair. Some malign fairy must preside over the laws which govern exchange and strangely alter them, in order to give the hon. gentleman an argument, but I think I have shown that, when the hon. gentleman wants a fact to buttress up his argument, he takes the readiest way—he invents it; he falls back upon his invention for his fact, and I am bound to say that, in that respect, he is a man of great capacity. As to this statement about paying the duty, I have heard the hon. gentleman speak about so much being paid on horse shoe nails. I remember once when he made a speech when I met him in 1882, in which he described that, if I wanted to shoe my horse, I was taxed something like 35 per cent. on the nails, if I smoked a cigar, I was taxed so much on that; and I found that he taxed me so much that at last I discovered that, in smoking cigars and shoeing my horse and getting wearing apparel I was taxed beyond my income, which has always been a very moderate one. That was answered very practically in this House by my hon. friend, Mr. Wigle, who is no longer here, I am sorry to say, and who is a loss to this House. From that gallery I heard him demonstrate the utter absurdity of this statement which had been made as to the duty being paid by us on all we import under a protective tariff. That is to say, the duty is paid on articles which pay Customs duty when they come in, but most of these articles do not come in; they are made in the country. The other day, when one of the hon. gentleman's friends was making a speech at a bye-election, he described how much was paid on wool which entered into the manufacture of garments. In fact, he diagnosed—I like that word “diagnosed” which the hon. gentleman gave us to-day, and I shall never forget it—he diagnosed the unfortunate situation of the people of Canada in that respect, and an old fellow who was there listening to him, and who had a wife who was handy at making clothes, took a pair of his unmentionables in his hand and said: “That wool was grown on my own sheep, the cloth was made at home, how much duty do I pay on that?” And the old fellow stroked his knee with the perfect satisfaction and confidence that he had overturned one of the Reform missionaries. I will read three or four lines, if it be only to recall the pleasant voice and the incisive logic of my friend Mr. Wigle. He says:

“Home competition brings down the price. But that is not the best of it. Without this National Policy, we would be compelled to get these hats in the United States; and the manufacturers of hats would have all that country to sell their hats in, and would bring their surplus here. Now, without this policy, we would have to pay that dollar. Where would it go to? Every man knows that it would go to the United States. The hatter would pay the dollar to the wholesale man, the wholesaler would pay it to the retailer, the retailer to the laborer, the laborer to the butcher, the butcher to the farmer, the farmer to the blacksmith, and the blacksmith to some one else, and every man whose hands that dollar went through would make from 10 to 25 per cent., and it would benefit thousands of people in the United States. Where would the hat be? In Canada, and in six months it would be worn out, then we would have neither hat nor money. I have a hat that was bought in London at the rate of $4.50 a dozen, or three York shillings a piece. That hat can be sold for 50 cents, giving a profit of 33 per cent.; and the result is that, when that hat is worn out, the money is in the country, and the poor man can buy another with it. But the argument of the hon. gentleman is that the poor man has to pay this duty. Now, how is it? The poor man comes into a store where there is a hat for 50 cents, another for 75 cents, another for $1, and another for $1.25, all manufactured in Canada, but, if he wants a finer hat, he takes a fine wool hat on which duty has been paid; and I say that, if he buys a $4 hat, that is his business, and not the business of the Reform party of this country. The poor man is not compelled to buy that kind of a hat, but if he wants a hat like the one the Leader of the Opposition wears, and he pays his $3 or $4 for it, that is his business and not the business of the Reform party. Now, Sir, we will come to the question of a particular kind of cloth. The hon. gentleman, when talking to the people of West Kent, told them that the poor class of people paid 50 per cent. on their cloths, while the rich man paid only 23 per cent. Well, I had occasion to go to a factory in West Kent, and I said, ‘I want a yard of your heaviest cloth’. There is the piece of cloth I got.”

He held it up before the gaze of the Commons.

“It has a pound of wool in it, and I paid 50 cents a yard for it. It cost 30 cents to manufacture it. Now, I would like to know where is the 50 per cent. paid on that piece of cloth. I will promise the hon. gentleman that, if he or any of his supporters behind him—and there are a lot of merchants there—can stand up and show the House that there is 50 per cent. of duty paid on this kind of cloth, I will leave this side of the House, and go and support the hon. gentleman.”

I quote that because it is put in a more emphatic and a better way than I could put it, but I will quote the language of the Adam Smiths and the Bastiats in regard to this matter. What they lay down is that the moment you invest capital, it always displaces capital, and if you send the capital out of the country, you have only displaced one capital in your own country and have lost the money you have sent out, and there cannot be the least doubt on that head. In this connection the hon. gentleman referred to eggs, and he dealt in superlatives as the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) did. In fact, when I heard the hon. member for South Oxford, I was reminded of what Sydney Smith told the Yankees of his day, that they should avoid superlatives. Everything with them was enormous. And the hon. gentlemen told us that, if we had unrestricted reciprocity, our trade with the United States in ten years would amount to $300,000,000.

An hon. MEMBER. He said $500,000,000.

Mr. DAVIN. He said $500,000,000, did he? Oh, a couple of hundred millions are nothing to the hon. member. He does not give us the least ground for believing him when he says that. He merely makes the statement, just as it is enough for the ex-Finance Minister to make assertions. I read his speech at Ingersoll, I have it here, and in fact it would have saved the reporters a lot a trouble if, instead of taking down his speech the other night, they had cut out of the newspaper the speech delivered at Ingersoll and set it up, because it was the old Ingersoll speech over again. I have it here, and the ex-Finance Minister, whose demeanor shows how modest a man he is, thinks it is enough for him to say that there would be an enormous development, an extraordinary development of trade if this were done, and his first lieutenant in this matter takes the same course, and gives us on his ipse dixit the wonderful progress that would be made. Now, he instanced the case of eggs. I will show him that broken eggs are not what they are cracked up to be. Now, he says that under free trade between us and the United States, there would be an enormous expansion. That is what his leader says in this matter, too, although on a priori ground, it can be demonstrated that such a thing could not be. Suppose I take the market of the United States as represented by 100. He says you would have the market of 60 millions. What does that mean? It would be a market of 60 millions plus the 5 millions in Canada. The size of a market is relative to the number of people who trade in it. If you have a market, say, of 100, and let there be ten persons coming to that market, of equal energy and equal push, there is one-tenth of the market for one of them, and therefore the size of the market is not a relative thing. But when the hon. gentleman says that we would have a market of 60 millions, and that our trade would go on with unlimited expansion, does he suppose that the energy of the people of the United States is to lie in abeyance during that time? Does he suppose that they are not going to come into our market? The honorable gentleman has used a most fallacious argument in this connection. He has taken the enormous product of the United States in one or two particulars, and he says: Look at what we send them, or look at what we import. Do you suppose that is going to be a matter of any importance to people who export and import so much? There he falls into the fallacy of regarding the people of the United States as a single person, he falls into the fallacy of attributing to the various minds that make up the trading community of the United States, a sentiment that would come into the mind of a single man if he were exporting or importing. To that single man his proportion of the trade of Canada would be a very small thing. The truth is that the markets of the United States, the merchants of the United States are made up of units, all of them looking where they can make a dollar, where they can plant a dollar which will produce the most profit to them. Of course, instead of their disregarding the Canadian market, we find gentlemen who are advocating this thing in Congress, pointing out the value of our market, pointing out that the result would be that from Halifax to Vancouver, in every shop and every store, they would see United States goods and United States machines. And so, Sir, there is the same fallacy in supposing that because one article may have made progress under free trade, every article will do so. It so happens that they need our eggs. I do not think they would need a large amount of our machinery, or a large amount of our furniture. I do not think they would need a large amount of those things which they export in 10's and 50's of millions. But let us take the egg. The hon. gentleman declares that in twelve years we would have a trade worth 300 millions under free trade; I ask his attention to what took place in regard to eggs. In 1833, under free trade, we exported 13,413,744 dozens of eggs, to the tune of $2,251,304, or 17 cents a dozen. In 1886 we exported 12,708,883 dozens of eggs, to the tune of $1,728,082, or a decrease in those three years of over half a million dollars. So you see that the reasoning of the hon. gentleman does not go down to facts. He contents himself with saying: Oh, there will be an immense expansion; there will be an immense trade. He says: Look at eggs. We do look at eggs, and they do not bear out what he says. I do not know what the eggs were that we exported, but I know that the eggs of the hon. member for North Norfolk are cracked; at all events I have cracked them now. Now, Sir, on this occasion the hon. gentleman broke out into a tirade against combines in Canada. I hope the committee that my hon. friend has moved for will lead to the suppression of this evil, because combines are illegal on the part of traders or manufacturers with a view to keeping up the price of an article. I have heard of such things in Canada, and I hope that if there are such they will be dealt with vigorously and put down. But I would ask my hon. friend. Are there no combines in the United States? Why, it is part and parcel of the same system he has pursued. Everything is couleur de rose in the United States, there is nothing wrong in the United States. Although the hon. gentleman is a member of the Parliament of Canada, and aspires to be a Minister, I am glad to see that the sentiment of patriotism is so fervent within him that he can see nothing wrong in that great land. But he cannot expect us to look at things in that light. We are practical men here who must not look at things from the point of view of sentiment. We must look at them with close logic, with the responsibilities that attach to our position as members of Parliament, and such unsubstantial rhetoric as we have had from those hon. gentlemen on this question, cannot be allowed to weigh with us, and I know it will not weigh with the country. Then he says this new scheme will bring back part of the millions of Canadians. Why does the hon. gentleman suppose if you had unrestricted reciprocity, that the merchant who is established in Chicago, or the professional man who is established in Chicago, or New York, or the Western States, the farmer who has built there his house, the mechanic who has gone there—does any man suppose, does the hon. gentleman himself suppose, if he will be candid with me, that any portion of these 1,700,000, some of them Canadians, others, I believe the sons of Canadians, would come back to Canada? Why, it is a most absurd idea. Sir, I do not consider that we should perpetually mourn over the fact that the natural restlessness and the natural ambition of the races from which we spring, should assert itself, and should lead to an occasional migration to the States. I have explained, however, that the conditions which led to any large migration, no longer exist. Then he asked the question, whether unrestricted reciprocity would injure our manufactures. He says: I admit it would injure some lines of business. That itself is a very serious matter. The hon. gentleman admits that the proposal he makes here, which neither the hon. member for South Oxford nor the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) have shown will confer the least benefit on Canada, for they have only said it will do this or the other, but they have not given us any solid ground on which to rest—will do serious injury to certain branches of business. That is a very extraordinary statement. But the hon. member for South Oxford said it would be advantageous to the majority. There is sitting near him an hon. member who is well acquainted with the trade of Canada, and he knows well that what I am going to say is true. He is perfectly familiar with the fact that when a manufacturer or merchant, but especially a manufacturer, is competing with a rival in business, two cents a ton is a very important matter, especially when he is engaged in a struggle with a new competitor. We will suppose the line between the two countries wiped out, and that our manufacturers are face to face with the manufacturers of the United States, and that the American manufacturers are coming in here to seize and capture our market, then those manufacturers will do what a witness before a Parliamentary Committee of the House of Commons stated that English manufacturers had done, sell at an enormous loss in order to capture the market, and, when they have crushed out competition, recoup themselves by selling goods at any prices they like. The hon. gentleman knows that under those circumstances a few cents a ton is an important matter. We suppose that our manufacturers are face to face with this market of sixty millions and they got into it. What do they find? They find that they have a longer haul than the American manufacturers in order to reach the markets, a difference of two hundred or three hundred miles as the case may be; but supposing it is only fifty miles, we in the west know what a difference is made even by that distance. Not only so, but the Canadian manufacturers will be utterly alone there, and would have to compete with old established rivals and make a character for themselves. They would be handicapped from the word go, and would have none or very little chance with their rivals—one or two might succeed—but the American manufacturers, owing to their greater wealth, more highly organised industries, and the greater perfection of their "combines"—for they are not putting them down there as we are doing here—would be able to stalk through our Canadian markets. But in this connection I really must remind my hon. friend of a phrase that he used in a speech which I read with great interest—"that protected-to-death country, the United States." How very inconsistent it is that we should be asked to go into that protected-to-death country by free traders, the men who once followed the Hon. George Brown, who was once considered the Bright of Canada, who thought that the sun rose only over Manchester—that those men and the followers of Hon. Edward Blake should actually want Canada to go into that protected-to-death country. When speaking of paying the duty I should have mentioned another fact. If a citizen of Canada pays heavy taxation now, what would he have to pay if this country joined the United States, because by the same parity of reasoning you have to put on the prices, whether the system of the hon. member for South Oxford or that of the hon. member for Norfolk was adopted, on the principle of the reasoning followed, that if you take goods to the United States you have to add the duty in the United States port of entry. So an unfortunate Canadian would be taxed a great deal more under this régime than the hon. gentleman would feign introduce; but happily it is out of the question. The hon. member dwelt on the great advantages we would possess if his propositions were carried out. He actually said that we could supply the whole sixty-five millions of people with canned fish, although they have large canned fish factories of their own. I am afraid we would not drive them out of that market. When asked the question as to whether we would not be brought into competition with such manufactures as I have described, the hon. gentleman in order to get rid of it made a comparison, the fallacy of which I will show. He compared Ohio, Indiana and California and some other States in regard to manufacturing progress. How is that progress in regard to manufactures made there? Any man who knows anything about those States and Territories is aware that rich capitalists go in there from the Eastern States and invest large sums, build great factories, and in those cases a large proportion of the profits goes to the Eastern States. That is the way it is done, and we hope as Canadians that the same thing or something like it will take place here. But give us time—there is no need for such tremendous hurry. We will do the same thing in Canada, and indeed we have already started in the same way. In fact people are going into the North-West not only from the Eastern Provinces but from England, France and Germany. Then the hon. gentleman dealt with the objections that might be raised to the proposition. The first objection to which he referred was that of loyalty, and he declared that he was as loyal as any one, but his loyalty was to Canada. I will say here that there is no man living whose heart beats with more pride than does mine in regard to the British flag; but my first duty is to Canada too, the first duty of all of us is to Canada, and it is because that is our first duty that we supported a protective policy. If we were thinking more of England than of Canada we would never have imposed protective duties because we knew there were a great number of people in England who did not approve that policy, who even resented the tariff we adopted. But the hon. gentleman talks much about loyalty. I have here a speech delivered by the ex-Finance Minister at Ingersoll, and in it he speaks of the subject of loyalty in a very strong manner. He says, that for his part England does not take much interest in Canada and he does not see why we should trouble ourselves so very much about England. Let me say about this question of loyalty that it is not merely a sentiment, and I hope there is not a man in this House that would sneer at sentiment—but it is a most practical thing, this our loyalty to England. If we were to make such a treaty as those gentlemen would have us make with the United States what would happen? It would have to be made by Congress according to the constitution of the United States, for the third power given under the clause of the constitution deals with this and declares that only Congress can regulate such a matter. Congress cannot merely inaugurate but it can modify a treaty, and as Mr. Hitt the other day said: "If we do not like a treaty or if we find it act unfairly we can change it." What is the meaning of "change it?" Does it not mean to go back on it after probably doing any amount of damage to Canada? and after we had overturned a system under which we are prospering? The people of the United States would put the interpretation of power upon any arrangement we would make with them, and then, Sir, we would not be in the position that we are to-day. When the hon. member for Cumberland and the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain went down to Washington if they made a treaty binding Canada what would we feel in regard to it? Why, we know well, that in regard to any instrument that the United States authorities had put their seals to, and that the plenipotentiaries representing Canada and England had put their seals to also, that the lion of England would look on and see that it was observed. Then, Sir, we would find that loyalty was a practical thing.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes, "hear, hear." That lion is as powerful and as strong as ever it was and in any arrangement that we may make, as long as we are true to our position as members of a great Empire, we have the power of England to see that we are not handicapped and that our agreement is going to be carried out by the other side. But, Sir, suppose the agreement that the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) is made, and that we are to have a reciprocity treaty arranged to suit the Americans in the respect as pointed out by my hon. friend's plan that we ought to have duties of our own on the seaboard. Suppose that happens, what will be the result? We have admitted the United States manufacturers free, we have discriminated against England, we have discriminated against our fellow colonists of the Empire and we have discriminated against the whole world in favor of the United States, and then if the United States after a few years should say to us: "I see you have the advantage"—as I admit we ought to have the advantages in distinction from the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright's) plan—"You must put up your tariff to the same height as ours." We may say: "This is not in the agreement;" but they will tell us: "Congress is going to take that course and you will have to follow suit." And suppose Congress does insist, can we go to England and ask her to help us to make the people of America carry out the agreement? Would not England say: "You have repudiated me, you have discriminated against me, how can you ask me to help you to do this thing?" We then would be abandoned and by either the arrangement which the member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) or the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) proposes, we would put ourselves in chancery and we would be like the rabbit in the wild cat's paw. Is that a position that my French-Canadian friends or the other members of this House would wish to place themselves in? I have before me the speech of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) at Ingersoll. I once spoke in Ingersoll and I know what a hot bed of liberalism it is, but I notice that in all that speech where he deals with this question completely and where he lays down what the possibilities would be he does not receive a single cheer. I state here that I do not believe that on this question the Reform party of Canada will follow the hon. gentlemen opposite in the disloyal course they are taking.

Some hon. GENTLEMEN. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. Well the next election will tell you as the bye-elections have told you about commercial union. What is the difference between commercial union and unrestricted reciprocity: very little indeed unless it is the difference between tweedle-dum and tweedle-dee. The hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) goes from the disloyal cry to annexation and he does not think his policy would lead to annexation, but in speaking at Ingersoll his leader said, speaking on the danger of annexation: "There is a risk I cannot overlook, but it is a choice of risks and our present position is anything but one of stable equilibrium." The hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) says: That those who say it would bring about annexation only admit that annexation would be a very fine thing, and that having got so much of reciprocity we then would be most anxious to go in for annexation." Sir, I have shown you that if we went in for unrestricted reciprocity we would be in such a position that the wolf would be constantly complaining that the lamb trouble the stream. Any one who has given attention to political economy knows that you cannot in regard to any article of import or export make a tariff that can last for five, or four, or two years even. In anything so delicate as the exchanges between countries, the most skilful arrangement of tariff will be close and clumsy, and, therefore, we never can be certain that changes may not have to be made. If we once took this step which is proposed we would simply be helpless in the hands of Americans. What would we have to do under such circumstances? Why, Sir, every year we would have to send delegates to Washington to wait in the lobbies there to get their orders to bring back to this House The Parliament of Canada, which is now as free as any Parliament that exists in the world, and the next Parliament in importance as it is of English-speaking men to the Parliament which meets at Westminster, that Parliament which has looked forward to such great things from this country, would have to send down its delegates to the lobbies and treat with fair and unfair lobbyists until the senators had decided what our fate was. Very naturally, if this were the case, we would say: "Let us get rid of this, anything is better than this state of things," and we would be ready to go in for annexation. Then about the

Mr. DAVIN.

"better terms" which my friend from Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) said some Conservatives expected some years hence. I do not think I need deal with that. No Conservative, I fancy, looks forward in that way, and if he does he would not be worthy of the name of a Conservative, and not much worthy of the name of a Canadian either. The hon. gentleman then dwelt with the question of revenue and I am bound to say that he dealt with it in a very gingerly manner. He pointed out that we would lose right off over $7,000,000 under the arrangement proposed by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) both tariffs being the same. And if it happened as Mr. Blake said it should be that we would get all our imports from the States and send our exports there, where would our revenue be? We should have to go in for direct taxation, which the hon. gentleman says he does not fear. Well, as the hon. Minister of the Interior pointed out, there is no taxation the incidence of which is so unfair. An income tax is very unfairly collected, it depends so much on the honesty of the men on whom it is imposed. The hon. gentleman says he does not fear it, but I venture to say the people of the country will. He talked about the danger to our shipping. Why, Sir, of course our shipping would disappear, if we got all or the bulk of our imports from the United States. Imports and exports have to pretty nearly balance each other; you have to pay for imports with exports, and if we are going to trade with the United States, all our business would have to be done over lines of railway and not in ships, and so our shipping would disappear. Then, Sir, he alluded to Imperial Federation. Well, I do not think Imperial Federation is up here. If it were, one might be inclined to say something on it; but I have no desire to go out of the record. Now, Sir, I will call the attention of the House to a view of this question that has not yet been touched on. It is admitted by the hon. member for South Oxford and the hon. member for North Norfolk, that there would be a danger of annexation. Now, Sir, I have never been afraid of annexation, for this reason, that I know very well that the United States have no desire to commit the blunder of forcibly attempting to annex the people of Canada. In the first place, they would fail; and in the next place, if they succeeded they would have a very unmanageable Ireland on their hands, and other elements of discord and disruption that are working in their midst at the present moment, would make themselves felt. Now, Sir, there is an important question that bears on this subject. If a sensible man were going to make a new departure, he would ask himself, is it likely to have the element of permanence? Is it sure, Sir? Can we be certain that the future of the United States is assured? Are there no clouds upon the horizon? Prof. Gillian and Judge Tourgée have written books showing the enormous growth of the black population of the South. They have shown that there are now eight black republics on the hands of the United States, where the blacks are in a majority. They have shown that the negroes are increasing at a ratio far in excess of the increase of the whites from immigration and from natural increase, and Judge Tourgée calculates that in 1900, the very period at which the imagination of my hon. friend the member for North Norfolk fired, the blacks will actually outnumber the whites in the United States.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. DAVIN. Hon. gentlemen may laugh and say "oh" to that; but if they will take the trouble to read those books, written by the first men in the United States, and if they will give so humble and so illiterate a person as myself some credit for appreciating an argument of the kind, it will probably be as creditable to their intelligence as any utterances of that sort that they may indulge in. I say, Sir, under those circumstances, with an element in the United States calculated to give rise to disturbance, an element no counterpart of which exists in Canada, with the black population increasing at a ratio that menaces the future of the Republic, it would be a most monstrous thing on the part of Canada to throw in her lot with the United States. And, Sir, let us make no concealment about this. The real issue, the issue underneath this movement, the important issue, is: Shall we take a step that will land Canada into the United States and make this country part and parcel of it? There is not a man of any reflection in the country who does not know that that is the real issue, and the reason hon. gentlemen are so intent on saying that that is not the issue is because they know that the young men of Canada—aye, and the old men too—the men of the Reform party—the greater part of them, no less than those of the Conservative party, for there are 7,000 of them that have not bowed the knee to Baal—are loyal to Canada and have faith in Canada's future. When I read originally the speeches made by my friend Mr. Goldwin Smith, by Mr. Wiman, by my friend the Hon. Wm. Macdougall, about all that this thing would do for Canada, I was amazed; and when I heard the hon. member for South Oxford the other night dilate on the enormous progress, the vast expansion, that would take place if his policy were carried out, it reminded me of one of those blood-curdling incidents of the old German ballads, where we see a young maid dressed in bridal robes, full of hope, full of life and splendor and joy, but the bridegroom proves to be a skeleton, and the marriage couch the cold earth. These gentlemen come and talk to Canada to this young nation, of untold wealth, of unmeasured prosperity, of delusive progress, of intoxicating dreams; and what do they ask her to do in order to attain all this? To shiver her solid existing prosperity—to realise aggrandisement by extinction—to live a tuller life by walking into her tomb. But, Sir, I tell these preposterous propagandists of a contemptible pessimism, who whine out that Canada is doomed

"The grave's not dug where traitor hands shall lay In fearful haste her murdered corse away."

No, Sir, Canada's future is secure. She is still young; but the day of maturity is at hand; and centuries hence, when the historian shall have marked with a pen of indelible scorn the character of this movement, her heart will be strong, her life vigorous, she will go forward in ever-expanding progress, beauty's ensign purple on her lips and on her cheek, and the day remote beyond human ken "when death's pale flag will be advanced there."

Mr. LAVERGNE. Mr. Speaker, this is certainly the most important question that has been discussed in this Parliament since Confederation, and it would be presumption on my part to attempt to add any arguments in support of reciprocity after the eloquent and elaborate speeches which we have had the pleasure of hearing from several members of this House. But, Sir, the reasons which have been urged in support of the motion of the hon. member for South Oxford apply so forcibly to the Province of Quebec that I think many voices should be heard from that quarter. It is thought in certain sections of the country that the Province of Quebec did not take any interest in that matter. Even the earliest advocate of reciprocity wrote a pamphlet in which he asserted that the present attitude of the Province of Quebec is one of isolation, and went on to say that if isolation in commerce would make a people great, then the destiny of the Province of Quebec, in her present frame of mind, was one of superlative greatness. I must say at once that this opinion is entirely incorrect. It was no doubt asserted in good faith, and for that very reason it becomes the more necessary to repudiate it as damaging to the cause of reciprocity as well as to the Province of Quebec. In no class of the people there, does any such desire of isolation exist, either politically or commercially. A friend of mine was telling me some time ago that he would favor political annexation to the United States, because he felt himself lost in the Province of Quebec among the French Canadians. I can say this for my countrymen, that they do not think they are lost in Canada; yet, although they are surrounded by an English population, if it were a bad thing to be so surrounded, they would not think it much worse whether the surrounding people were called American or British, and they would consider it a great blessing if a close relation of some kind were effected with the United States which would bring prosperity to their homes. I do not say this to express any desire to sever our political connection with Great Britain. I am an admirer of British rule. I do not think we could have a better form of government than the one we now enjoy. One single reform would make that Government a model one, and that reform would be commercial independence. If we had commercial independence, we would have nothing to envy anybody. Yet we must not be blind to the truth. We must see things as they are. The time when the very name of the United States was a bugbear in some parts of the Province of Quebec has gone by. At that time it was thought a sin to think of closer relations with our neighbors, but since then the sinners have become so numerous that we have had to strike that sin off our list. There is not perhaps one family out of ten in French Canada, which has not one or more of its members now residing in the United States, and I can say without exaggeration that there is nearly one-third of the whole French-Canadian population now residing in the United States, some permanently and some temporarily. These people know well all the advantages that would be derived from closer relations with that country. It is there they go for money when they are penniless. It is with American money they pay off the mortgages on their farms, and I can say this, that there has been in some parts of the Eastern townships of Quebec so much money sent by Canadians from the neighboring Republic that it reduced the rate of interest. Twelve or 15 years ago, it was a common thing to see money lent at 10 or 12 per cent. on mortgages. Now 8 per cent. is a very heavy rate. I must also say that in some of these localities the agricultural interest is in such a state of depression, particularly in places where the farms are not very good that one-half of the farms would have been abandoned by this, if the United States were not there as a place of reserve in case of need. Under these conditions, it is impossible that the Province of Quebec should have any desire to remain isolated from the other Provinces. On the contrary, that province is quite ready to help in any movement tending to improve its condition, and in support of this statement I might mention, without looking further back than a few months ago, that at the Provincial Conference held in Quebec and, of which the idea started from Quebec, unrestricted reciprocity with the United States was recommended by the representatives of the Quebec Government as well as by the leading men of most of the other Provinces. (Now, before speaking of the advantages which would result from reciprocity, I cannot help answering one great objection which is made against that policy. It is said by the adversaries of reciprocity that it will discriminate unfairly against Great Britain. I cannot, for one moment, admit this. I am sure that if we had that reciprocity, it would stimulate our business to such an extent that before many years we would do far more business with Great Britain than we do now. Yet supposing that assertion be true, we can fairly reply that England does not discriminate in our favor. England treats us just as she treats every nation on the face of the earth, and it would not be in her interest to discriminate in our favor. In support of this proposition, we might well use the argument which has been used by the First Minister, when discussing a policy which was improperly called the National Policy. As a self-governing people, he said, we have a right to consult our own interests first.

This argument will be conclusive of itself, but there are many illustrations of its force. Let us recollect some of the events in the past, and we will see that the motive power of politics in this country has always been self interests. We, in Quebec, are not in the same position as the other Provinces of Confederation, and I speak more from the Quebec point of view than from the general point of view. In 1760, when Canada was conquered by England, was it through a motive of love, was it through any kindly feeling that Canada was taken away from French domination and made an English colony? Surely it was then self interest that dictated England's policy. After that we were governed several years by military rule. Surely that rule was not inflicted on us through a motive of justice, but purely through self interest. Whether rightly or wrongly, it was thought better to treat in that way the conquered. I do not complain of that, but I say it tends to prove my theory. After that again, in 1864, when the standard of rebellion was raised among our neighbors, England thought fit to deal with us more fairly, and we were then granted the British North America Act. We were given back our French civil law, and we were exempted from the test oath. It was surely again interest that dictated such a policy. It was the fear of seeing us join the rebellion. It might be said that in our history there are some exceptions, but those exceptions will only confirm the rule. At the same time, when the twelve States sent delegates to their first Congress in Philadelphia, what was their first move? They passed resolutions remonstrating with the Imperial Government for the charter which had been granted to this country. It was not in their interest that they did that, and it was soon after proved, and they soon afterwards understood it themselves. A very little word thoughtlessly spoken prevented us from joining them. Soon after, they voted three addresses, one to the King and one to the people of Great Britain justifying the action they had taken, and a third to the Canadians. In that address they expressed very different views than those contained in their resolutions. They offered us as many privileges and advantages as has been granted us by England, and in that they acted according to their interest, but it was too late. I might say that all and every important event of our history will prove that the motive power of politics in this country has always been interest. We have fought for years for rights which have been admitted to be just and legitimate. We have fought for British rights and they were granted to us. England yielded to our just demand when she thought it was her interest to do so, when it was seen that the game was a very expensive one. I do not say those things to recriminate. I do not expect that we would have been treated any better by any other nation on the face of the globe, but I say that this theory is a common axiom of common sense. I admit that for fifty years we have been most fairly treated. We have enjoyed great freedom, and under no other flag than the British flag would we have been better treated, and I do not deny that we owe gratitude to England, but in a case of interest like this, our debt of gratitude is not so enormous that we should sacrifice our own interest, not even for England but for a certain number of her manufactures. It is a very strange argument to hear the hon. gentlemen on the other side not saying that reciprocity would be bad for Canada, but that it would be bad for England. It appears that we are very rich, and that we must do this for the sake of poor England. As I have heard here in this House, not only loyalty but charity begins at home. Now, before enumerating some of the advantages which I think would result from reciprocity, I think I should answer a few of the other objections which have been made to the motion presented by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). The hon. gentleman who preceded me began his brilliant address by a long citation from one Mr. Ritchie of Ohio, and that Mr. Ritchie, it appears, knows our country very well. He made a very brilliant exposition of our wealth, of our natural resources, of our mines, our beautiful rivers, in fact, of all our natural wealth he made the most brilliant picture; but I would have been most happy to hear that citation continued up to the end, to hear the conclusion of that citation, and I would have been very much surprised if Mr. Ritchie did not conclude that this immense wealth, these immense resources wanted to be developed, and that the best way of developing these immense resources was by the way of reciprocity or commercial union. There can be no doubt that this gentleman made this brilliant exposition with an end and with a desire, and what desire could it have been if not a desire of participating in those immense resources. Now, we are told, that we are a young country. I will admit that, as far as growth is concerned, we are a very young country, but as far as age is concerned, we are not so much younger than the country adjacent to us. The hon. gentleman had the advantage of being born in a country far more important than this, and perhaps we have over him the advantage of knowing the history of this country a little further back, and, if I have been well taught, and I think I have been correctly taught in that fact, I think this country was settled over three hundred years ago and not one hundred years ago. We have been also told that it is not true that we pay duty on all importations and pay duty on all exportations, and the proof in support of that is that it is against all the principles of political economy. I could not see any conclusions arrived at by the hon. gentleman. Yet, if the hon. gentleman was here, I would relate to him something which occurred in my county, and to my personal knowledge. One of my present constituents, in 1878, was a great Conservative, a great admirer of the Conservative policy, and endorsed protection. That man happened to be a farmer and a cattle dealer. He endorsed that policy, and made a great deal of noise in his parish, and perhaps he made conquests of electors for his party. In 1882, after having driven his cattle to the United States at different times, he began to think that policy was not as sound as he thought at the beginning. He began to find out and was able to make out who it was that was paying the duty. In 1882 he voted, but he did not brag any more. He did not say anything. In 1885 there was a local election in that county, and mixing up both Governments, holding both Administrations, which were both Conservative, responsible for their faults, he did not vote at all. Then he began to understand that it was the farmers who were paying the duty on the cattle he was driving to the United States. In 1887 he was one of my strong supporters. I will not follow the hon. gentleman on all the grounds he has gone through. He has taken us from the Hudson Bay to the Gulf of Mexico. Certainly he has displayed a vast amount of knowledge, and I can say that I have admired his brilliant expositions, but owing to my own deficiency, owing, perhaps, to my not understanding his language, which is not my own, I could not see the bearing of all he said. Now, I have heard an hon. member of this House speak of inconsistency. Although the hon. gentleman for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) is not present at this moment, I wish to remark that citing speeches made ten or fifteen years ago are no great answer to serious arguments. If we were to argue on that line, I would have to ask the hon. member if he always held the same opinions he does now of the administration of the right hon. gentleman. Now, Sir, it has been said that we are in a very prosperous condition, and, therefore, we do not need a change. In support of that argument we have had extracts read from a speech of the Hon. George Brown, made ten or fifteen years ago. I do not say that I share the opinions of that gentleman at that time, but I say that speeches made ten or fifteen years ago are no answer to arguments made to-day. Now, I come to the real point at issue—would it be to our interest to have reciprocity? Perhaps it has been thought that I was not friendly towards England and was aiming at some change in our political position, in the beginning of my remarks. That was far from my object. I sincerely believe that if we wished for a political change in this country, we could find no better mode of bringing it about than by maintaining our present trade relations with the United States. It is to be remembered that in the Province of Quebec, French-Canadians do not hold the same sentiments of attachment to England as English-Canadians. We all admit that we owe a debt of gratitude to England, but we know very well that in this question there is not the same feeling in the Province of Quebec as may exist in the other Provinces. If our present trade relations continue for 25 years, not only will one-third of our population be found in the States, as at present, but the majority will be there. There will be a temptation for them who are not of a British origin, who do not make such a great difference between Americans and Englishmen, there would be a temptation for them to say that they would like as well to have Washington for their headquarters as London. Would it not be a temptation for them to say that they saw more convenience, and, perhaps, more advantage, in having their metropolis at Washington than across the ocean? I do not say that we have any such desire, I do not say that we even think of annexation, but I say that if the present situation continues for a long time, certainly there will be temptation toward a political change. If we are true patriots, if we desire the Provinces to remain united, we should adopt some means to prevent the disintegration of this Dominion. I say, Sir, that the best means of obtaining such a result is to improve our trade relations by commercial reciprocity with the United States. Certainly we cannot say that the National Policy has been a success in this country; I cannot say it has been a success in the Province of Quebec. In the city of Montreal, perhaps, some new industries have been established, and perhaps in a few other places; but I would not say that even in the city of Quebec the manufacturing industries have been promoted by protection. There are natural industries in the city of Quebec that live by themselves, they are established on solid foundations, and reciprocity would not affect them in any way. There are also, perhaps, a few manufactures in the city of St. Hyacinthe, and I know that my hon. friend who represents that county will support the motion of the hon. member for South Oxford. But, Sir, where are the manufactures in the rural constituencies of the Province of Quebec. When that policy was inaugurated we were promised that it would not only benefit Montreal, that it would not only benefit three or four cities in the Province of Quebec, but it was to benefit the whole Province. Where is the increase of population? Where is the decrease in the immigration of our countrymen? There is none. Where are the promised industries in the rural constituencies? There are none. I say the situation is worse than it was ten years ago. The people naturally look for a change in order to better their actual position. This agitation was commenced in the Province of Ontario, and it has not been carried to the same extent in Quebec. Yet the echoes of that agitation have reached us, it has reached all the Canadian homes, it has reached all the fathers who have seen more than half of their families leaving their home for the neighboring Republic. I have visited a certain number of localities in my constituency, and when I have spoken of reciprocity, I have pleased the people immensely. They recollect the prosperity we enjoyed when we had a partial measure of reciprocity before. They know that reciprocity means about 20 per cent. increase in the value of their products; they know that if they have horses, cattle, oats, potatoes, poultry, hay, lumber, to sell, they will get for all these articles at least 20 per cent. more. They know it from experience. Now, Sir, it is said that farmers do not pay anything of that taxation in the way of duty. I think it is easy to show that they pay an enormous taxation. I will only give an example on that point. I will take the counties near the St. Lawrence River—Champlain, Montmagny, Berthier and Laprairie—in which counties the people produce a large quantity of hay. It is not unusual for some farmers to sell as much as 100 tons of hay in a year. Many of the farmers in the Province of Quebec have sold their hay in the United States, in fact it may be said that the hay of the Province generally goes to the States. A farmer who ships a hundred tons of hay has to pay a duty of $200. If a farmer, sends a horse there worth $100 he has to pay $20; on $200 worth of cattle he is compelled to pay $40. If he sells three hundred bushels of peas, which is not an excessive quantity, the duty will amount to $45. Let me say here that the farmers understand as to who pays the duty. I will not say more on the point, except that I am satisfied that a farmer in comfortable position will pay $300 a year duties on products shipped to the United States. Our geographical position also impells us to the adoption of this policy. Grant that our facilities of commerce are equal to the demand, although I do not think that they are at the present time, for neither the Canadian Pacific Railway nor the Intercolonial answer the demands of commerce, the people of the Maritime Provinces could not trade with any advantage with the people of the North West or British Columbia, and not even with the people of Ontario. I might go further, and say that although there is plenty of flour to be purchased in Ontario, yet in spite of the tariff wall erected, the Province of Quebec, not further back than 1886, brought over $100,000 worth of flour in the United States, paying a duty of $54,000. On some occasions Quebec has not been able to raise sufficient breadstuffs for her people, and on those occasions she has found it more advantageous to deal with the States than with the neighboring Province of Ontario. Is it not, moreover, a fact that Ontario buys a large quantity of coal from the State of Pennsylvania? It will be unnecessary for me to discuss at length the interests of the fishermen in this question, for they have able advocates here; yet I may say that the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces find it more advantageous to deal with the New England States, and the Americans are their best customers even in spite of a tariff of 30 per cent. In regard to the lumber interest, we have heard the statement of gentlemen of experience and who are engaged in that business, and while it will be needless for me to go over the ground again, I may remark that the farmers of Quebec are highly interested because they have yet large tracts of forest, and when they clear their lands they have to destroy good timber, and if they could obtain a fair return for the timber they would be largely benefited. The adoption of such a policy as is proposed might, perhaps, be advantageous to the manufacturers of Montreal and perhaps to two or three small places, but the majority of the people, the great bulk of the people, would derive immense benefit from such a policy. It appears at the present time as if this country is to be administered for the benefit of a small minority of its inhabitants. Everybody will admit that if the rural portion of the country were in a prosperous condition, if the farmers were prosperous, the laborers and mechanics who live among them would also be prosperous; and if all those classes were prosperous, certainly the country merchants would be prosperous, and if they were prosperous surely the city and wholesale merchants would also be prosperous. Thus the whole country would immensely benefit by the introduction of such a policy. I am satisfied that the objections made to this proposition will disappear if the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government choose to advocate such a measure, and not one out of 25 of his supporters would fail to follow him, in fact they would all fall into line very quickly. The Premier would earn the gratitude of almost the whole people of Canada if he were to confer such a boon on this country. I go further, and say that in regard to political power—and we are not interested in saying this—if the hon. gentleman would advocate that cause and carried it to a successful conclusion he would secure power for himself and his friends for the remainder of his life, which I hope will be a long one. But even supposing it had not that result, but that his friends and supporters who are the manufacturers and monopolists of the country should turn against him and forget past favors, suppose that they should not support him any longer, which is most improbable and almost impossible, nevertheless the carrying of such a policy to a successful conclusion would be a glorious ending to his career. The hon. gentleman would certainly acquire a name and fame unequalled in this country. And, Sir, he would follow an example which he need not disdain. He would follow the example of another Tory—an English Tory—whose name is cherished in the old country, would follow the example of Sir Robert Peel. When the corn laws were abolished in 1846 by the Imperial Parliament Sir Robert Peel uttered some memorable words, and the right hon. gentleman would have a right to say as Sir Robert Peel said at that time in the words which I will cite:

"I shall leave a name execrated I know by every monopolist who will maintain protection for his own individual benefit, but it may be that I shall leave a name sometimes breathed with expressions of good will in the homes of those whose lot it is to labor and to earn their daily bread by the sweat of their brow; when they shall recruit their exhausted strength with abundance of unprotected food, the sweeter, because it is in no manner leavened by sense of injustice."

Those noble words have not found any echo on the Treasury benches of this House for ten years, yet, Sir, it is better late than never. Now, Sir, I will answer to another objection which is made. It is said, and truly said, that we cannot make that treaty alone. It is said that we have to obtain the consent of the other contracting party, but I may say this that there are in the neighboring country some advocates of this proposition, and that we should not for a moment be discouraged if we meet with some difficulties, because we are assured that this cause which we now advocate will be beneficial to both countries and it ought to carry victory in the end. If we do not succeed as soon as we would like to yet we will triumph in the end if we are like the men who entered the Corn Law League in England. If we work with patriotism for the good of this country, if we work with the same energy as men like the Cobdens, the Brights, the Villiers and others have worked when they decided they would have free trade in England; if we work as those men did we are sure to carry victory, and, Sir, if we do not carry victory to-day, and if our active efforts result only in a simple expression of opinion, yet it will be a step—a great step—in the right direction.

Mr. McNEILL moved the adjournment of the debate.

Vol. XX.

Ottawa, Monday, March 19, 1888.

No. 13.

NOTICE TO MEMBERS.

Necessary corrections to Members' Speeches, for the bound edition, must be forwarded to the Debates Office within twenty-four hours after the printed copies of the speeches have been circulated, as after that time the contractors may print the copies for the bound edition without further delay.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 19th March, 1888.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

NEW MEMBER.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the House that he had received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery a certificate of the election and return of Henry Corby, Esq., for the Electoral District of the West Riding of the County of Hastings.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 46) to amend the Acts relating to the Manitoba and North-Western Railway Company of Canada.—(Mr. Scarth.)

FOOD ADULTERATION ACT.

Mr. COSTIGAN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 47) to amend the Adulteration Act, chapter one hundred and seven of the Revised Statutes of Canada. He said: This alteration is chiefly in consequence of a ruling by Judge Dugas, of Montreal, that baking powder is not an article of food. Some baking powders are positively injurious, and prosecutions to prevent their sale cannot be successful without this amendment. It would also enable samples to be taken in wholesale stores of chicory, pepper dust, and other adulterants, and perhaps lead to preventing their sale. The object of this amendment is to qualify as analysts before the courts the members of the examining board who are appointed by the Government to examine as to the qualifications of applicants for the position of public analysts. The present examiners are Dr. Girdwood, Professor Marsan and the Chief Analyst, and it seems only reasonable that their position should in no respect be inferior to that of the candidates who may pass their examination. The assistants to the chief analyst appointed by the Government must undergo the same examination as the public analysts, and they are equally well qualified to appear in court and give evidence. This amendment authorises Council to appoint special collectors in addition to those indicated by the Act. The latter being generally resident where the samples are collected, are well known to vendors of food, &c., in the same place, and may not succeed in getting fair samples of the goods actually sold. Should Council appoint special inspectors they would travel over such a wide area that they would not be readily recognisable. This alteration is for the purpose of effecting a division of labor in examining the various samples collected; for as drugs and fertilisers are so numerous and varied that it is impossible for any one analyst to keep himself informed regarding the composition and adulterations of all of them, and to be thoroughly practised and skilful in their examination. New methods for this are being continually proposed and adopted, and new literature is continually being published regarding the various branches. If it were made possible for each analyst to confine his reading, his analyses and researches to one department of the science, he would become much more skilful and experienced in it than his fellows, and his word would have the greater value. There are eight public analysts, besides the chief analyst and his two assistants. This staff might be made much more efficient by each member of it having his attention confined to the examination of only a certain class of the substances referred to in the Act, and it is to make this possible that the amendment has been framed. There are many substances liable to adulteration which are not included under foods, drugs and fertilisers. Soap, soda and white lead may be mentioned as instances of such articles which might be subjected to inspection as soon as any Order in Council issued to that effect.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PROCEDURE IN CRIMINAL CASES.

Mr. THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 48) further to amend the law respecting Procedure in Criminal Cases. He said: Last Session an Act was passed making final the decisions of the courts of this country in criminal matters, and it has been considered expedient to define more exactly and precisely than was done by that Act that the provision pertains to appeals or petitions to Her Majesty in Council. The present Bill, therefore, merely amends the short Act adopted last Session by introducing these words:

No appeal shall be brought in any criminal case from any judgment or authority or order of any court in Canada to any Court of Appeal by which in the United Kingdom appeals or petitions to Her Majesty in Council may be heard.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

LIABILITY OF CARRIERS BY WATER.

Mr. MADILL moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 49) to amend the Act respecting the liability of Carriers by Water. He said: The Bill is one in the interests of the settlers on islands and coasts depending upon common carriers by water for mails, provisions and supplies. It is introduced for the purpose of preventing common carriers from refusing to carry the freights, provisions and supplies along the routes and land passengers at the advertised rates, and imposing a penalty for any infraction of the rules or any discrimination against the settlers.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS REGARDING PUBLIC PAPERS.

Mr. TROW. Before the Orders of the Day are read, I wish to make a suggestion in reference to the unusual demands which are made throughout the country for copies of Hansard. I think there is scarcely any member of the House who has not received applications for copies of the Debates containing the interesting debate which is now in progress. I question whether there has been a debate since Confederation which has attracted more attention throughout the Dominion. The distributor has received communications from members of Congress and others in the United States, asking for copies of the Debates; and I think that while the type is standing, very reasonable terms could be made with the printer for an extra number of copies for distribution. The whole country is interested in this debate, and I hope the Minister who has charge of the matter will allow a few more thousand copies to be printed for circulation. It is utterly impossible to supply at present the number of people who are applying daily, not merely for the speeches on one side, but those on both sides. It might be well to have the whole of the speeches compiled at the close of the debate in pamphlet form.

Mr. EDGAR. I would like to enquire of the Government when some further papers, which seem to be exceedingly important in connection with the Fishery Treaty, are going to be brought before the House? I have in my hand what purports to be a copy of some papers which have been laid before the British Parliament by the British Government; and among them I find a very important document which I do not think this Parliament has seen yet. It is the instructions of Lord Salisbury to the commissioners. We have already had laid before the House the powers from the British Government to the plenipotentiaries; but I find there was issued on the same date, the 24th October last, very important instructions from Lord Salisbury to the commissioners. You will remember that the powers which were laid before the House referred to the plenipotentiaries' dealings with "all or any questions relating to rights of fishery," "and any other questions which may arise which the respective plenipotentiaries may be authorised by their Government to consider and adjust." Now, there is nothing in the papers which have been so far laid before the House, to show that the plenipotentiaries were authorised to consider or adjust anything but the matters relating to the rights of the fisheries. However, I find from these instructions of Lord Salisbury that there were special powers given to the commissioners outside of the fishery question. Here is one clause of these instructions:

"Whilst I have judged it advisable thus, in the first place, to refer to the question of the fisheries of the Atlantic coast, it is not the wish of Her Majesty's Government that the discussions of the plenipotentiaries should necessarily be confined to that point alone; but full liberty is given to you to enter upon the consideration of any questions which may bear upon the issues involved, and to discuss and treat for any equivalents, whether by means of tariff concessions or otherwise, which the United States plenipotentiaries may be authorised to consider as a means of settlement."

Now, it must be apparent how very important this document is to the discussion of the very question which is now before Parliament, and I am sure it is a great slight cast upon this Parliament by the Government and those entrusted—

Mr. SPEAKER. I wish the hon. gentleman to limit himself to his question, stating what papers he wants and what importance these papers are for the conduct of the business of this House. I have already drawn the attention of hon. members to the fact that these questions ought not be made the occasion of a speech, and I must see that the rule is respected.

Mr. EDGAR. I bow to your decision, Sir. I only wish to point out that whereas those matters have been laid before the English Parliament, they should at the earliest moment be laid before this House.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. If the hon. gentleman had limited himself to that remark, I would have answered Mr. Trow.

him at once. The attention of the First Minister will be called to the hon. gentleman's remarks as soon as he comes in.

Mr. LAURIER. My hon. friend from Perth (Mr. Trow) made recently a suggestion which I think we ought to carry out, with regard to a larger publication of this debate. There is no doubt a very large demand for further copies of the speeches in this debate on reciprocity. I do not know that the Government can do anything, but it would be well to call the attention of the Debates Committee to this matter, and suggest that they might see their way to have a larger number of copies printed.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. As the hon. gentleman has said, this matter is not in the hands of the Government, and this Parliament had decided before that a certain number of the debates should be printed each day and distributed. The debate on this subject was not foreseen, and the House did, therefore, not see fit to order an additional number of copies. The debate has now gone on for three days, and I suppose a complete edition would be required. Of course, if the Printing Committee think proper to move in the matter, they may take it up at the next sitting.

Mr. TROW. I understand the type is not distributed, and consequently the whole debate can be put in print again at a very reasonable figure, which it could not be after the type is distributed.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The attention of the Committee is called to it, and no doubt they will take the matter up.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) With the kind permission of the hon. gentleman who moved the adjournment of the debate (Mr. McNeill), I wish to make a short personal explanation with reference to the charge brought against me by the hon. gentleman who followed me in this debate (Mr. Foster), concerning my action upon the resolution before the House. I had not the opportunity of hearing the speech of the hon. the Minister of Marine (Mr. Foster), as I was not in the House when it was delivered, nor did I see the report of his speech until Saturday. Otherwise I would have taken opportunity to make my explanation before this. In his remarks, the hon. gentleman charged me with having, in this House, advocated the resolution submitted by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), although a few months ago I had denounced, in the most severe terms, the policy it embodied. The hon. gentleman made this charge, based on a quotation from a newspaper report, assuming the report to be correct, and argued from this that I could not be sincere or honest in the opinions I have expressed in this House. I desire to say that there is no foundation whatever for the charge made by the hon. gentleman. I desire to say that the remarks I made in this House in support of the resolution of my hon. friend for South Oxford, are not at all at variance with the position I took and the remarks I made before the Charlottetown Board of Trade.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman is in order if he is speaking to the amendment before the House, but otherwise he is not.

Mr. DAVIES. I am speaking with the kind permission of the hon. gentleman who moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. BOWELL. My hon. friend, Mr. McNeill, has no power to give that permission, and I maintain the hon. gentleman is not in order unless he is speaking to the amendment moved by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. DAVIES. It is a personal explanation I am making.

Mr. BOWELL. It is not. It is an answer to a speech delivered in reply to the hon. gentleman, and the hon. gentleman is now combatting the argument presented to this House by the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. SPEAKER. These personal explanations are usually allowed, because they partake of the nature of questions of privilege. If an hon. member rises to deny that he made certain statements imputed to him during a debate, he is allowed to do so, but he ought to limit himself to a formal denial. He must not proceed to deliver a speech on the subject.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I would have taken the opportunity, which is often taken by hon. gentlemen, of rising to make an explanation when the Orders of the Day were called, but I understood from your remarks, Sir, the other day that such was not considered to be the proper course; and as I am not going to take up any time and my hon. friend has kindly given way to me.

Mr. McNEILL I simply understood my hon. friend to say that he wished to make merely a personal explanation.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. gentleman is right. I desire simply to make a personal explanation that I had not previously the opportunity of making, with reference to the very serious charge brought up against me of inconsistency by the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. That hon. gentleman, quoting from a summary report of the proceedings before the Charlottetown Board of Trade, which appeared in a Conservative paper, and in which I am set down as having said, that unrestricted reciprocity is impracticable and impossible and that the Americans were not such arrant fools as to grant it, and taking this report as correct, proceeded to ask what weight, could be attached to any arguments I might use in this House in favor of unrestricted reciprocity, after that statement I had made before the Board of Trade of Charlottetown, a few months ago denouncing any such policy. The hon. gentleman said:

"Unrestricted reciprocity would differ from commercial union in this respect: that while under it there would be perfectly free trade—"

Mr. FOSTER. I never said that.

Mr. DAVIES. I am reading the quotation which the hon. gentleman read.

Mr. FOSTER. Why did you not say so?

Mr. DAVIES. That is what I intended to convey. I was reading the quotation on which the hon. gentleman based his statement:

"Unrestricted reciprocity would differ from commercial union in this respect: that while under it there would be perfectly free trade between the two countries, each country would retain the right to frame its own tariff as against the rest of the world. Canada, for instance, might have a 25 per cent tariff, while that of the United States might be one of 35 per cent. The immediate consequence would be that imports to the United States, instead of being carried to the great ports of the United States, would be taken to the States by way of Montreal. To this the States, whose people are not arrant fools, would never consent. An unrestricted reciprocity, although it would suit us as well as commercial union, was, therefore, impracticable."

That was the quotation. Now, I did not make use of such language as is here reported. I used that language with a very strongly pronounced and distinct qualification, which was clearly understood when I stated it. The board of trade were discussing several proposals for obtaining free trade relations with the United States. Some were in favor of commercial union, and some in favor of the scheme known as unrestricted reciprocity. A portion expressed their desire to have the freest trade relations between Canada and the United States that could be obtained, similar to the freedom of trade which existed between State and State, so that there should be no custom houses on the border, and that not only the United States goods should be passed free, but that all goods, whether they were manufactured in Canada or in the United States or abroad, should be passed free. These same people wished also to retain, if possible, in the hands of Canada the right to maintain our tariff and to regulate it as we pleased. In answer to that, I told them that such a scheme of unrestricted reciprocity was impracticable and impossible, that if Canada retains a tariff of 25 per cent., and the United States a tariff of 35 per cent., and you have no custom houses between the two countries, the whole of the importations will naturally come into that part of the country which has the least tariff, and that the country to the south of us which has the higher tariff would not be such arrant fools as to assent to any such arrangement.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That is cheered. That is common sense and plain fact, and what I said then I repeat in this House, and I say that the proposition which we have now before us is not that proposition.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order. Go on.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I hardly think, Mr. Speaker, that this interruption is quite fair.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order. Go on.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I say that the proposition which is now before the House, made by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), does not contain the only objection and the fatal objection which I then pointed out, and which I said would render the scheme impracticable, and I simply desire in closing to say that, when I had resumed my speech before the Charlottetown Board of Trade, I moved a resolution at the close of my remarks which shows pretty clearly what I intended, what I was understood to say, and what I did say, although, in the Conservative paper from which my hon. friend quotes, I am not as fully reported as I ought to have been. I moved:

"That this board warmly approves of reciprocal free trade with the United States on the broadest possible basis, including the abolition of the restriction on the coasting trade and the transfer of vessel property, and embracing the concession to the Americans of the common right with our fishermen to use our fisheries."

That was the statement I made there, and the statement which I repeat again.

Mr. FOSTER. I have only to thank the hon. gentleman for calling my attention to this, and for the lucid explanation he has made of his own words. I do not think it requires any more remarks from me.

RECIPROCITY WITH THE UNITED STATES.

House resumed adjourned debate on proposed motion of Sir Richard Cartwright, and on the motion of Mr. Foster in amendment thereto.

Mr. McNEILL. As I understand that many hon. members desire to take part in this debate, I shall endeavor to make the remarks I desire to make to the House as short as possible. In the first instance, I think we may all feel satisfied to know that, for once in the history of this Parliament at least, all parties in this House are agreed upon one point—the Liberal-Conservative party on this side of the House; the Rouge party, which I hope I may say without offence, is more particularly represented by the courteous and eloquent and able gentleman who leads the Opposition in this House; the Grit party, led by the hon. gentleman the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright); the Parti National, marshalled under the baton of the hon.

member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot); the Politico-Philosophical party, if I may so express it, of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills); the Insular party, so solid and firm in its allegiance to the hon. gentleman who has just addressed the House (Mr. Davies); the party of pure political principle, so worthily led by the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar); the party of detraction, of which, alas, the great leader fell in the general engagement of last year, but which is properly represented by his old supporter and lieutenant, the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton); the party of political morality, that great party which two Sessions ago so many hon. members opposite sought to lead that I should not then have dared to discriminate among them, but which I think I may, without offence to any one else, say, is now in this House under the worthy command of the hon. member for Gleggarry (Mr. Purcell) and his not less distinguished friend the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Cook); and last, but not least, the great party of one, which my hon. friend, the member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), delights to call the third party, but which I think most hon. members of this House would call the first party, because I am sure my hon. friend himself would admit that he, at all events, would call it a No. 1 party. We may congratulate ourselves that all these great parties are united upon one subject, are agreed upon one point, that it would be greatly to the advantage of Canada if we could obtain freer commercial relations, freer trade relations with the United States. For years past, the people of the United States kept up a great tariff wall against us. Over and over again we have entreated them to take it down, and they have just as often refused. And why have they so refused? The hon. member who moved this resolution (Sir Richard Cartwright) has told us. He has told us that they so refused to take down that tariff wall because they wished to punish the people of Canada. He has told us so in those words; he repeated the same statement before this House, but this is what he said at Ingersoll:

"We know that the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854 was abolished not so much because it was injurious to the United States, for on the whole both parties profited by it, as because they wanted to punish us for the sympathy some of us had displayed with the South during the rebellion."

It is true that the people of Canada—and we would have supposed, perhaps, that they were within their rights in sympathising with whomsoever they pleased—it is true that the people of Canada did sympathise at that time with the weaker side, and I think it is a somewhat interesting little bit of information that we now have from the hon. gentleman who asks us to hand ourselves over, body and bones, to the tender mercies of those same people, that the people of Canada were deliberately punished by those people because they ventured to sympathise with the South in their struggle for independence, I think, Sir, that is a little bit of information which the voters of Canada may very well mark, learn and inwardly digest. But I believe the hon. gentleman is perfectly correct in his information. At the same time I wish to call attention to the fact that this is not the only reason why this great tariff wall has been upbuilt against us. It is not merely for the purpose of punishing the people of Canada; it is also for the purpose of coercing the people of Canada. It is a matter of history that this treaty was abrogated by the United States, this great tariff wall was raised up against the people of this country for the purpose of coercing the people of Canada into annexation. Now, if any hon. member on the other side of the House ventures to controvert that statement, I will take occasion to read from the utterance of the great apostle of this movement, Mr. Wiman, and you will see that he endorses what I have said. After alluding to the U. E. Loyalists, he says:

Mr. McNEILL,

"I have alluded to them because there is a tendency in the American mind to feel that isolation and the refusal to admit Canada to the privileges of the market of the United States, will have the effect of forcing them into a humble position as applicants for a political alliance. Doubtless the repeal of the Reciprocity Treaty in 1866 was largely influenced by this consideration."

Then, in answer, apparently, by anticipation, to observations which have since been put forward, by hon. gentlemen opposite, he goes on to say:

"But it had an effect entirely contrary—"

You will observe, these hon. gentlemen tell us that it is having that effect, and that so soon as we do away with trade restrictions, this annexation feeling, which they allege to exist in the country, will subside. He goes on:

"But it had an effect entirely contrary to that which was expected, and to-day there is not in the wide world a country more loyal in its sentiments than is Canada to British connection."

Now, there are the statements of Mr. Wiman on that point, and I venture to think that it is impossible to exaggerate the importance of the bearing of this fact upon the discussion which is now proceeding in this House. I think it is essential that every hon. member in this House should bear in view the fact that this tariff has been imposed against the people of Canada by the United States, partly to punish them, and partly to coerce them into annexation. Mr. Wiman, as I have said, tells us that there are people in the United States who still hope to succeed in their attempt to coerce the people of Canada into annexation by these means, and hon. gentlemen opposite encourage these people in that opinion; hon. gentlemen opposite tell these people that if they only continue to maintain this tariff against the people of Canada, they will succeed in their end and object, and coerce us into annexation. We have heard that statement from almost every hon. member who has addressed this House during this debate. Mr. Speaker, I venture to think that the men of Canada are not made of such slight elements. I challenge hon. gentlemen opposite to bring this statement to the test of fact. I challenge them to take any constituency in the Province of Ontario; they may select a favorable occasion for the election, and bring out their candidate on the annexation platform, and try out the question before the people. No, Sir, they will not accept that challenge. But I do not want to be misunderstood; I do not want hon. gentlemen to think that I suggest to them to risk the loss of a seat in this honorable Chamber by any such trial as this. No, what I propose to them is that they should select the most favorable constituency in Ontario, and endeavor to elect their candidate on the annexation platform for the high office of poundkeeper, and I venture to tell them that they cannot do it and they know it well.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Who is talking annexation?

Mr. McNEILL. But it would seem that hon. gentlemen are desirous of educating their party up to the annexation standpoint. Every speech that has been delivered from that side of the House heretofore, in this debate, bears upon the face of it, the signs and tokens of such a desire.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. It is not so.

Mr. McNEILL. The hon. gentleman says it is not so. The hon. gentleman who moved this resolution told the people of Canada that Great Britain was but little able to help them; he told us that Great Britain was isolated, friendless and alone. Sir, I do not intend to discuss that question with the hon. gentleman now, it is rather a large issue. But I will give the hon. gentleman the credit of saying that I believe he was fully persuaded of the accuracy of what he said, or he would not have made that statement. Well, all I have to observe on the subject is that his having made that statement, believing it to be true, shows that he has given very superficial consideration to the subject. What did the hon. gentleman tell us next? He told us that the people of Canada were under no obligation to England. I should like to ask the hon. gentleman if the people of Canada do not owe to Great Britain their existence to-day as a great and free people. I would like to ask him if they do not owe all their rights and privileges as freemen to Great Britain. But, Sir, I will not answer the hon. gentleman in any words of my own; I will answer him in the words of a Canadian whose name, I am ashamed to say, at the present moment, I forget:

"Britain bore us in her flank,
Britain nursed us at our birth,
Britain reared us to our rank,
Mid the nations of the earth."

"In the hour of fear and dread,
In the gathering of the storm,
Britain raised above our head,
Her broad shield and stalwart arm."

"Stand, Canadians, firmly stand, Round the flag of fatherland!"

But, Sir, I prefer to leave the statement of the hon. gentleman to be determined upon by the great universal conscience of the people of Canada. And then having so far paved the way the hon. gentleman went a step forward and he told us that we would be better off if we cast in our lot with the people of the United States. That was not anything in the nature of a proposition for annexation—Oh no! nothing of the kind; that was not leading up to annexation, as the hon. gentleman says; but he told us that, nevertheless. He took care, however, Mr. Speaker, to guard himself against the indignation of the people of this country by immediately adding that he did not want to cast in his lot with the people of the United States. My hon. friend who addressed the House a moment ago, if I mistake not, had some enthusiastic utterances in his speech somewhat tending in the same direction; and the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) had a passage in his speech in which he drew a glowing picture of what would happen when the two British peoples of this continent were united together. That has nothing to do with annexation either. The hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) told us that for his part he thought it would make little difference on which side of the line a man happened to reside, for the people were one and the same. And that also has nothing at all to do with annexation. The hon. gentleman who spoke last in the debate, the hon. member for Drummond and Arthabaska (Mr. Lavergne) drew attention to the fact, and seemed to dwell with special unction upon it, that Washington was on this side of the Atlantic and that London was on the other side of the Atlantic, and he said that the people of Canada might think that perhaps the nearer metropolis were the more convenient of the two. But he, Mr. Speaker, like the hon. gentleman who led this debate, took care to guard himself immediately by saying that he hoped they would not do anything of the kind. Now, I do not wish to be misunderstood. I do not wish to be understood as alleging that any of these gentlemen desire annexation; but I do wish distinctly to say, that their speeches show that they are well aware, and they are pressed down with the consciousness that if we adopt the policy which they suggest, we run an enormous risk of annexation, and they endeavor to minimise the evils of annexation which they know in their hearts the vast overwhelming majority of their own supporters utterly disapprove. But Sir, if there be any direct proof of the statement I have just made required, I have it here. My hon. friend who addressed the House with such eloquence on Friday night referred to this statement, but I wish, with the kind permission of the House, to read again the ominous words addressed by the hon. member for South Oxford to the people of Ingersoll last October. He said:

"There is no doubt whatever in my mind, also, that we cannot overlook the risk that does undoubtedly arise, that increased commercial intercourse with the United States may strengthen the hands of those who desire to see our political system absorbed in theirs."

And he further goes on to say:

"I have no hesitation in saying, frankly, that if the United States are willing to deal with us on equitable terms the advantages to both countries, and especially to us, are so great that scarcely any sacrifice is too severe to secure them. I am as averse as any man can be to annexation, or to resign our political independence, but I cannot shut my eyes to the facts. We have greatly misused our advantages, we have been foolish in our expenditures, we have no means of satisfying the just demands of large portions of the Dominion, except through such an arrangement as commercial union."

You see, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. gentleman at that time used the expression "commercial union" as synonymous with that of unrestricted reciprocity. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think we have got the situation clear. This is just where we stand, and the people have for some time suspected it. This tariff is kept up against the people of this country, partly to punish them for daring to sympathise with the South in their struggle for independence, partly to coerce them into annexation, and the hon. gentleman opposite who moved this resolution has himself told us that we run an enormous risk if we adopt his own policy of putting into the hands of the United States the power to coerce us into annexation. That, I say, is just where we stand, and the people of the country have suspected it for some time. Now, Sir, they are fully agreed with Mr. Mowat, the Premier of this Province, when he says that British connection has been for Canada unmixed good; but they are not at all sure that the immersion of 5,000,000 of the people of Canada in 55,000,000 or 60,000,000 of the people of the United States would mean anything else than the subversion, the hopeless and absolute subversion of Canadian interests there, and they are at the same time perfectly satisfied that for very many reasons indeed it would be anything in the world but unmixed good, and therefore they do not sympathise with this movement to the degree in which we have been informed they do by hon. gentlemen opposite. But there is another reason why they do not sympathise with this movement. They are weak enough to have some respect for that altogether illogical and indefensible thing called sentiment, and they carry that weakness so far as actually to prefer their own country to the United States, and to prefer the members of their own family to foreigners, all of which is pure sentiment and therefore foolishness; but we must simply take matters as we find them. The people of Canada are, in my opinion, growing very suspicious indeed of this movement which has so strangely been inaugurated by persons in the United States, a new and entirely unheard of movement on their part urging Canada to enter into closer trade relations with them. I say they look upon that movement with some degree of suspicion, because they found that in the first shape it took that of commercial union. That has now been abandoned by hon. gentlemen opposite and repudiated by them. The people found that it was, in point of fact, simply a thinly disguised attempt upon the part of those persons in the United States to accomplish by "slyly climbing into the branches" what the people of the United States have themselves told us they had failed to accomplish by violently shaking the tree: in other words, Sir, they have come to the conclusion that this movement in favor of commercial union was simply an attempt on the part of the people of the United States to obtain the mastery and control of our trade, commerce and finances. Therefore, while we have always been ready and while we are ready now, as the Statute-book shows, to enter into arrangements pointing towards commercial dealings with the people of the United States, we look upon this particular movement in favor of it with a very great deal of suspicion indeed, having already as we conceive discovered under it a dangerous conspiracy against the commerce and the political independence of Canada. Now, Sir, the people of Canada are, I believe, perfectly ready to enter into a fair bargain with the people of the United States for reciprocal trading relations with them, but I think they are very unwilling to enter into a bargain with the people of the United States which shall be an unfair bargain to Canada, and they are still more unwilling to enter into an arrangement which shall be dictated exclusively by the people of the United States and the terms and conditions of which shall be arranged exclusively for the benefit of the latter people. The last bargain of this kind which we had with the United States was, it seems to me, a pretty fair bargain for them. My hon. friend told us on Friday night that that bargain resulted to them in a balance of trade to the extent of more than $20,000,000. Those figures which my hon. friend quoted were the American figures, but the figures given by the Hon. George Brown were not "twenty millions and a little over" but ninety-five millions and a half. The Hon. George Brown maintained that the United States had had the advantage in that bargain to the extent of $95,500,000. Now, the probability is that the proof in this case, as usual, is to be found in the mean between those extremes. At all events I think we must see that that was a pretty fair margin for the people of the United States. They had a pretty good share of whatever was to be gained by that transaction, and so much was it so that we find that the people of Nova Scotia and the people of New Brunswick considered that the United States had got very much the better of that bargain, and they complained of its pressing upon themselves unduly. Now, then, what do we find to-day? We find that the people of the United States tell us plainly that they will not enter into any such arrangement with us again; they tell us plainly that that bargain was far too favorable for us, and that it was not favorable enough for them. I think that the people of Canada, at all events, have got pretty fair warning, and that warning from the people of the United States themselves who tell us that the bargain which gave them an advantage to the extent of from twenty to ninety-five millions of dollars was not nearly favorable enough for them and was far too favorable for us. It seems to me, therefore, that the people of Canada may very readily see that if they are to have closer trade relations with the United States they must expect to pay pretty dear for their whistle. But, Sir, we are told that there are one class of the people of Canada who are to be enormously benefitted by the bargain. The bargain calls upon us to give up our protective policy. The people of Canada require protection against the United States just as much as the people of the United States ever require protection against England. No people ever required protection for their young industries more than the people of Canada do to-day, but we are told that we are to give that protection up as a portion of the bargain. We are told that at least one class of the community will benefit, and that class the one to which I have had the honor to belong ever since I came to Canada, sixteen years ago—the farming class; and more especially the Ontario farmers are, as hon. gentlemen opposite say, to be benefitted by this arrangement. Now, Sir, if I am not wearying the House, if I am not taking up too much time I would just like to investigate for a moment the statement that the Ontario farmer is to be so enormously benefitted by free interchange of farming produce with the people of the United States. Before I do so I will say, with the permission of the House, just one word in reference to the Canadian farmers generally. We have heard a great deal from the other side of the House about the desperate condition of indigence to which the Ontario farmers have been reduced, and in support of that assertion we have heard a great deal of the fact that farming lands in Canada have deteriorated in value. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to make this observation with regard to that argument, and that is, that it is entirely beside the question. Whether the values of farming lands have in fact deteriorated or not has nothing whatever to do with the question. It is perfectly well known, Sir, that owing to the enormously increased means of communication and the facilities for carrying the goods of the farm to the farming markets of the world that those markets have been overstocked in comparison to the condition in which they were a very few years ago, and, Sir, it is apparent that by reason of this there has been a depreciation in manufacturing values; and when hon. gentlemen opposite tell us that in Canada we have in this matter the experience of all the rest of the world, I should like to know what it proves. It does not advance their case one iota. In this connection, Sir, we must remember that the farming lands of free trade England have depreciated such an extent in the same time that the depreciation in the value of the farming lands of Canada—if there be any—is absolutely comparatively nothing. Although, in England we should have expected that the very opposite should be the case because the supply of land is so limited and the demand is so great. If hon. gentlemen wish to advance their case, if they want to make a point in this matter they must go on to show that the depreciation in value of Canadian lands has been greater in proportion than the depreciation in the other farming lands of the world and they must show further that the farmer of Canada is in a worse position than the farmer in other parts of the world. It is very well known, Sir, to every hon. member of this House, that they have made no such attempt. It is very well known, to every hon. member of this House, that they have not attempted to grapple with the facts and figures adduced by my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture, and laid before the country some time ago, and those adduced by my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior, and by my hon. friend the Minister of Marine, who has moved the amendment,—facts and figures which prove conclusively and irrefutably that the condition of the farmer of Canada is vastly better, vastly more sound, than that of his neighbor in the United States. And, Sir, when we remember what the condition of the farmer is in free trade England, the argument of hon. gentlemen opposite becomes simply laughable, for the condition of the English farmer is pitiable in the extreme. But, Sir, to return to the point from which I diverted, what would the Ontario farmer gain and what would he give if we had a free exchange of farm products with the people of the United States? In the first place, Sir, I may say that when the people of the United States ask us to open our markets to them, and to expose our producers—I now speak of manufacturers and farmers alike—to all the weight and strain of competition with the accumulated wealth and resources of fifty five or sixty millions of people in the United States, they ask us, Sir, to do what under similar circumstances they never would have done themselves. They ask us to pursue a policy the very reverse of that which they have themselves pursued with such conspicuous success. And, Sir, if we had this free trade with the United States, the first thing that would stare the Ontario farmer in the face would be the fact that he had lost his home market by the closing down of our manufactories; although, waiving that for the moment, I think the Ontario farmer will begin now to see the value of the home market, from the statements that have been made with regard to the value of the home market in the United States—a home market which has been built up by the adoption of the very policy there which we have urged should be adopted here. But I was about to ask, what would the Ontario farmer gain, and what would he give? In the first place, Sir, we should have free entry for three of our staple products—our horses, our sheep and our barley. Those are the three principal products for which we should obtain a better market in the United States. And what should we give, Sir, in return? We should give to the people of the United States a free entry into our markets for their wheat, their coarse grains, their western corn, and their western pork. Now, I should like to ask hon. members if it is so very clear that the Ontario farmer would gain a great deal by that transaction. They had free entry for their wheat before, and I wonder if hon. members of this House have realized exactly what that amounted to. I confess I did not do so until I commenced to study the figures; but what I found in them positively startled me, Mr. Speaker. I found that during the five years immediately preceding the introduction of the National Policy we had imported into Canada from the United States, for home consumption, $34,000,000 worth of their wheat, whereas during the last five years, since the National Policy has been introduced, we imported only $1,100,000 worth. In other words, the Ontario farmer has had the difference, $33,000,000, paid into his pocket for his own wheat sold in his own market, and he has thereby at the least saved the cost of transporting that wheat to the sea-board and then taking it across the Atlantic. And, Sir, if hon. members will only study the prices of wheat in Chicago and in Toronto respectively, they will find that the Ontario farmer gained a great deal more than that. But that is not all, I find, referring to the same period, that in the last five years compared with the previous five years the Ontario farmer has had the advantage, so far as coarse grains and other breadstuffs are concerned, to the extent of $11,000,000. And, Sir, if we remember that during those five years immediately preceding the National Policy, the quantity of coarse grains consumed in this country was very small indeed, compared with that which is consumed in the feeding of stock to-day, we shall see that this represents in a very small degree the advantage we have gained in this respect from the National Policy. Hon. gentlemen will remember the way in which the price of oats used to be brought down with a rush by the sending of American cheap oats into our market. And those who grew peas for sale a few years immediately preceding the introduction of the National Policy and immediately after, will know that the price of peas advanced under that policy very much indeed. And now, Sir, what about western pork? We all know that the market of the Canadian farmer for his pork was depressed to the last degree. In one of those years, 1878 or 1879, I knew very well an Ontario farmer who had to sell his pork for $2.50 per hundred. Now, free trade in produce means the free entry into our markets of western pork, and I want to know whether the destruction of the home market for pork will in any degree be compensated to the Ontario farmer by the greatly advanced price that he is going to obtain for those early spring chickens, you know, which he is to rear in the snows of January and February, to compete in the New York market with the fowls raised in the warmer latitudes of the United States. Now, Sir, just let us see the avalanche which hangs over the home market for Canadian pork to-day. The year before last, according to the last figures I have got, they exported, of bacon, $25,000,000; of ham, $5,250,000; of fresh pork, $4,400,000, and of salt pork, $20,750,000 worth. That is a competition which the Ontario farmer may expect when we have free trade in farm produce. And, Sir, he will have something more; he will have the advantage of seeing our markets flooded with oleomargarine, and butterine and bogus butter, and bogus butter oil. He will have these to his heart's content, to compete with the genuine butter manufactured by the wives, daughters and sisters of our Canadian farmers. More than that, he will have to compete in his own market with the cheaply-fed, with the corn-fed cattle of the United States; and more than that, he will find, in order to assist him in that competition, that his own cattle will be scheduled with the cattle of the United States and excluded from the markets of the mother country. Now, I think hon. gentlemen will agree with me that if the trade in farm produce would be to the advantage of the Ontario farmer—and I do not say that it might not—I think, at all events, it would by no means be an unmixed blessing; and I think they will further agree with me when I say that if, for the privilege of introducing the produce of his farm into our market, we give the American privilege of introducing the produce of our farm into his, we shall have given him a very fair equivalent. Now, the question that the people of Canada have to ask themselves is, are they prepared to give a great deal more? The policy proposed to us demands that we shall give a great deal more. It demands that we shall admit American manufactures free; and that, in the opinion of the enormous majority of the manufacturers of this country, who are best able to judge, means practically, to a great extent, the annihilation of the manufacturing industries of this country, and the destruction of the home market of the Ontario farmer. Are you prepared to throw that into the bargain too? But that is not the bargain, because we have to give something more; we have to lose seven millions of dollars directly and millions of dollars indirectly, and we have to throw that into the bargain too. But that does not even yet represent the bargain. We have to do more, Sir, we have to give up the right to regulate our own tariff to suit our own needs; and the needs of a young country like Canada in that respect are, as we have been taught by the people of the United States themselves, very different indeed from the needs of an old-established and wealthy community like theirs. It is demanded of us that we shall exactly assimilate our tariff to theirs, and that, by their own admission, would be incalculably to the injury of a young country like Canada. We may ask, who is to regulate the tariff when changes require to be made? The hon. the Minister of the Interior has told us. The Americans themselves have told us through their newspapers, that their tariff is to be regulated by Congress; but I will waive that argument, and I will assume that they give us some kind of fair play and some representation in the body which is to regulate that tariff. What will that representation be? They are fifty-five or sixty million people, and we are five million people. If they should give us representation according to our population, in what condition would we be when those questions arise, which conflicting interests would certainly cause to arise, between the one party and the other. I say we should be in a helpless and useless condition of impotency; we should be obliged to take whatever our good masters would be kind enough to throw unto us. We would have to throw that into the bargain; Sir, it is no bargain; it is national degradation and abject surrender. I say that, under such circumstances, our position would be absolutely unendurable; with our own hands we should have placed their heels upon our necks, and with our own suffrages we should have voted away our own independence. But that is not yet the bargain. We are told that, in order to carry out the terms of this specious contract, we must also discriminate in favor of the American goods against the goods of the mother country. In other words, we are to sacrifice our sentiments and throw our sympathies into the bargain, too. We are to cast down in scorn and derision the impulses of the noblest element of humanity. Strike out sentiment from the nature of man, and, Sir, you at once degrade him to the level of the brute creation. Where is the dividing line to be found, if it is not at sentiment? It is not at appetite, it is not at instinct, it is not even at reason. It is only to be found in the appreciation of the ethically beautiful, the great and the good. There alone is to be found the argument from nature for the existence of the human soul. There alone is to be found the argument from nature for our hopes of immortality. What, Sir, I would ask are these thoughts too deep for utterance which vainly flutter about like sweet birds in the dark cottage they inhabit? In the most sublime passage in English literature, the great master has compared these unutterable sympathies to the music of the spheres. He makes Lorenzo say:

"Look how the floor of Heaven
Is thick inlaid with patines of bright gold.
There is not the smallest orb which thou behold'st,
But in his motion like an angel sings,
Still quivering to the young-eyed cherubims;
But, whilst this muddy vesture of decay
Doth grossly clothe it in, we cannot hear it.—

I would ask, what is that divine harmony? Is it sheer, unadulterated greed for gain? What is a good, true, a noble man? Is he not a man who is actuated by good, and true, and noble sentiments and who lives up to them? The sentiment of Canada speaks out trumpet-tongued against the policy that is proposed to us by the hon. gentleman, and we are coolly requested to degrade and to depress and to stifle the highest impulses of our people in order that that precious policy may be carried into effect. But, Sir, no. Why, we are told that is not the case. We are told, forsooth, that it will be to the advantage of the mother country to run the risk of the disruption of her Empire, because at some day—God only knows when—the people of Canada will become vastly better customers of hers than they ever were before. Well, all I can say with regard to that is that the people of Canada are customers of the mother country to the extent per head of the population of $3.84, and the people of the United States are customers of the mother country to the extent of $1.83 per head of their population; and hon. gentlemen can decide the force of the suggestion made by hon. gentlemen opposite for themselves. But, for my own part, speaking for myself, I say that this is "the most unkindest cut of all," for it simply amounts to an attempt to betray the mother country with a kiss. But I would ask, why it is that we are called upon to commit this deed of imperishable infamy? The hon. gentleman gives you a reason. He tells you it is because we are broken, bankrupt, and going head over heels to destruction. Fortunately, the people of Canada can decide that question for themselves, without reference either to the hon. gentleman who makes the assertion or to any hon. member on this side of the House. They can decide that question for themselves by reference to men whose business it is to study the financial status of nations, men who do not care three straws whether it is the Hon. Edward Blake, or Mr. Laurier, or Sir Richard Cartwright, or Sir John A. Macdonald who has control of the destinies of this country, men who look at this from a purely business point of view, men who look at this matter with the cold, calculating eye of making money out of it; and what is their verdict? What is the verdict of the financiers of the world on this matter? Their verdict is, that the hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken. They not only do not agree with the hon. gentleman, but they say that the very reverse of what the hon. gentleman has said is the fact, and they back their opinion with their money by lending us their money on terms which are much more favorable than those on which money was ever lent to Canada before. But we have another reason offered why we should follow out this precious policy, and what is that? I have referred to it once before, but I think it ought to be referred to in this House. This is the reason given to us by Mr. Wiman why we should adopt this policy. He says:

"When one recalls the 5,000 miles of coast line fishing privileges possessed by Canada, the limitless forests of timber, greatly needed by the United States, the exhaustless hills of iron ore, the copper, nickel and other minerals, the mountains of phosphates, the miles and miles of coal in close proximity to eastern manufacturing centres and western needs, the infinite variety of riches which God in His providence has placed in these regions for the good of all mankind; and when one recalls that for the most part these are lying silent, dormant and dead, it needs only to turn and look into the earnest faces of the great nation on the borders of Canada to realize that the good Providence has also provided a people whose high mission it is to take these vast riches and most gratefully enjoy His bounty."

That is the reason given to us by Mr. Wiman. The policy of the Liberal Conservative party, under the leadership of the right hon. gentleman who has made the name of Canada famous throughout the world, has been a policy of building up, a policy of construction, a policy of binding together. The right hon. gentleman has sought to provide the people of Canada with the means of developing the vast resources of their country; the right hon. gentleman has sought also to soothe jealousies, to soothe local jealousies and to assuage old-time animosities; he has sought to teach the people of this country that the interests of the races and creeds and industries and classes and Provinces are first and foremost of all Canadian interests; he has sought, in short, to build up a great Canadian nationality in North America, a nationality which shall at the same time be as truly and as thoroughly an integral part of the British nation as the Welsh, or the Irish, or the Scotch, or the English nationality is. Surely that is a great and noble policy. Surely every true Canadian ought to strive to help it on. And the chief corner-stone of that policy has been the provision by which it is attempted to arrange that the Canadian manufacturer, the Canadian farmer—that Canadian industry, in fact, shall have the benefit of its own Canadian market; the provision that seeks to arrange so, as far as possible at least, that the money which is paid for goods consumed in Canada shall not be conveyed out of Canada to the impoverishment of the country, but, as far as possible, shall remain in the country, to be re-invested in native industry and still further develop the resources of the country. Unrestricted reciprocity means blotting out with a sponge all we have made under that policy; it means, in the opinion of many men best able to judge, the transference of the commerce and the trade of the cities of Canada to the cities of the United States; it means the domination of our trade and commerce by the United States, the loss of our commercial and of our financial independence, and, in short, the subjugation of Canada by that people. And it means more still. It means, in my opinion at least, without one shadow or shade of doubt, the severance of those ties which bind us to the mother country and bind our Empire together. I would ask the French Canadian members of this House if they are prepared to support such a policy as that, if they think, that, under the new condition of things which would grow up under that policy, their own peculiar rights and privileges would be so very much more secure than they are to-day; and of the members of this House, irrespective of race or class or creed—ay, or of party too—I would ask, are you prepared to hold your grip upon your own Canada and to continue to develop her own latent resources with the same courage and energy in the future as you have displayed in the past, and which in the last few years has won for you the admiration—yes, I may say without exaggeration, the wonder—of the civilised world? Are you prepared to join hands with those whose high policy it is to build up a Canadian nationality in North America, and at the same time to preserve and, if possible, consolidate the world-wide Empire to which we are heirs? Are you prepared, in the future as in the past, to take your stand, in sunshine and through storm, by the old land and the old flag, or, on the other hand, are you prepared to cast in your lot with those who, in the columns of their newspaper press, are, day after day, writing down British institutions, and deliberately and scandalously misrepresenting all that England does? Are you prepared, at their instance, and by their advice, in craven fear, at the very moment of splendid victory, to surrender to the pressure of a party which Canada has not only so long successfully resisted, but which, with native inborn energy and genius, she has converted into an instrument for her own good? Are you prepared, at the very moment when victory folds her pinions upon your banners, to haul down the flag of Canadian nationality and of Imperial fame? Are you prepared, at the instance of these men and by their advice, to lend a helping hand in the dismemberment of your own Empire? Are you prepared even to risk it, as the hon. gentleman tells us you must do, if you adopt his policy? Are the Commons of Canada prepared to do all this and to risk all this in order that the great nation on your southern border may, in the simple and graphic words of Mr. Wiman:—

“Take—”

“Take,” Mr. Speaker,—

“—the vast riches of your own native land, and most gratefully enjoy them.”

What the Commons of Canada will do, Sir, I am well assured, and if hon. gentlemen opposite, not content with that verdict, dare to do as they now propose, dare to submit to the judgment of the people of this country, and be so unworthy, so suicidal and so base, right sure am I that from every city and town, from every hamlet and country district, they will have the answer, swift and clear:

“Confound their politics;
On thee our hopes we fix,
God save the Queen.”

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Mr. Speaker, the principle involved in the resolution now under the consideration of this House is so far-reaching in its character, and fraught with such tremendous interests to the future welfare of this country, that I do not feel inclined to let it go to a division without asking the attention of the House for a very short time while I offer a few observations on the subject. I feel under a considerable difficulty at rising to speak at this period of the debate, because the hon. gentlemen who have preceded me from this side of the Chamber, have submitted to the consideration of the House and the country a proposition so broad, so statesmanlike, so far in the interests of this country, that the Chinese-wall-of-protection party on the other side, eloquent and argumentative as their speeches have been, from their own standpoint, have been wholly unable to gainsay the position we have taken. The hon. gentlemen who have spoken from the commencement of this debate, on our side of the House, have submitted a proposition, and have proclaimed correctly the condition of this country to be such, and its financial position such, as call for the immediate consideration of this Parliament, and the consideration of the people outside of it. Now, Sir, hon. gentlemen, in the early part of this debate, quoted speeches which had been made by hon. gentlemen on this side on previous occasions. They endeavored to make out that some hon. gentlemen on this side had been inconsistent in their utterances, and that the policy which they advocate now was not in accordance with the policy which they had advocated, individually, on other occasions. One of those gentlemen, my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies), has answered for himself to-day; he has shown this House that his speech, taken in its plain and literal meaning, from beginning to end, was not capable of the interpretation which the hon. Minister of Marine chose to put upon it. And I have no doubt that hon. gentleman will endeavor, before this debate is over, to make quotations from observations of mine. I hope they will do so. However, I may spare them the necessity of that, Mr. Speaker, because I intend to give this House, before I resume my seat, the benefit, if benefit it may be, of the opinions which I have expressed with regard to our relations with the United States for a very considerable number of years past. Now, Sir, we have, in this present position, an entirely new departure. We have here a question which has never yet been formally submitted to the consideration of the people. It has been an abstract question; it has been one which people's minds may have dwelt on, but it has never been the deliberate policy of a party, and it has never been deliberately submitted for the consideration of the people. And how are we met? We are met with the cry that it is disloyal to the old country. The hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat indulged us with that cry to a considerable extent, and closed his speech by an appeal to the sentimental aspect of this question, and stating the strength of that sentiment in the hearts of the people of Canada to-day. Sir, I agree with the hon. gentleman that there is a great deal in sentiment. I agree with the hon. gentleman that great needs and great sufferings have been undergone for the sake of mere sentiment. But, Sir, if sentiment stands between us and our necessities to-day, our duty to Canada points to the course we should take in the interests of Canada. Sir, sitting here as one of the representatives of this Dominion, I am prepared, for my part, to say, let us consider the interests of Canada first. That, Mr. Speaker, has been the policy of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, that has been the policy of the hon. right gentleman in times gone by.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is now.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). That was the policy laid down by the right hon. gentleman in that Minute of Council quoted by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) the other day, when the right hon. gentleman declared that the only way to make the people of Canada contented in their present position was to make them prosperous; and no one knew better than he did that if there was prosperity in this country from one end to the other, the people were satisfied and contented with their political position. But, as has been shown, if the true interests of a country were suffering, if the people saw on the other side of the line a market which would take all of their surplus productions, if they saw that market closed by a Chinese wall against us in consequence of the action of this Government, then I say that the time would come for the people of Canada to look around and make overtures, as this resolution invites us to make, to the large, friendly, and powerful people to the south, and ask them if some modus vivendi may not be arrived at whereby we two English-speaking races on this continent may be able to exchange our products to our mutual advantage. I say, at the outset of this discussion, that I am glad to hear hon. gentlemen on the other side pointing out all the disadvantages that are going to arise to the Dominion under the operation of such an Act. I am glad to hear that for this reason: because the friends of this measure—and we have friends on the other side of the border—will be able to show the people of the United States that there is at least a division of opinion on this side of the border. If there was only one view of the question taken in this Chamber, if every member in the House and every man in the country would cordially accept the views advanced by the hon. gentlemen who have preceded me, why, the friends of that measure, and I believe they are growing in the United States, would not have the advantage of pointing out there was a division of opinion on the other side of the border as well. I hold that this is a matter which, while largely in the interests of Canada, is largely in the interests of the people of the United States as well. It is to their interest—

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. JONES. An hon. gentleman says “hear, hear.” Does the hon. gentleman in any of his dealings with his fellow-man expect to have all the advantage on his own side? Why, is it a policy that no far-reaching statesmanship ever for one moment contemplates or desires. We desire, if we go to the United States, to say to them: Here we come offering you a trade which is to your advantage to do, and which during the time you had it under the operation of the reciprocity treaty proved to be such, and now with our enlarged commercial system, our increased number of railways, our increased population in Canada—and in the United States as well—we believe it will be a measure for our mutual benefit, and so, come, let us trade together. Why, the Minister of Finance when at Washington the other day made this proposition. I regret he is not here. How do we now know that the Minister of Finance did not make a proposal similar to that called for in the resolution before the House? We know he proposed a resolution there in the interests of extended commerce; and now we find a resolution brought down here under the direction of the leader of this House calling for a Chinese-wall policy of protection against the United States. Well, Sir, it appears to me that if the Minister of Finance were here to-day he would have either to explain his policy, or the leader of the Government would have to explain his. We seem to have Mikado and Tycoon in this matter, and I would like to hear whether the policy of the Tycoon at Washington can be reconciled with the policy of the Mikado in the House of Commons to-day. The hon. gentleman who resumed his seat a few moments ago said that the Americans were trying to coerce us in consequence of the hostile position we assumed during the Southern War. The hon. gentleman, I have no doubt, thought he was right in the evidence he offered; but if the hon. gentleman had occupied a seat in this House from 1874 to 1878, during the time the National Policy was first discussed in this Chamber and subsequently over the country, the hon. gentleman would have remembered the speeches made by his leader, by the Finance Minister, by every Tory member in this House to the effect that we are going to teach the United States their position. We were not going to allow them to have the advantage of our market, we were not going to allow them to make this a slaughter market for their products, and we were going to impose a tariff and a National Policy against the United States which was going to bring the United States to their senses in a very short time. I contend that those utterances of our public men on that occasion in this House and afterwards in the country did more than any other line of policy ever adopted, more than the National Policy itself, to embitter the public sentiment of the United States, the minds of the leading statesmen in Congress, against the people of this country who were gulled by such an utterance as that; and when, unfortunately for the interests of Canada, the Government came into power and had an opportunity to carry out their policy, they carried it out to the fullest extent, they carried it out with the boast that they were going to reduce our imports and trade with the United States, they were going to increase our trade with Great Britain and were going to teach the United States the fact that we could get along without them. The absurdity of that was seen from the beginning, the absurdity of that has been felt by every business man and by every farmer and by every man who has any acquaintance with the position of affairs in this country. We are living alongside of the people of the United States who want what we have to sell; they take, and they are the only people who will take and who can take what we have to dispose of, and we have to send them our products minus the duty which was imposed in consequence of the threatenings of the Tory party of this country. The hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat, indulged occasionally in poetical quotations. I followed him with a great deal of interest, and if he had confined himself to poetical quotations I am sure, in many respects, his statements would have been more accurate and more interesting to the House. The hon. gentleman indulged in a quotation from an unknown author, and as if to show how easy it was to descend from the sublime to the ridiculous, he first came down to the level of pork, and then by two or three steps at once, to oleomargarine. I thought, Sir, that the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue must have apprehended what the hon. gentleman was going to say when he walked over and took his seat alongside of him during the discussion, and if the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue could have only had the opportunity of giving him a wink and a caution, he would have said: "My good friend do not touch oleomargarine because, remember, that only a few years ago I brought in a Bill to enable oleomargarine to be imported and manufactured in this country." It was only on account of this strong feeling in this House that on motion of my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Paterson) who sits beside me, the permission of the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue was given to prevent its manufacture and introduction into this country. Leaving aside the hon. gentleman's conclusion with regard to our duty and our loyalty towards England, and I would not have a great deal to answer to. But, Sir, I would ask the hon. gentleman for one moment to refer back to the journals of the House in 1867, and he will find that the party which he follows to-day, and the leader which he serves under to-day, who was leader of the House and Government on that occasion, in the very first address from the Throne which he put into the mouth of the Governor General to deliver to this Parliament caused it to contain those words: "I congratulate you on the legislative sanction who has been given by the Imperial Parliament to the Act of Union under the provisions of which we are now assembled and which has laid the foundation of a new nationality." What does a "new nationality" mean, Mr. Speaker? Does it not mean the severance from the old country and could it mean anything else? A "new nationality" meant nothing less. It meant the independence which those gentlemen had been speaking about, during the whole political campaign that preceded the Act of Union, from every hustings in the Dominion of Canada, when public men stated publicly, that when we had attained our present position henceforth we were going to assume the duties and the aspect of a new country. I repeat again that on the very first occasion on which this House met after Confederation the hon. the leader of the Government put into the mouth of the Governor General those memorable words that "we inaugurated a new nationality." That, Sir, was the consequence and the object of the Union, as stated at its very inception. The hon. gentleman who spoke so eloquently with regard to our duty towards the old country would do well I think, Sir, if he would ask his hon. colleagues to explain their meaning, when, at the very first opportunity they had of meeting the representatives of Canada under the new system of government, they announced to them, as the policy of the Administration, that they were going to adopt a new nationality. Sir, it ill becomes any of those gentlemen to endeavor to brand the hon. members on this side of the House and to argue that we are endeavoring to lead the people away from the old country. They themselves were the first; their leader, their Government, and the leader of the present Government was the first to indicate to the people of this country at large that we had made up our minds to adopt a new nationality, which meant severance from the old country. Now, Sir, what did the hon. gentleman with regard to this question say? In addition to the charges they make against us of being unfair to the country, he said that we have not been able to prove that this policy would be of advantage to our farmers, our fishermen, and our various industries. Now, Sir, this question, remember, as I said before, a very few years ago, was not in the position which it is to-day. We were not aware then what the position of the question would be in the United States. To-day what do we see? We see a broad invitation from that distinguished man Mr. Bayard, the American Secretary of State, to Sir Charles Tupper, asking him to "come and discuss the questions in a straightforward treatment on a liberal and statesmanlike plan of the entire commercial relations between the two Empires." That invitation is the same as coming from the head of the Government, and, indeed, we had previously received almost a similar invitation from the head of the Government himself. This coming from the Premier, so to say, of the United States—the leader of the Cabinet, was an emphatic declaration on the part of the people of the United States, so far as the Government were concerned, that, in their judgment, the time had arrived when this question could be properly considered with Canada. Sir Charles Tupper, the hon. the Minister of Finance, who has since been in Washington, made a most cordial reply to this invitation. He did not intimate any desire on the part of Canada not to enter into the relations, but he says: "I entirely agree in your statement that we both seek to obtain a just and permanent settlement and that there is but one way to procure it, and that is by a straightforward treatment on a liberal and statesmanlike plan of the entire commercial relations of the two countries." Here, Sir, we have then the whole case before us. We have since seen a resolution introduced into Congress by Mr. Butterworth and, subsequently, by Mr. Hitt, and we have seen the public expression of opinion from public men in the United States with regard to this measure, and we believe to-day that they are watching with great deal of interest the discussions that take place in this House. The hon. gentleman has quoted occasionally from Mr. Wiman. Now, Mr. Wiman, I have no doubt, has given considerable attention to this question, and Mr. Wiman's idea would be quite in accord with the policy now under consideration here. He says:

"The second plan of unrestricted reciprocity to which in your letters you referred would be a most admirable arrangement, and next to the old reciprocity treaty would be most acceptable no doubt throughout Canada. It is as you say that the extension of the plan as laid down in the treaty of 1874, urged by General Grant on the part of the United States, and by the Honorable George Brown on the part of Canada. Had this negotiation been successful no Act in General Grant's Administration would have paralleled it in importance and beneficial results to the United States; while this consummation as a result of Mr. Brown's efforts would have added a lustre to a name already famous in Canada that would have been international in its scope."

Then, Sir, he goes on to say:

"The conclusion therefore is that while the first plan in the foregoing list—the old reciprocity treaty, is impossible, the second that of unrestricted reciprocity is possible only by the early and prompt action of the Canadian Government, speaking on behalf of the people and making at once the necessary propositions from which the knowledge of the fact, I believe could be promptly carried through in view of the agitation and interest which has been excited on the question here. If no such action is taken by the representatives of the Canadian Government it is impossible to conceive that the American Congress could be induced to initiate a move of this limited character."

Now, Sir, you will find by this that Mr. Wiman, who has given a great deal of attention to this subject, had come to the conclusion that unrestricted reciprocity such as we are advocating to-day was entirely in accordance with the sentiment in the United States and would find acceptance there. This question of our relations with the United States as I have said before has been considered at various places and has been spoken to by myself, and as I may be mis-quoted or partially quoted by the hon. gentlemen who follow me I will read what I said in the House last year while that question was under consideration:

"In regard to the treaty I think it very undesirable that here or elsewhere any expressions of opinion should be given as to the great desirability or necessity of a treaty with the United States. Shortly after the treaty expired there was a meeting held at the Chamber of Commerce, Halifax, when a resolution was moved calling on the Government to take immediate steps to renew it. On that occasion I said I thought that while it was well known throughout this country that our people were anxious for a renewal of the reciprocity treaty on equal terms, it was not wise or judicious that we should publish to the world from every commercial standpoint the opinions we entertained on that subject. I am aware this expression of mine was quoted against me on a recent political occasion in my own province, but I expressed it there in the same sense in which I would express it here, because I believe the Government recognising their responsibility in dealing with a matter of such importance, would be freer to act on behalf of our country if there was not brought to bear from the other side expressions of opinion from our own people that we could not live or prosper without trade relations with that country."

I took the precaution of adopting that policy for this very reason. I did not wish to say anything that might be used against us by those in the United States who are opposed to a reciprocity treaty with us, in any future negotiations which might take place. I remember very well the speeches which were delivered in this House, on the Washington Treaty, by the hon. leader of the Government and the hon. Minister of Finance. I remember those hon. gentlemen standing in their places and pointing out the great advantages that we were gaining under that treaty—pointing out that under it we were gaining everything and giving up nothing; and the speeches of those hon. gentlemen were quoted entirely in the American case submitted to the Halifax Commission. And while I did not suppose that my speeches would have so much importance in the eyes of the public as the speeches of gentlemen who occupy the high position those hon. gentlemen occupied at that time and still occupy, I was unwilling that any member of this House should make use of any language which American negotiators might throw up against us whenever we came to negotiate with them. Shortly after that I was interviewed by the Boston Globe, which was very anxious to know what we, in Nova Scotia, thought in regard to this matter. In that interview I said:

"I was a member of a Government and belong to a party that has always desired the closest commercial relations with the United States, and I do not hesitate to say that, if our party came into power to-morrow our first object would be, so far as consistent with our financial obligations, to place our trade relations with our neighbors across the border on the freest and broadest basis possible. I do not believe in Commercial Union. Neither country, I believe, would agree to it, but if the tariff of both countries could be reconsidered I think a way would be found by which we might trade with our neighbors, who are our natural customers, on a much more liberal and extended basis than we do at present. I believe that a great deal of bad feeling was engendered in the minds of the people of the United States and in the minds of her leading statesmen by the constant cry that was kept up by the Tory party of the Dominion during the time that the Liberal Government was in power, that they (the Tories) by pursuing a policy of retaliation would force trade concessions from the Americans. The Liberals of this country never desired such a policy. They desired the freest trade relations consistent with revenue requirements, believing that the more intimate our commercial intercourse was the better feeling it would engender among the population of the two countries."

"We cannot forget that we have a large interest in the New England States particularly. Their factories are operated largely by Nova Scotians, their fishing fleet is largely manned by our own hardy sons, and the number of people from Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island who have made their homes in their towns and villages it would be difficult to ascertain."

I was also interviewed by the Chicago Times which reported the interview as follows:—

"Hon. A. G. Jones, M.P., largely engaged in the West Indies and fish trades, has been watching with considerable interest the discussion of the question in the United States. Public opinion in Canada would be likely to shape itself in response to action that may be taken in the United States. The people of the Maritime Provinces would favor reciprocity in the limited sense, or a broader measure like Commercial Union, if that is found practicable. 'Our commercial interests are with the United States, and not with Canada,' Mr. Jones said. 'We have no binding trade interests between the east and west of Canada, and are ready to extend our commercial relations with any country that will take our products.' If the United States Government were disposed to favor unrestricted reciprocity with Canada, Mr. Jones thinks, no great difficulty would be experienced in adjusting details of the arrangement to the satisfaction of both parties. It is argued that free trade with the United States would be discrimination against the mother country, but Mr. Jones believes no opposition need be feared from that quarter. England knows that the surest way to make Canada contented with her political status as a portion of the Empire is to make her people prosperous. That would undoubtedly be the case under unrestricted free trade with the United States. 'I look on the proposition with moderate favor' Mr. Jones said, in conclusion, 'and am prepared to discuss it for the best interests of the country. It has not yet been made a party question.'"

Now, Sir, these are the opinions which I have expressed on this measure up to the present time, and therefore I feel perfectly free to-day in coming here and giving my allegiance to the policy set forth in the statements I have read. But, Sir, we have heard from hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House—and they have endeavored to propagate the idea in their papers—that the policy of the Liberal party to-day, the policy of unrestricted reciprocity, means direct taxation, the withdrawal of Provincial subsidies, the withdrawal of subsidies to various railways in the country. Sir, I take entire and immediate exception to that statement. There is no such plank in the platform of the Liberal party to-day; there is no necessity for any of these results in the arrangement we advocate for the approval of this country. We must come here and discuss this question in a fair and honest spirit, neither overstating nor understating the case, and I am prepared to say that we should probably lose a small amount of revenue under such an arrangement; but we should be able to economise in certain unnecessary expenses to the extent of a few millions. And, then, Sir, above all, instead of having our people in the condition we find them to-day from one end of this Dominion to the other, instead of finding their resources crippled, their energies hampered, their farms mortgaged, and looking with hopelessness to the future, we should have contented and prosperous people, a people with money in their pockets, and we know what it means when people have money in their pockets, for they spend it, and the very man who spends one dollar to-day, would, under such a condition of affairs, be able to spend three or four dollars to-morrow. Therefore, I look without the slightest apprehension to the change involved in the proposition before the House. If it involved anything approaching direct taxation, I should say, stay your hand; for I should say that this country could not under any system of government adopt direct taxation. Although it might be the most economical if people understood it, they have not been educated up to the great economical fact that direct taxation would be the cheapest system they could adopt. And therefore you have to accept public opinion as it is. No party in this country would stand twenty-four hours, if they went to the people with direct taxation on their banners.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I am glad to hear hon. gentlemen opposite agree with me. Therefore I take this exception at the outset, because I deny most emphatically that any such result can possibly be involved in the adoption of the policy which we recommend to-day. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman may say that it would be unfair to the country to discriminate against her with regards to the United States. Why, is it not equally unfair to discriminate against the British manufacturer, in so far as the principle and the sentiment are concerned, in favor of the Canadian manufacturer? There is discrimination against the British manufacturer. His goods cannot come in owing to it, and if they do not come in under one condition of affairs, they will not under another; and so far as the logic and the sense is concerned, it is just as unfair for this Government, under the National Policy, to discriminate against the English manufacturer by high protective duties in favor of the people of Canada, as it would be under other circumstances to discriminate against him in favor of the people of the United States. The hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries the other night dealt at considerable length upon the advantages of our inter-provincial trade which has arisen out of our present political condition. To fortify his opinion, the hon. gentleman quoted an observation made by the Attorney General of Nova Scotia. I thought, as the hon. gentleman made that quotation, he might have had sufficient respect for himself, as a member of the Dominion Government, to have avoided the sneer he indulged in when speaking of the Attorney General of

Nova Scotia, who is not here to answer for himself, by saying that he was a man who had made a great deal of noise about himself the last two or three years. If the hon. gentleman were to meet the Attorney General for Nova Scotia in debate, I have no doubt the Attorney General would be able to hold his own, and in his absence it is not very statesmanlike on the part of a member of this Government to attempt to belittle a member of the Local Government. Had the hon. gentleman quoted the Hon. Mr. Longley fairly, he would have had this advantage, that I would not be in a position to make the retort which it is in my power to make to-day. We very often find hon. gentlemen opposite making quotations from the speeches of hon. gentlemen on this side, without giving us the entire quotation, but only giving us that portion, which taken by itself, bears out the impression they endeavor to create. They are careful not to give the fair and literal meaning of what was said. Now what did Mr. Longley say at the banquet delivered at Boston? He said:

"God and nature never destined that Nova Scotia and Ontario should trade together. We trade with Ontario, to be sure. Their drummers permeate our country, and sell, $10,000,000 of goods annually, and we pay for them almost wholly in hard cash. Where do we get the money? We get it from the people of the United States."

Now, if the Minister of Marine and Fisheries had finished the quotation by giving us that part of it, he would have done Mr. Longley the justice, to which Mr. Longley was entitled. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries said that a large trade had been growing up between the east and the west. Let us see in what that trade consists. He says there is a large amount of sugar brought over the Intercolonial Railway. Well, there is, I admit, a very considerable quantity sugar of coming over the Intercolonial Railway, but when we find every year an annual deficiency of $100,000 to $200,000 in the working of the Intercolonial Railway, when we see $8,000,000 to $10,000,000 charged yearly as capital account to the Intercolonial Railway, half of which should go to current expenses, I ask, is it any great advantage after all to force this trade at the expense it involves. The hon. gentleman says that coal is brought over the Intercolonial Railway. Coal is brought from a certain county represented by the hon. the Minister of Finance, and we have the statement, in reply to my enquiry, and which the hon. the Minister of Railways had the frankness to put in his annual report as explaining increased expenditure and diminished receipts, we have the statement that every pound of that coal carried over the Intercolonial Railway was carried at a dead loss. Is that the way to promote trade in this country, by making such a sacrifice? Hon. gentlemen, familiar with this business, are aware that when we come to put a rate of three-tenths of a cent per mile on coal, that involves a loss to the country of a very extensive character. I have been told by gentlemen familiar with the business, and whom I consider as high authority, that about three-quarters of a cent per mile is the minimum rate in the United States, which, it is considered, will compensate for working expenses, so that when we come to cutting that rate down to three-tenths of a cent per mile, it is forcing trade at a very heavy expense, which the tax-payers have to bear. The hon. gentleman says that about three-quarters of a million bushels are carried over the railway. There again the National Policy comes into play. If we were clear of the National Policy to-day, we would not require to carry flour over the Intercolonial Railway at a loss because I suppose it hardly pays—at all events it does not more than pay—running expenses. What would we do without the National Policy? Why our national trade is with the United States; our little fishing vessels could in twenty-four hours take the product of our hard industry and toil to the United States, if we had access to those markets, and exchange them for flour, which they would bring back free of duty and land at our own doors, having got rid of what the late Hon. Joseph Howe called "the Canadian corn law," like the corn law which the people of England got rid of half a century ago, and people of the Maritime Provinces would not to-day be paying 50 cents more for their flour than they would if all the restrictions imposed by the National Policy were swept away, and they had free access to the markets of the United States. I say there is not a single article which we get from Ontario, or which Ontario or Quebec gets from the Lower Provinces, that could not be got on much more favorable terms if it were permitted by the operation of the tariff. There is not a single article that we get from the Upper Provinces that we could not get better from England or the United States if the tariff permitted us or if we were back in the condition we were in the happy days gone by. Hon. gentlemen say that a trade is being build up, but they are forcing it at frightful expense, and I say emphatically that a time in the history of this country will come when different opinions will prevail, when the people will see that their interests do not lie in the policy which is advocated to-day; and, when that time does come, there will be a fearful retribution and a shaking of dry bones amongst those manufactures which are fostered by the policy of to-day. The Liberal party would be unworthy of its standing in this country, unworthy of its principles and its traditions, if it did not, when it had the opportunity, wipe away the condition of affairs which I have pointed out, under which the present Government are forcing trade one way and that at an expense to the country and at a great cost and burden to the consumers. We find that in addition to being prevented from getting articles from our neighbors and from the old country which we desire to get, as a whole, under the operation of this tariff, for the benefit of a few manufacturers who can subscribe large sums for election expenses, we pay very much larger sums for everything we consume than we should do under other circumstances. Gentlemen here and elsewhere have pointed out, and have taken advantage of the country in this respect, that, as they say, for the last three or four years the people should look to see how cheap sugar has been, how cheap cottons have been, how cheap other articles have been during that time. We do not deny that these articles have been cheap during the last three or four years, but they have been cheap all the world over. The over-productions have been immense. The over-production of sugar has been enormous, and the improvement in machinery and the increase of mills has brought that branch of industry down to the finest possible point. But we lose all the advantage of this. Prices have gone down of late, and we have not had the advantage of it; and why? Because we are cursed by a policy which takes 25 per cent., 30 per cent., 40 and 50 per cent. out of us for the benefit of the manufacturers in order that they may have more money to subscribe for their party. I was surprised to hear the hon. gentleman ask what more did the taxpayers pay to-day than they did before the National Policy? I will only take one article. If the Minister of Marine had been at the meeting of the Combines Committee the other day, he would have heard a question and an answer given there which would have satisfied him, I think, that we pay more at least than we would under other circumstances. The question was asked of one of the sugar dealers: How much does sugar cost in England. His answer was, 16s. 6d. per 112 lbs. He was asked what that was a pound, and the answer was 3½ cents. He was asked what was the price in Montreal from the refiners to-day, and the reply was 6½ cents per pound. Only in that one article of sugar there is a difference of 3½ cents per pound, and that principle permeate, every manufactured article, every article that every man is obliged to consume and requires for the use of his family in this country.

Imagine what 3½ cents per pound of sugar means. It means from $7.50 to $8 a barrel. In the production of a refinery like the Canada Refinery in Montreal of 1,000 barrels a day, the gain to them and the loss to us is $7,500 per day. If you take that principle and apply it to every manufactured article in this country, hon. gentlemen can easily see that the argument adduced by my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) the other day, pointing out the increased cost of living under these circumstances, was amply justified. But that is not all. The difficulty under the present condition of affairs is this: We have certain articles to dispose of wherewith we purchase our needed requirements. The farmer has his wheat and his grain, his horses and sheep, and the various articles that he cultivates and raises; the fisherman, after his hard toil, has his fish, and the lumberman has his lumber; but where does it all go? It goes to the United States, and, when it goes there, to the only market which will take it, it is met with this heavy duty, and they have to take off the product of their industry, and they have that much less when they come back to Nova Scotia with which to buy all these articles which are protected, which are raised up here for the benefit of the manufacturers, but which those people cannot do without. They cannot buy in the United States. They can only take their product there, no matter what it may be or how small it may be, and bring back the price here and invest it in articles such as this sugar at $7.50 a barrel more than it should be. Is there any wonder that there is a mortgage of 33½ per cent. on the farms of Ontario? The farmers of this country have been living, but they have not been prospering, and they have hardly known what was the matter with them, but they are realising now the condition of affairs which has taken from them the legitimate product of their industry, and I venture to say that there is a fearful reckoning coming in the near future, when these men realise that for all these long years they have been gulled under the impression that they were getting these articles cheap and that they could not be produced any cheaper. I remember when the Postmaster General delivered a speech in his own county, when I had the honor of meeting him on an occasion which, I am sorry to say, did not have the desired effect. He was pointing out to his people there that the cause of all this cheap sugar and cheap cotton and cheap iron was the National Policy, was because the duties were so high, was because they had taken the duties up from 15 per cent. under our régime to 25 and 30 per cent. There was a little country lad sitting up in the gallery, and he said: "Well, Mr. McLellan, double the duties again, and we will get them just so much cheaper." It was a reasonable answer, and just such a one as the hon. gentleman might have expected.

After Recess.

Mr. JONES. When the House rose I was endeavoring to show that there had been a certain amount of inter-colonial trade as the result of Confederation, but it had been forced at a cost which was detrimental to the best interests of the country. I shall now proceed to deal with a statement made by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who said that we had failed to show that the National Policy had injured the interests of the fishermen and the miners. I will take our coal interests in the first place, and I do not know that I could produce to this House a better or a higher authority than Mr. Lithgow, of Halifax, a gentleman who is accepted in Nova Scotia as the mouthpiece of the coal interest in that Province. Now, when the duties were imposed on foreign coal, accompanied by the increase in the tariff, Mr. Lithgow took a correct view of the situation, according to my view, and, I think, according to the views of reasonable business men. But I will let Mr. Lithgow speak for himself. Writing on this subject at that very time, he said:

"Anyone acquainted with the wants of a colliery in Nova Scotia will tell you that the new tariff about doubles the duties payable under the old tariff, and that the duties now imposed on colliery plant and supplies average more than the duty levied on imported coal and coke. When I think how the National Policy proposed to foster our mining interests, of Mr. Tilley's proposing to impose such a duty as would give to home industry the home market, and then think of what it and he have done for the coal mines, I—well—better not write my feelings lest the Philistines rejoice. My conviction is the Cape Breton collieries are much worse off under the new than under the old tariff. They cannot now get any more for their coal; they cannot now put their coal into Ontario; they have now to pay twice as much duty as before. Messrs Redpath & Drummond, I will venture to say, make more profit within one year under the new tariff than all the Cape Breton collieries will under ten years, aye, or fifty years' protection the new tariff affords them. The Spring Hill and Pictou collieries, by means of subsidies, in the way of low railway freights, will be able to send coal into Canada, but the Cape Breton collieries, which cannot be thus favored, are in a worse position than before."

Mr. TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman tell me the date of that letter, 1879?

Mr. JONES. Yes, I suppose it was shortly after 1879. Since then we have put 10 cents on coal more than in 1879. But if Mr. Lithgow, who, I repeat, was considered a good authority at that time, says that the duties now imposed on colliery plant and supplies average more than the duty levied on coal and coke, it is evident that 10 cents will not benefit them to any appreciable extent. Then again, since that time the duty on anthracite has been removed, which has placed them still further in an unfavorable position. Then, Sir, take the Londonderry mines. The Londonderry mines, in the county of Colchester, were established under a Nova Scotia 10 per cent. tariff. They manufactured iron there for many years. They were fairly successful for a certain time, but the moment we came into Confederation, and all these heavy duties and charges were imposed, the result was that that mine, to my great regret, became embarrassed, and it passed into the hands of a large company. It went on from year to year and finally became bankrupt. A year or two ago it passed into the hands of a second or third company, and I hope sincerely with better success. Still, the past history of that undertaking will serve to show how those interests have been benefited in Nova Scotia. So, if the hon. gentleman did not understand how the National Policy had failed to benefit our fishermen, I think he is hardly the man who should be at the head of that important department. And if he cannot see how the absence from freedom of exchange and from liberty to dispose of the products of their fisheries in the only market that requires them, and how, handicapped with heavy duties, these people have to send their produce to that market, at no matter what cost, I think the hon. gentleman has lived a good many years in vain. I see it was stated recently by Mr. Wiman, at a banquet in Montreal, and I have not seen his statement questioned, though I have not had the time myself to verify it from public documents, that from the expiration of the first reciprocity treaty, down to the present moment, the products of Canada have paid 100 million dollars into the American treasury. Now, Sir, is it any wonder that the farmers and other interests of this country are suffering if, during that time, such a large amount has been paid by them on the products of their industry, and while they have been compelled to use that market, as the only one open to them? The hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan) told us the other night, that the farms valued at $800,000,000 were mortgaged to the extent of $275,000,000, on an average 43 per cent., and 6 per cent. interest on the mortgages imposes an annual obligation of $16,500,000. I say, Sir, this is a most startling statement. I regret that it cannot be questioned. I should have been delighted to have heard some hon. gentleman opposite show the hon. member for Huron had over-stated his case. When that hon. gentleman produced these figures, taken from the official documents of the country, and when no hon. gentleman opposite, up to the present time, has been able to contradict that statement, I say that we are brought face to face with a condition of affairs in this country which is of a most startling character. If the farmers of that fine Province of Ontario, with its excellent climate, have been brought, after so many years under the National Policy, to the verge of bankruptcy, as described by the hon. member for Huron, I say the time has arrived when every well-wisher of this country, with a sincere desire of benefiting that large interest, should endeavor to discover some means of amelioration, whereby the products and industries of that large class of our people may in some way be relieved. Sir, if that statement is borne out, as I have no doubt it will be, by the realities of their position, the farmers of Ontario have the matter in their own hands; and I have full confidence that when this matter comes to be presented to them, and when they see on the other side of the line a market for their produce in which it will bring as much as American produce itself—because our produce is a small affair compared with the productions of that great country, as was shown by the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) the other night—I say I have confidence that when the farmers of Ontario come to discuss this matter in their own homes and over their own firesides they will at no very distant day take it into their own hands and teach these Chinese-wall protection-men on the other side of the House, these men who want to build up "rings" and foster "combines" that wring from the farmers their very last cent—I say I have confidence enough in the intelligence of the farmers of Ontario and of the Dominion at large to believe that these men will be taught a lesson that will be of a very surprising character. The policy and extravagance of our Government which has taken on an average for the last ten years from eight to ten millions of dollars out of the people more than the actual necessities required has been another important factor in this question. We were told in 1878 by Sir Leonard Tilley in St. John, by the Finance Minister and by the leader of the present Government that we were spending too much money when we spent $23,000,000. The people were told that if they turned out the Government and replaced the Conservatives in power, they would be able to administer the affairs of the Government for a smaller amount. And what have we seen? When the people took hon. gentlemen opposite at their word and placed them in power the annual expenditure went up year by year by leaps and bounds until he has reached nearly $40,000,000 during the past year. We have now before us Estimates for $35,000,000, which, no doubt, will be increased by the Supplementary Estimates to $38,000,000 and probably $40,000,000. I say hon. gentlemen opposite have taken from eight to ten millions more out of the consumers of the country than the necessities of the case required, and when you come to add that amount to the $100,000,000 which have been taken out of the producers by payments on products sent to the United States, I repeat, is it a wonder that the farmers of Ontario are driven to the money lenders for their daily wants? Is it any wonder that the farmers and fishermen and in fact those engaged in every industry in Canada, except a few bloated manufacturers and combines, are laboring at the present moment under such severe depression? Badly as we are off undoubtedly, in the Maritime Provinces I am happy to say that I do not think the farmers there are in the same bad position.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I say I do not think they are, for this reason: We have a variety of resources in the Province of Nova Scotia, which perhaps no other Province in the Dominion possesses. We have not only our farming industry, but we have our fishing, and coal, and lumbering, and shipping industries, and our farmers are all, to a certain extent, more or less interested in one or more of those industries. Then, again, we have in parts of the Province of Nova Scotia a very large fruit industry which has grown up with the old country, and which has brought hundreds of thousands of dollars into our Province.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

M. JONES (Halifax). Yes. What has the National Policy to do with that? Those products are not consumed in Canada. When Providence in its wisdom has given us good crops in these directions were do we find our markets? We find them in England or in the United States; and, therefore, it is that I believe the farmers in New Scotia are not in the same position to the same extent as are farmers in Ontario. They have lived, but they have not prospered. There is a great difference between making a daily living, comfortable though it may be, and prospering, as honest, and industrious, and hard working, and intelligent men should. In a country like ours the farmers should not only live but they should prosper, and if you take from them by placing heavy taxes on the products of their industry, while they live they cannot make any accumulations for their old age. These may not have a direct effect, and many a man is day by day wondering why he does not do better, and why the present times are so different to the old times when we had reciprocity with the United States. The farmer raises as many potatoes and as many cattle, he catches more fish, and yet he is compelled to ask himself the question after a year's hard toil is over: Why are we in a different position to day from what we were doing the time the reciprocity treaty was in operation? The result is obvious. During reciprocity he had access to the American market and everything rushed to that market. Our potatoes found a market in the States—there is no other market for them. The potatoes of Prince Edward Island, which is one of their chief crops, found a market there—there is no other market for them. At the present moment those potatoes are taxed 15 cents a bushel. If you estimate that an acre will produce from 200 bushels to 400 bushels, you will find, taking the lowest calculation, 200 bushels, that the duty or incubus placed on every acre of land cultivated in potatoes in Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick amounts to $30. Sweep away the present tariff and give us unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, and what would be the result? Why, our farming industry and our farm lands would go up with a bound; every man and every farmer would know that he could put in a crop and cultivate his land, because that large country alongside of us afforded a boundless market for his enterprise; he would know that that country could take whatever he had to dispose of and his farm would immediately improve to the extent of $30 per acre. Take the farmers of Ontario. It is not very far out of the way to say that Ontario farms do not produce over eighteen bushels of wheat to the acre on the average, say twenty bushels if you like. The whole value of one acre of wheat in Ontario would not amount to as much as to a farmer in Nova Scotia or Prince Edward Island or New Brunswick, would save on the duty on potatoes sent to the United States. It must always be remembered that we have no other market for those products. Canada, as we call it in the Lower Province, for we call it Canada still and always will, takes no part of our products, it takes nothing from the Lower Provinces in the shape of natural products for it has its own. The West Indies take our products only to a very small extent, only a few cargoes, nothing in proportion to the annual product. They don't go to England, because England sends them out sometimes to the United States themselves, and here we are alongside of the markets that want them in the country we have at hand to send them to, no matter what the duty may be. I do not like to repeat that here, as it might be repeated against our case when argued elsewhere, but I do repeat here, Mr. Speaker, in the interest of our farmers that if the duty was 30 cents a bushel, and it only gave the farmers of the Maritime Provinces 5 cents a bushel or even 2 cents a bushel they ought to be enabled to place their goods on this market. Under such a condition of affairs when it is a matter of life or death to them, I say, Sir, with all the responsibility that belongs to the statement, that there is only one issue before us down there and that is either reciprocity or repeal. I say, Sir, that Nova Scotia when we had an opportunity and untrammelled by all the influence, and corrupt influence of a corrupt Government—I say, Sir, when we had a legitimate expression of public opinion in Nova Scotia, and when we went before the people of Nova Scotia under a proper Franchise Act, not being controlled by returning officers or corrupt revising barristers, the honest opinion of the people of Nova Scotia was in favor of repeal. If there is anything that is going to make them contented with the Union to-day it is to make them feel that the people here who are responsible for the policy of the country at the present momentous time are laboring to secure them a market which will open to them a channel by which they may realise the fruits of their industry. I say, and I repeat it again, that there is only one course open to them, and I say it here as I have said it before in my own county and elsewhere, there is only one question for us in the Maritime Provinces to-day—that is reciprocity or repeal. If you do not choose to labor to give us unrestricted reciprocity with the United States that feeling of repeal which is latent to-day will spring up again in all its force.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). It is dead long ago.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear."

Mr. TUPPER (Pictou). He said repeal was dead and buried long ago.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). It is dead.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The hon. gentleman will find out in his own county, if he ventures to follow his party to the extent which his approval would appear to indicate; he will find if he goes to the electors of Nova Scotia at no distant date what the public sentiment is on that particular point. I listened to the hon. gentleman from Bruce (Mr. McNeill) this afternoon, when he referred to this question. He taunted us to go to the country and obtain an expression of opinion on the policy we advocate. Sir, we are not in a position to go to the country.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). What I say, Mr. Speaker, is that we are not in a position to advise or control a dissolution of this House, but, Sir, the hon. gentleman and his friends are in that position, and let them dare to go to the country; let them if they dare go to the country on this question of unrestricted reciprocity.

Mr. McNEILL. I wish for one moment to explain to the hon. gentleman. I did not suggest he ought to go to the country in that sense. I suggested he ought to take a favorable opportunity for holding an election for the office of poundkeeper upon the annexation platform.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I suppose the hon. gentleman under those circumstances is prepared to be the candidate. I say, Sir, when the hon. gentleman who is challenging this side of the House with temerity and desired us to open a constituency and try the question of unrestricted reciprocity, that one constituency would do no good. Let him and his friends dissolve this House and go to the country and then we will see a corporal's guard scarcely, of those honorable, patriotic gentlemen who are willing to suffer for their country but do not seem disposed to die for their country. Now, Sir, the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) said that Montreal and Toronto were very prosperous. I am glad to hear it and it is only natural that it should be so. I am glad to hear it, I repeat, as I am always glad to hear of any part of the Dominion or any other place being prosperous. But, Sir, it is very easy of explanation. We know that since this Government has been in power within the last ten years they have added within a fraction of one hundred million dollars to the gross public debt of this country. We know that they have taken from eighty to one hundred million dollars more than they ought have done out of the taxpayers of this country by the iniquitous National Policy. We know, Sir, that those two large sums of money going into circulation and that Montreal and Toronto being the centres of commerce in the east and west of the old Provinces of Canada, must naturally have a great share of the advantage. We know, Sir, that those large centres of commerce, attract the largest amount of capital, and the property which had been distributed through the Dominion by means of those expenditures of from one hundred and eighty to two hundred million dollars has borne its fruit and those cities have been advanced. They have been advanced in no other way; they have been advanced at the cost of the whole of the rest of the Dominion, and just as long as those large cities go on and prosper in this way the rural districts will suffer to that extent. But, Sir, have they improved as much as it would appear from this statement. I notice that at a public meeting of the Board of Trade called at Montreal the other day that Mr. Drummond, that eminent sugar refiner of Montreal, who is the president, delivered an address, which I think the hon. gentlemen opposite would find very instructive if they read it. The speech was with reference to the Government assuming the debt of the Harbor Commission in Montreal. I do not propose offering an opinion upon the assumption of that debt, but I will say this much, Mr. Speaker, that it would have been a much more legitimate appropriation of the public funds of this country to cheapen the harbor in Montreal and reduce the expense attending the imports and exports of that large centre of commerce, than to have given the large sum of money they did give to a member of their administration to build up a rival railway to the Intercolonial which is owned by the Administration. Now, Sir, what did Mr. Drummond say?

"In opening the meeting he spoke in a manner that was little short of mutinous to his friends at Ottawa. Hitherto, he said, the impression had prevailed that Montreal would come out all right, no matter what happened; but now there was no use mincing matters, and it must be stated openly that this city had arrived at a crisis in its history. The charges in the harbor of Montreal were three or four times as great as those in the port of New York, and whilst the exports of the country had gone on increasing enormously during the last ten years the trade of Montreal had remained almost stationary. Montrealers had for years been amusing themselves in discussing plans for remedying the evil, but nothing really had been done, and to-day they were forced to acknowledge that Montreal was not in a position to compete with American ports. Outward exports were taking the route by way of New York because carriage alone was charged and all dues were abolished. This was not a Montreal question, but a national question, and it was gratifying to find that over one hundred members of the House of Commons had pledged their support to it."

It evidently seemed that they had done a little log rolling around the House and had secured the promised support of one hundred members of the House of Commons.

"The time had arrived for plain speaking. The port of Montreal was hastening with rapid strides to a condition of bankruptcy."

This is one of the cities which has been so highly favored by the National Policy, and Mr. Drummond continues:

"The income of the harbor commissioners was not sufficient to carry on the ordinary routine work of the port, and the inevitable result of Mr. JONES (Halifax.)

bankruptcy or repudiation was close at hand unless the Government took immediate action.

Now whether Mr. Drummond was right or wrong, that statement on the face of it does not convey the coulour de rose aspect of the prosperity of Montreal which hon. gentlemen on the other side seem so desirous to make out. Hon. gentleman have stated during this debate that this policy was going to injure the manufacturers. I need not go into that branch of the question because my hon. friends who preceded me have dealt with that question in such an exhaustive manner that it is completely unanswerable. Let me take one or two illustrations. It is evident, if the public prints can be relied on, that the Ontario manufacturers are not all of that opinion. We have seen from day to day statements made by Ontario manufacturers that they are not apprehensive of the result of unrestricted reciprocity; and these are men with a knowledge of their business, with ample capacity and ample industry. I say that wherever a manufactory was established under proper management previous to the introduction of the National Policy, it has succeeded, if not to a great extent of late years, to a sufficient extent to yield a fair return on the capital invested. My hon. friend the other night quoted also Mr. Gibson, one of the oldest and most enterprising business men of the Province of New Brunswick, who has built up a large cotton mill in that Province. He was interviewed on this question, and what was his answer? He said: "So far from my dreading unrestricted reciprocity, or apprehending any difficulty in connection with my industry from it, I should feel gratified that it would open up to me a market of 65,000,000 people, instead of 4,500,000 as at present;" and Mr. Gibson is a man whose judgment as a business man is relied on more than that of almost any other man in the Province of New Brunswick, and I may say in the Province of Nova Scotia as well. He was able to gauge the condition of his Province so well that when the question was put to him, he was ready to answer at once and emphatically that so far from his apprehending anything disadvantageous to his cotton industry, unrestricted reciprocity was just what he desired to see carried into effect. Then, I am informed by an hon. member of this House that the other day one of the proprietors of the new sugar refinery to be built in Montreal, in conversation with him, said: "We are putting in all our machinery of the most improved pattern, and are building our refinery according to the most improved methods, and if the unrestricted policy prevails, and we have a market in the United States, then, instead of having our market overcrowded every little while, we shall be able to compete successfully in all the border and Western States with the American refiners." Does anyone doubt a statement like that? Why should not our refineries in the Lower Provinces, and in Montreal as well, be able to do a large portion of the business in the American border States? Our climate is good, our labor is cheap, our coal is cheap, and we have capital for our enterprises, and instead of these large refining industries every little while being brought to a dead stop by orders from the head centre, or being limited in their production by orders to produce only so many barrels a day, so that a great many men are thrown out of employment—instead of having that condition of affairs, which will grow worse with the advent of another refinery to compete with them in the market, all these things would be changed, and they would have a constant market which would enable them to keep their enterprises going and give ample employment to their men all the year round. That is a consideration which may not have occurred to those less familiar than I am with that branch of trade. The refining industry of this country would be one of the first to reap the advantage of unrestricted reciprocity. I have said that we have cheap labor. Can anyone doubt that after the exposure made in the city of Quebec the other day before the Labor Commission? I noticed by a paper published here that the last statement made there gave the startling fact that mill hands in the city of Quebec could only get 35 cents a day, and that women were laboring in the match factories of Quebec for 15 cents a day. Is it any wonder that the people emigrate to the United States? Is it any wonder that these people should be dissatisfied? Why, one of our Nova Scotian or Canadian girls who goes to the United States as a domestic servant is able to earn from $14 to $20 a month with her board, while a poor girl in the Province of Quebec, who, perhaps, cannot leave her home, is laboring there for $3.50 a month and paying her board. If there is anything to show that we would be able to compete in the matter of labor with the people of the United States, it would be that startling fact which was revealed before the Labor Commission the other day. Now, Sir, I will give you a statement with regard to the general condition of affairs in the Province of Nova Scotia, made in a letter written by a gentleman in Halifax who worked as hard as any man in that city to defeat me in 1878, and succeeded. This gentleman has more small properties in the city of Halifax and controls more investments than any other man in that city to-day. I refer to Mr. James Thompson. Some one having stated that the value of property would not decrease in Halifax, Mr. Thompson wrote as follows:

"I saw in the report of a meeting of the Chamber of Commerce a few days since that one of the merchants of this city had asserted that the real estate of the Province had increased at least 50 per cent since Confederation. I was somewhat surprised at the statement, and am anxious to know from what sources the facts are derived which would warrant such a conclusion.

"Some years since I took the trouble to get the amount of the assessment rolls of some of the counties of this Province, and arrived at an entirely opposite conclusion. Taking four leading counties, representing the four of our leading industries,—Cape Breton as representing the coal mining interest; Antigonish as representing the farming interest; Hants as representing the ship-building interest, and Queen's as representing the lumbering interest, and we will find that the assessment rolls amounted in 1863 to $11,316,000, while in 1884—at the time he was writing—they had decreased to less than $3,000,000."

That is the effect it had with us, and since that time I may say that so far from having improved in value, their value has become less and less from day to day, until, in the city of Halifax at least, it is almost impossible to sell property at all. I notice in a St. John paper to-day the advertisements of property to be disposed off at public auction, and the auctioneer puts at the foot of the advertisements this notice: "Any bid will be accepted that will more than pay for the taxes and the rates." Well, we have had a large amount of property sold for taxes in Halifax. At one time last year, there were some two hundred or three hundred properties advertised for sale under the sheriff's hammer, and on one occasion a valuable wharf property, which had a few years ago been sold for $40,000, only realised just one half that amount. You can go through the streets of Halifax, from one end of the city to the other, and I do not hesitate to say that on enquiry you will find that since our free trade with the United States was put an end to, the value of property in the city of Halifax has fallen more than 50 per cent. A condition of affairs equally disastrous exists in other parts of the Provinces. Now, I come to the fishermen. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries must be very unqualified to fill the position he holds, if he does not know more about the interests of our fishermen and the way unrestricted reciprocity would benefit them than he was disposed to admit the other night. Perhaps the hon. gentleman in the receipt of his $7,000 a year, hardly understands the hardships and toil which our fishermen go through from year to year. Is he aware that at one or two o'clock in the morning, these men rise from their beds, light their candles, cook their frugal meals, and go out in their small boats miles from the land, encountering heavy weather, in cold and rainy seasons, and come back in the afternoon with the product of their day's labor—may be a few barrels of mackerel and herring or a few quintals of codfish? What are they to do with their harvest? These men know when they catch the mackerel, that their only market is in the United States; they know that only a few of the fish go to the West Indies; they know that every mackerel caught along the Atlantic coast, in the Province of Nova Scotia, of a valuable character—what we call our fat mackerel—must go to the United States, even if the duty were $10 a ton. These fish do not go to the old Provinces of Canada, they do not go to England, they cannot go to the West Indies, because being fat they will not keep in that hot climate; so that every barrel of mackerel, no matter what the duty may be, and no matter if it brings only a net return of one or two dollars a barrel, must go to the United States or be thrown overboard and allowed to rot. I hold in my hand the statement of a vessel which, in 1885, the year after the reciprocity treaty was terminated, landed 800 barrels of mackerel in the port of Boston. That may seem a large amount to any one not familiar with the question, and it is a large amount, far above the average. These men under ordinary circumstances would have been able to realise a very fair return, but when they went to the United States and had to pay the duty of $2 a barrel, what was the result? From their hard labor, from the 15th June to the 30th October, in rain and shine, in calm and storm, exposed to all the inclemency of that boisterous Atlantic coast, these hardy fishermen only realised, after all that long, hard summer's toil and labor, the paltry sum of $30 a piece. Can such a condition of affairs be allowed to exist while a remedy is possible? Can such a condition of affairs be allowed to remain, if there is within sight a possible arrangement which will open a market to the product of these hardy men? The Government would be unworthy of the position they occupy if they did not strain every effort, if they did not use every possible influence to open this market. I am not sanguine that we are going to convince any hon. gentleman on the other side. I know how strong is their party allegiance, I know that they will follow their leader, and that we cannot expect to convert them; but I know that we have an intelligent constituency behind every one of them, and it is to those men we are appealing. It is to the intelligent constituencies that we are addressing our observations to-day, and it is possible that some Robert Peel may come out from the ranks of the Tory party to carry a great measure as that illustrious statesman did the great measure of the abolition of the corn laws of England. It may be that some shaft, some argument, may go forth, which will reach the hearts and the convictions of some leader on that side, who, when he sees the momentous interests involved in a trade with 65,000,000 people alongside of us, and sees that by his efforts he may forward a scheme which is going to make two great peoples to a certain extent one, which is going to allay a great deal of the acrimony and disputes which have prevailed for years past, which is going to do a service and not a disservice to the old country, who, when he realises that England and America are the two greatest countries and may together bid defiance to the world, and that a peaceful alliance with the United States in our trade relations and a peaceful settlement of the Irish question, which, I am proud to say I have always advocated, and which I believe to be nearer accomplishment to-day than it ever was at any time in the history of that country,—are now, more than ever, desirable,—who, when he sees the immediate possibility of bringing these two great nations together in peaceful alliance and harmonious working, a great Anglo-Saxon race, will not be untrue to his own judgment, will not be faithless to his duty, and allow his prejudices to control him, but will give this matter the consideration we have a right to expect from every

hon. gentleman here. What is the position of these fishermen to-day? $500,000 per year is what the fishermen of this country, under the present policy of restriction, pay to the revenue of the United States; that is when they have a fair catch. All that would be changed, and the $500,000 would go into the pockets of our own fishermen.

An hon. MEMBER.—No.

M. JONES (Halifax). The hon. gentleman says no, but he is not sufficiently familiar possibly with that branch of the subject to know, as pointed out by the hon. member for Norfolk the other day, that, while we catch a certain quantity of fish, the Americans catch a much larger quantity. The price of these articles is settled by what the Americans produce themselves, and the quantity which we send, which is small to them but great to us, will go there and will not affect the price in their market, and we will obtain the same value. Does anyone suppose that the fishing industry of this country is to remain in the position we find it to-day? Does any hon. member desire that it shall always be kept in the same condition, that there shall be no further development of that great industry which a benign Providence has placed within our reach? What is the use of developing it to any further extent if we have no market? What is the use of our people making efforts to build new vessels, to send out new crews and to catch more fish, if we have no market for them? The market of the United States is the only market we can ever look to to successfully develop to any extent that great fishing industry along our shores. Looking at its position to-day, it is a matter of life or death to them down on the shore. One hon. gentleman quoted a statement from the Halifax Chamber of Commerce to show that the fishing industry was fairly profitable. What was said in that was not very committal one way or the other. They said that the prices were low in the early part of the season, but that, as they had advanced considerably later in the season, the result of the year's fishery had been fairly successful. How was that brought about? If the hon. gentleman had known this fact perhaps he would not have given this the prominence he did. In the early part of the season fish were very low. Then we found that we had hardly a good catch. That was not, however, the important factor. The fisheries in St. Pierre-Miquelon, which had been so much reduced the previous year, in spite of the ruinous bounty of 10 francs per quintal, were still further reduced, and they did not send out one-tenth of the number they sent out the previous year, and so reduced the catch of the previous season. The catch in Newfoundland was short, and it was almost a failure in Labrador; and then came the news that the great Norwegian fishery, one of the largest in the world, counted by millions, had been a failure to a very great extent. When all this was known in the consuming markets of Europe and elsewhere of course there was an advance in fish, and our men to that extent realised an advantage; but we cannot hope to expect, and we do not desire to see any such condition of affairs again. However, if it had not been for that condition of affairs, had it not been for the failure in all these places to which I have referred, the fishing interest in Nova Scotia would have been a very poor affair last year. But what had it been for the few years previous? If the hon. gentleman had been really interested in that question, he would have known that in the three previous years, instead of that industry being productive at all, the men had barely made a living out of it. Prices were so low, while the catches were large, and the United States markets were closed to them, that our own people as well as those in Newfoundland reduced their outfit and their catches as well. But, give us access to the United State market, give us access to the fifty or sixty millions of people alongside of us, then our fishing industry, with the millions and millions which are involved in it, would go forward with leaps and bounds, and there would be such an increase in that branch of commerce as would give wealth to that part of the country. The hon. gentleman asked us what was a natural market, and he said that France, if nearness was to be considered, was a more natural market for England than some of the distant places with which England had much greater commercial relations. The hon. gentleman might have stated his case with equal force if he had given us the whole condition of affairs, if he had stated that there were only two countries in the world with which England had greater trade relations than with the French nation alongside of her, and those are India and the United States. India, with its millions of people, must be and naturally will be for a very long time the greatest market that England possesses, and the United States, that Anglo-Saxon country, is the next greatest consumer of her products; but the French nation, alongside of her, was also valuable to her, as $250,000,000 were taken by the French during the year, according to the public records, and, although the hon. gentleman may not think that a very large amount, I consider it sufficient to establish the fact that, but for the immediate proximity of France to England, but for the free trade policy, inaugurated to some extent by Mr. Cobden and subsequently carried out to a certain extent, introducing better trade relations between those countries, it would not have amounted to the large sum it did. I would like the hon. the Minister of Marine to go along our coast when he visits Halifax next year, instead of allowing his gunboat to go down the shore electioneering in the county of Shelburne, instead of sending her down there to sound along every little harbor in the county of Shelburne, but of course not to make promises. Oh, no; we have the word of the gallant member for Shelburne (Gen. Laurie), that he made no promises, I do not say he did, but I say that, when he went down on board that Dominion gunboat, with the Dominion flag flying over his head, and the so-called engineer going into every port along that coast and sounding, and saying this would be a nice place for a wharf, and that would be a nice place for a breakwater, and you must require a lighthouse here—I do not say he made any promises, but the inference would be natural. If the Minister of Marine, instead of allowing his navy to be employed in that way, would go along our coasts himself and judge of all these questions, I think he would be in a much better position to give an opinion. He would find there one thing. He would find that our hardy fishermen are leaving us and going to the United States, as I am sorry to say. The hon. member for Bruce (Mr. McNeill) would say that sentiment should keep them at home and let them starve. Sentiment is very strong, but a man cannot live on sentiment alone, and, when these hardy fishermen go out in one of our own vessels and fish by the side of an American vessel, and the American vessel takes 1,000 quintals of fish, and our vessel takes 1,000 quintal of fish, and our own men are on board that American vessel and go into an American port, and get 50 cents a quintal more than the man who lands his fish in Nova Scotia, I say that sentiment will stand a very short time against such an argument as that. I know, from my own experience, that a large number of vessels last season were prevented from going into the fishery because they could not obtain the crews, because the men had all gone to the United States. Go down to the Island of Cape Breton, My hon. friends from Cape Breton here will bear me out—

Gen. LAURIE. Hear, hear.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The hon. gentleman confirms my statement, as I knew he would from his frankness. But I say, go down to the Island of Cape Breton, and there you will find that almost all the population, a large number of people there who used to be engaged in our shore fishery, have gone to the United States.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I know better, for I am engaged in that business myself. Years ago we used to have tens of thousands of valuable shore fish brought to the Halifax market and exported all over the world; that branch of commerce, as far as regards the shore fishery, is a thing of the past. Those men have gone banking, and under the new condition of affairs, and when they found that our fishing vessels could not fish on as favorable terms as the Americans, they emigrated to the States and engaged on board American vessels. When they go there they make acquaintances, acquaintance leads to friendship, friendship leads to settlement, and settlement generally leads to marriage, and the United States reaps the advantage we lose from their industry. This operation has been repeated from year to year as the years roll round. Now, Sir, the National Policy was started, if I remember rightly—I do not wish to misrepresent the Government—with four objects. The first was to encourage manufactures, second to increase our trade with England, third to reduce our trade with the United States, and fourth to secure reciprocity. Now, let us examine for one moment how far these objects have been secured. Take the manufactures first. Certain manufactures, no doubt, have been established in certain parts of the Dominion, and certain manufactures have made large sums of money. There were large manufactures before the National Policy, which yielded a fair return. Take the city of Halifax, which I represent—what did the National Policy lead to there? I venture to say that so far as the Province of Nova Scotia is concerned, the operation of the National Policy has been a curse instead of a blessing. What do we see with reference to the Halifax sugar refinery; $400,000 were put in that refinery. It went on for a year or two, but it lost all its capital, and owed the bank $250,000 besides. The bank sold out the property to the present proprietors, minus $100,000 which they lost; therefore there was just half a million dollars lost in the Halifax sugar refinery since it started. What it may do in the future I do not know, I only hope it may have a successful career. Then, again, you take the sugar refinery across the harbor. It was built by English capitalists at a cost of $700,000, and was one of the most thorough refineries in the country. It ran about twelve months and then failed. It was taken over by the bondholders for less than $300,000, and is now starting under their management. Therefore, taking these two operations alone, I show you most conclusively—no man can gainsay it—that in the city of Halifax alone, there has been one million dollars wasted, lost to the capitalists of that country—let alone the cotton factory in Halifax, the stock of which would not bring 50 cents in the market to-day, costing $350,000. That is the beneficent effect of the National Policy so far as we are concerned. Well, Sir, have they increased our trade with England, and diminished it with the United States, as they promised? We find that our exports to England, in 1878, were $45,941,000; in 1887, they amounted to $44,571,000, or $1,369,693 less in 1887 than in 1878. Then, take our exports to the United States. We were not going to do any more business with the United States, remember: we were going to teach them a lesson and build up a Chinese wall. Our exports to the United States in 1878 amounted to $25,244,898; in 1887, to $37,660,199, or an increase of $12,415,000 during that time. Then take the aggregate. In 1878, the aggregate with Great Britain was $83,372,279; in 1887, $89,534,079, or a gain of $6,162,760. Then take the United States. The aggregate trade in 1878 was $73,876,437; in 1887, $82,767,265 or a gain of $8,890,728. Therefore in this respect you will see that so far from the National Policy increasing our commercial relations with England, it has reduced them; and so far from decreasing our trade with the United States it has increased it; in these two respects it has been a total failure. Now, Sir, what we want below, as I said before, is free access to our customers across the line. We are here 4½ millions of people, speaking the same language, as has often been observed, with the same natural tendencies for trade, with the same industry, I hope, and with the same capability for business, I believe. I say, Sir, that if you can bring these two countries into closer commercial relations, and by some arrangement acceptable to the people of the United States, entered into at this favorable moment when the people of the United States seem to be considering this question, if the Government can make a proposal to them which will bring about such a change as I have indicated, then I think we shall be fortunate indeed. We want, moreover, in any arrangement made the coasting trade free to us from the Atlantic to San Francisco. Imagine, Mr. Speaker, what effect it would have upon the great ship-building interests of the Lower Provinces, of the Province of Quebec, and, of course, of the Western Provinces as well. We are naturally situated for ship-building all along the Atlantic coast. There is not a harbor along that long coast line, there is not a creek on the eastern or western shores but where you will see small vessels and vessels of very considerable tonnage being built year by year. They can be built more economically with us than in the United States, because the wood is at our hands, and they are built by our own people largely during the season when there is no other employment or occupation. Imagine, I say, if you throw open to the people of the Maritime Provinces that great boon, the right to buy American ships or to sell our vessels in their market, what an impetus it would give along our sea coast. The Americans cannot compete with us as regards the cost of vessels. I repeat that their wood is more expensive and there is a difference in values of about twenty-five or thirty per cent. This has always given us a certain advantage in our fishing outfits and enterprises, and if we had access to their markets from Maine to California, it would open up a wide field for our sailors and fishermen, of which they would immediately take advantage, and we would see hundreds of vessels built along our coast for employment in the coasting trade of the United States. In all this matter there is no one question greater than this: reciprocal coasting trade and reciprocal registration of vessels. I listened the other night, with a good deal of amusement, to a quotation made by the Minister of the Interior from a speech or document purporting to be written or spoken by the late lamented Hon. George Brown. I thought that if dead men's bones could rattle in their graves, or if a voice could come to us from the tombs, what maledictions would we hear from that old Reformer, that any utterance of his should ever be construed into an approval of the monstrous policy under which this country is laboring at the present moment. That old Reformer who devoted his whole life to freeing commerce from its shackles, to securing for us free trade, and to promoting the good of his fellowman, would have been the last man to have countenanced such a policy, and he would have scorned the idea that any sentiment that he ever uttered or any word he ever wrote could be brought forward in support of the policy of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. No, he lived in different times under different circumstances. He lived in times when commerce was free; when it was not necessary for a householder to go hat in hand to ask a "combine" if he might buy so many pounds of sugar. He did not live in a time when a house-maid on going to a grocery store had to ask most humbly from the "ring," "combine" or guild or whatever they call it whether she might buy a bottle of pickles. He did not live in a time when a boy on going to a store had humbly to ask permission to buy a box of matches valued at two cents. All these are natural consequences of "combines" and guilds. Does any man suppose the Hon. George Brown would approve any such conditions and the imposition of such burdens on the trade and commerce of the country? No, he lived in different times. He lived in times such as are indicated by Tennyson when describing the glorious reign of her present Majesty, he said:

"And statesmen at her council met
Who knew the seasons when to take Occasion by the hand, and make
The bounds of freedom wider yet."

We in this matter are bound to go forward, and this question has come to stay. We are bound to carry it to a successful conclusion. It may not be this year or next year, but within a few years the hon. gentlemen opposite will remember what I am telling them to-night, that public opinion in this country will not sustain the action which they are going to adopt, that public opinion will be in harmony with the sentiments proposed by the hon. gentlemen on this side of the House and the policy embodied in the resolution of the hon. member from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). We are going to make this the great question of the country for some time to come. We believe the people will approve our efforts; we believe, when they are educated, they will see the vital importance it is going to be to every industry in which they are concerned, and they will come to our assistance. We are going into the battle, and we are going to inscribe on our banners as the watchword, as the motto, as the text of the Liberal party, these noble sentiments echoed by the Secretary of State for the American Union, Mr. Bayard, who when writing to a friend a short time ago said: "Providence has made us neighbors, let wisdom make us friends." Mr. Speaker, in conclusion I beg to move the following amendment to the amendment:—

That in any arrangement between Canada and the United States providing for the free importation into each country of the natural and manufactured productions of the other, it is highly desirable that it should be provided that during the continuance of any such arrangement the coasting trade of Canada and of the United States should be thrown open to vessels of both countries on a footing of complete reciprocal equality, and that vessels of all kinds built in the United States or Canada may be owned and sailed by the citizens of the other and be entitled to registry in either country and to all the benefits thereto appertaining.

Mr. TUPPER (Pictou). I was somewhat surprised, Mr. Speaker, this afternoon after a statement made with such assurance and with such exultation by the hon. gentleman who has led the other side in this debate, that from the Maritime Provinces especially should come a wail for unrestricted reciprocity. I was somewhat surprised, I say Mr. Speaker, under those circumstances that a question said to be exciting such an amount of interest among the business people of the Maritime Provinces was brought before us by a gentleman old in politics, a gentleman well acquainted with political strategy, a member representing his party from the Province of New Scotia, travelling back to the dusty journals of this House for 1867 in order to attempt to bring arguments to bear against the Liberal Conservative party on a charge of having been at one time disloyal to the interests of the Empire. It struck me as a curious commentary upon the boasted strength by their principles initiated in bringing the main resolution before this House, that an hon. gentleman holding the position that the hon. gentleman from Halifax (Mr. Jones) the senior member from his Province does, that he thought it necessary, and thought it wise, to labor, and hopelessly labor for some minutes before the Parliament of Canada with an argument so puerile and so weak. The hon. gentleman devoted some time calling the attention of the House to what his contention actually was and that contention being that the language which he quoted from the mouth of Lord Elgin, representing the Crown in this country conveyed sentiments traitorous to the Crown and sentiments at variance to the sentiment which brought about the connection of this country with the mother country and which serves to this day to maintain that connection. It seems strange to me that the hon. gentleman had not read a little more diligently the journals of 1867 since he turned his attention to old and ancient literature, because on page 248 of the same volume he would have found that that Parliament by him thought to be so disloyal, by him thought to be so in favor of sentiments of independence from the mother country, had resolved:

"That in the opinion of this House the interests as well of the British Empire as of the Dominion and of the several Provinces of which it is composed will be best promoted by the maintenance and consolidation of the existing Union, and that this House confidently trusts that due attention to the interests of the people of the whole Dominion and a wise and judicious course of legislation will result in the general acceptance of the Union to the inhabitants of the Dominion and conduce to the well-being and harmony of the whole country."

In support of that resolution he would have found the names of gentlemen whom I hope it is not unparliamentary to mention by name and which I do for convenience sake, the names of Cartwright, Mackenzie and Mills—landmarks that perhaps might have induced him to steer clear of a point such as the one he had raised. I think the hon. gentlemen in this House will have been amazed when they reflect that before six o'clock the arguments of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) were so few, that the arguments of the hon. gentleman were so weak and that up to that time he had hardly reached the resolution, and hon. gentleman will be justly surprised that a gentleman occupying the prominent position that he does in mercantile business in the Province of Nova Scotia and dealing as he said himself every day in the fish market, selling fish and buying fish, that that hon. gentleman, acquainted as he is with all the different branches of trade, and knowing the circumstances of our trade in that Province, has not attempted to deal with the resolution before the House. So far as he touched the question of reciprocity he argued for a long time (and most of the members of the House agreed with him) in favor of the treaty of 1854. He went on to show that the interchange of articles mentioned and enumerated in that Treaty had been beneficial to both countries alike and that in the Maritime Provinces there was a strong wish for the renewal of that interchange. No man to-day attempts to gainsay that statement. But when for a moment the hon. gentleman did allude to the resolution before the House he showed, as strongly as he could show, the strength of the position of this side of the House on that question. Then he said if this contemplated move, this contemplated turn of affairs, "change of front" I think he called it, meant direct taxation, that he for one would call "stay your hand." Yet he had the direct statement made by his leader in this debate, he had a long and able argument before him to show that direct taxation was not such a terrible thing. He had before him the unmistakable utterances of the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) that direct taxation would ensue from the passage of this resolution.

Mr. CHARLTON. No.

Mr. TUPPER (Pictou). I quote his words to do him justice:

"Can they afford for the sake of gaining advantages amounting from fifteen to thirty millions to submit to a direct taxation of two millions or three millions temporarily. I should say if the necessity existed the people would cheerfully submit to the impost."

Mr. CHARLTON. Notwithstanding I distinctly said that it was my belief direct taxation would not be resorted to.

Mr. TUPPER (Pictou). We have had the expression of the belief of those hon. gentlemen oftentimes before. We have also the experience between 1874 and 1879 that no calculation ever made by the financial leader of that party in reference to either the revenue or taxation was ever borne out by the facts, and that no prophecies ever made by him at any one time were ever verified by our experience in those sad and troublesome years. It did amuse me to-night, and I am sure it amused hon. gentlemen in this House generally, to hear some of the sentiments enunciated by the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones). He apparently to use an old phrase came "cringingly" up to one issue that stared him on the face, and that was that he had to take back a great many sentiments and a great many principles propounded by him in public in his own Province, and in this House, and in the Chamber of Commerce of the city he represents. He knew, and therefore feared that those principles would be brought against him, and he pretended to go over the whole of them, stating some of them, and endeavoring to follow his leader by spurning and treating with contempt any charge of inconsistency. But it did amuse me, Mr. Speaker, and it somewhat pleased me as a Canadian, to hear the hon. gentleman, who within this House, last session, indignantly denied that he was a Canadian in any other sense than by an Act of Parliament which he abused and which he villified, declare to-night, after his leader from Queen's, Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) that he was going to follow the banner that had upon it the inscription "Let us consider the interests of Canada first," and not only so, Mr. Speaker, but I remember that this hon. gentleman fought under a banner only a year ago—hardly a year ago—which had inscribed upon it "Nova Scotia for the Nova Scotians against Canada for the Canadians"; under a banner upon which was inscribed the words "Don't forget that repeal means reciprocity; only by repeal can we get reciprocity," and yet he adds to this new banner which he flaunts in the air to-day the words "reciprocity or repeal," thus reversing all of the mottoes and every old standard in that respect. No one can blame him. His leader in this debate, the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has boldly announced that there is a complete change of face, and that his party are to a unit upon the principle against which they were diametrically opposed a short time ago. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, in all earnestness, and I ask through you to the people of this country, whether hon. gentlemen in this House representing the interests of Canada, representing the interests of their constituents can so glibly go behind a record? I ask you, Mr. Speaker, if it is merely a charge of inconsistency with which they are now met? In my opinion the position of the Liberal party as announced in this House and in this debate is of a far more serious character than that which they suppose. They cannot go behind the record in that manner. They cannot say that what they thought a few years ago or a year ago can be all upset now. The hon. member for South Oxford said he would not waste time over charges of inconsistency. I say that the charges standing against him to-day, brought in this debate and still unanswered, are charges of a gross breach of faith on the part of the great political party for which he speaks—charges of a violation of distinct and emphatic pledges made by the leaders of his party all over the country more than a year ago to capital and labor, which has embarked everything in this country under those pledges. From 1867 almost down to 1887 every capitalist and laborer in Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific had the right to believe that both political parties in the country were pledged to reciprocity in the natural products of the two countries, and no other. Not only by the statements of their leader at Malverne but by resolutions moved in this House, it is clear that both parties in this Parliament had pledged to the manufacturing interests that their money was safe.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. TUPPER (Pictou.) An hon. gentleman says "no," but he in his position is bound to say "no" to any proposition propounded by us in this debate. Hon. gentlemen opposite are in a desperate position, and they are right to say

"no" when their late leader is on the other of the ocean. But that leader, when he said he spoke not only for himself, but for the party he represented, and especially for Sir Richard Cartwright—for he named him—that leader pledged his party not to play the bull in the China shop if they were returned to power at the last election; but you have never seen more furious bulls than the hon. gentlemen who have attacked the manufacturers and the vested interests of this country. They speak as if these men alone are guilty of these horrible combinations in trade, although they know that guilds have invaded other countries than Canada, even England, the mother of free trade. But it is a serious charge which I bring against these hon. gentlemen, and it cannot be answered in a flippant manner, but must be squarely met; and I will ask the House to listen to some proofs which I will adduce in support of it. We had an admitted organ of the Liberal party in 1880 using this language:

"What is the main promise of those who wish to detach the Dominion from Great Britain in order to make the country a preserve for Yankee manufacturers, who are totally unable to compete with British manufactures on fair terms? That the producers of our raw exports may gain free admission to a market of 50,000,000 people. The inference which it is hoped that ignorant people will draw is that the whole American people would straightway wish to purchase Canadian produce if a Zollverein were established. But free admission to the markets of California, Oregon, Nevada, Idaho, Arizona, New Mexico, Texas, Kansas, Missouri, Kentucky, Arkansas, and dozens of other States would cause about as much Canadian produce to be sold there as could be sold to the inhabitants of the moon. Of the 50,000,000 people assumed to exist in the United States how many live in a locality to trade with Canada? Parts of the half-dozen States lying east of longitude 90° and between parallels of latitude 40° and 45° contain the people with whom we are asked to form a commercial union, taking their manufactures at exorbitant prices. One little corner of the 'market of 50,000,000 people' is offered to Canadians as the price of their national extinction! Men who advocate a base surrender of their country for money do not cease to be disgusting though they become also ridiculous when it is evident they are duped by their own sordid imagination."

I am reading from the Toronto Globe. Again on June 8, that paper said:—

"Who can name any great staple that does not command as high a price in England as in the United States? The American farmer gets no more for his grain than his Canadian competitor, as is evident from the fact that both send their produce to the English market. It may be said that Canadian barley would rise in price if admitted free to the American market. How long would the enhanced price be continued? Only till a greater breadth of Canadian soil was devoted to raising the grain."

Then, again, the same paper said:

"The average yearly value of fish exports from Canada during the seven years between the termination of the reciprocity treaty and the fiscal operation of the treaty of Washington, from 1867 to 1873, was $4,003,375, of which $1,137,839 worth was imported into the United States, and $2,865,535 worth was absorbed by other markets. Thus, under a tariff meant to be prohibitive, 28 per cent. was marketed in the United States, and 72 per cent. in other countries. In the six years which have transpired since the removal of duties under the Washington treaty, from 1874 to 1879, these exports have averaged $5,971,867, of which $1,720,156 worth was imported into the United States, and $4,251,731 worth found other markets. The percentage to the United States was a trifle over 28, and that to other countries was a fraction over 71. Whilst the annual increase of fish trade during this latter period average $1,958,512, only $582,317 worth represents exports to the United States, the business with other markets having increased to the extent of $1,386,196 yearly average."

It went on to show that the Americans paid any duty which they placed upon Canadian fish. That was the position of the organ at that time, and it is perfectly reasonable for hon. gentlemen to claim that they are not on every occasion, perhaps not on any occasion, to be held bound by the utterances of that paper. But, as I can show, that paper voiced not only the opinions of the party, but of the country in that most unmistakable manner. The senior member for Halifax has admitted that he has made statements contrary in spirit to the arguments he now advances, and he does not hesitate to tell us that his political morality is of that high order that under the exigencies of the case he felt that it was justifiable that we should deceive the Americans—it was not right that we should stand up in the face of day and tell the truth about the state of trade in Canada, we had to mark carefully the effect any utterances of ours would have on the Americans; and he fulminated charges against the leader of the Government and other men in the Cabinet, because in discussing grave questions in this House they had given expression to their thoughts. And this political moralist confesses as much as that he has supported the statements I have made; but whether he confesses it or not, I will show from the record that it is impossible for him to gainsay the fact. For instance, when the Washington Treaty was before the House and I may say that this extract as well as some others the hon. gentleman took care not to read the hon. gentleman said:

"He felt as a representative from Nova Scotia that, however anxious he might be for the establishment of reciprocal trade relations with the United States on fair terms, he was not willing to give the United States everything that we had to offer as an inducement to reciprocity. If we gave them permission to fish in our waters we put them in competition with our own fishermen."

Again, the hon. gentleman said, when a resolution on this subject was before the Chamber of Commerce:

"That the Chambers of Commerce at Halifax unite with the board of trade in St. John in requesting the Dominion Government to take prompt and effective steps to arrange a reciprocity treaty with the United States and to make efforts to secure advantageous trade relations with the Spanish and British West Indian Islands."

The hon. gentleman, then a prominent member of that board, and previously a member of the Dominion Government, used the following language:

"He thought that too strong an expression of opinion might injure our prospects. He believed in the maxim, never be too anxious make a trade. In speaking at a public meeting he referred to reciprocity in the West Indies. That was the larger and more important question."

And yet, Sir, you heard to-night the hon. gentleman declare in loud, stentorian tones that the American market is the only market for those poor fishermen who lit their lamps and went out to sea in their little boats in early morning. To-day he tells us that the American market is the only one for those fishermen, but he did not hesitate on a former occasion, when it suited his purpose, to tell the Chamber of Commerce in the city where he lives, that to obtain control of the West Indian market was the important question for the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces. Again he is reported, in his own organ, the Halifax Chronicle to have said:

"Hon. A. G. Jones said he had come to listen rather than to take part in the discussion, but thought it was well to be careful how we proceeded in this matter. The cause might be injured by being too strong in expression. There was an old adage that it was not well to be too anxious for a bargain. No person believed in reciprocity more than he, but he thought the exercise of caution might be the wisest course, that was all. He found that no one in the Dominion objected to a Reciprocity Treaty with the United States on fair terms."

What was the hon. gentleman's object may I ask to-night in indulging in the strong expressions he made use of as to the absolute dependence of the Maritime Provinces in the United States markets? What was his object in taking this stand to-night, and calling on us to appear in an abject manner before a rich and powerful country which has in view many ambitions and far reaching projects. It was not well, he said, before the Chamber of Commerce, to be too anxious, but we should take a wiser course. He then found that no one in the Dominion objected to a Reciprocity Treaty on fair terms, and we have utterances by the hundred of a similar character from hon. gentlemen opposite up to the very time when, as now, it seemed probable that we would have reciprocity ultimately, that we would have a reciprocal tariff on fair terms; up to the time when all this seemed possible, as it does now, you had all these hon. gentlemen, all over the country, declaring this was not a political question, declaring that we were all one on the question of reciprocity with the United States—but the change of base to-day is sudden. It comes after a general election, when that party, driven to desperation, are now hunting daily for a policy, and almost daily proposing a new one. For ways that are dark and tricks that are vain, that party has proved itself most peculiar. The hon. gentleman tells us to-night he did not believe in Commercial Union. He read from his scrap book, what he said to some gentlemen who visited him in his store at Halifax. That hon. gentleman, as we all know, has a considerable influence with the Halifax Morning Chronicle, which is supposed to be the exponent of his views. He has told us: "I do not believe in Commercial Union, and neither party would, I believe, agree to it"; but his organ, the Halifax Chronicle, did not hesitate, time and again, to use language, which I would not like to use in reference to the hon. gentleman, when it said that "the Canadian who opposes Commercial Union is a natural-born sneak and coward." We know, and I must mention it in justice to the writer of these lines in the Chronicle, that an hon. gentleman on the back benches had the temerity, was plucky enough, to introduce a resolution, going the whole length of the opinions of an hon. member who is more pliable, the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), a resolution going straight for Commercial Union. How did hon. gentlemen opposite treat this man, who, according to the Halifax Chronicle, was not a natural-born sneak and coward. They told him to withdraw his resolution, and go in for that which the organ of the senior member for Halifax has characterised as that of a natural-born sneak and coward. Language of that kind from the friends of hon. gentlemen opposite is, I think, unfair, and on their behalf I repudiate it. I do not think it is fair criticism. Now, we had a very important utterance from the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), who spoke at some length on reciprocity the other day, and who indulged in many arguments which are quite tenable by hon. members on this side, in vindicating the old Reciprocity Treaty, and dilating on the advantages which the people of the Island derived under it of sending their potatoes and other articles where they pleased. That hon. gentleman representing the maritime contingent in 1885, in this House, on the Liberal side, moulded together all these expressions of opinion, blended together these different views from the different Chambers of Commerce throughout Canada in favor of the old Reciprocity Treaty, and I would bring before the House the language the hon. gentleman used, in support of the point I am endeavoring to make. He alluded to the resolution of the Chamber of Commerce which I have read, spoke of the desirability of a renewal of the treaty of 1854, and strongly favored making the fisheries a basis and measure for further commercial relations, concluding an interesting speech and able argument with the following resolution:—

"In view of the early termination of the fisheries articles of the Treaty of Washington, this House is of opinion that negotiations should be opened with the United States of America, as well for the renewal of reciprocal relations accorded by that treaty to American citizens and British subjects respectively, as for the opening up of additional reciprocal trade relations between Canada and the United States, and that in the conduct of such negotiations Canada should be directly represented."

He cited, as I have said, the strong opinion in the Maritime Provinces in favor of a renewal of the old Reciprocity Treaty; and later on, the ex-leader of hon. gentlemen opposite, speaking for the whole party, stated that the policy of his party was the policy of a tariff for revenue purposes only. He contended that he was consistent, inasmuch as it was no new departure, because this Government, through its extravagance, had made it necessary to raise a certain sum per year, and he could not see for the life of him, having studied the matter in every aspect, how that tariff could be materially interfered with, and he pledged his party at Malvern, as strongly as any statement of his could pledge it, that even if his party came into power, he would not play the bull in the China shop, but would respect vested interests and only abolish the duty on coal and cornmeal. I ask again, how is it, after these pledges to the people, after this declaration of policy, not only from the mouths of the statesmen of that party, but by their resolutions in this House, they should propose now this entirely new departure, as it is declared to be by the senior member for Halifax. The question of the tariff and of reciprocity was threshed out, as many others raised in this debate have been threshed out, by the people at the polls; and they understood, no matter how loud demagogues might rant, that we could stand by the National Policy and at the same time stand by the interests of those concerned in the natural products of the country, and that we could, with the consent of the people and with their desire, as soon as possible, obtain reciprocity in natural products with the United States. As a Canadian, I blushed to hear the hon. gentleman who opened this debate take the position, in support of his resolution, to induce the people of this country to favor unrestricted reciprocity, that this country was in a state of retrogression, and that our position was not satisfactory. He told us, it is true, that great economic changes had taken place. He attempted to justify this change of base, not by argument, but by the statement that it was due to great economic changes, and that, therefore, the charge of inconsistency was a weak one; but he alluded to the economic changes which took place between 1867 and 1877; he alluded to none, he could cite no such changes between 1887 and 1888, and 1887 is the time when these pledges were put solemnly before the people. Unlike Mr. Wiman and Mr. Butterworth, who have shown much more skill in managing this question and endeavoring to persuade some of our countrymen to get into the position into which the American manufacturers wish them to get, he argued by the hour to show that we were going metaphorically to the dogs in Canada and that the people would be benefited by any change. I deny, and I deny emphatically, that the country is retrograding, and no hon. gentleman has been able to maintain that position by any statistics which have been laid before us. We have been told with what skill some gentlemen can manipulate statistics, and that you can prove anything by statistics. So you can. It depends on the honesty with which you use them. I will not weary this House by showing the credit side in contrast to the side of the account which those hon. gentlemen have placed before the people, to sicken them, to take the heart from them, to fill them with despondency and despair, and to make them feel that any change would be a change for the better. I will call before the House some hon. gentlemen occupying official positions in this country, I will call before the House as witnesses hon. gentlemen from one end of the country to the other whose position cannot be questioned, statesmen occupying distinguished positions in this country, and I will cite their statements as to the condition of Canada. The testimony which I can produce is such as will bring pride in the heart of any honest Canadian or any true lover of his country. I will begin by a gentleman whose praises are often sung by hon. gentlemen, I will begin by citing the language of Mr. Mowat, the Premier of Ontario, who is, I take it, in full accord with these gentlemen in their political schemes and who would do anything, I take it, that he could do, in any justifiable manner, to enable them to obtain power; but, when he met the happy Canadians who fell into a crowd in another part of this country on that day in last July, which seems to be such a black and dark day to hon. gentlemen opposite only in this debate, that hon. gentleman was able to say, and to say truthfully:

"If they compared their Dominion with the United States, they would find that they had nothing to be ashamed of. (Hear, hear) A comparison of the statistics of both countries for the past half century would show that the percentage in every department was greater in Canada than it is, on the aggregate, in the United States; and as Canada had prospered in the past, so she would in the future."

Would you have heard the hon. gentlemen on that side of the House using language of this kind in this debate without thinking that there was mutiny in the ranks? Would you not have thought that any hon. gentleman who used that language must have gone behind the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) and must be advocating, as he is, some scheme different from that of the leader. Allusion has been made to another gentleman, the Minister of Education of the Province of Ontario, a well-informed man, an able man, a man who is proud of his country, a man with Canadian pluck and Canadian vim, and a man who is enabled to look at Canadian affairs with hope and to take a good view of what has taken place in the past and of what is probable for the future. That hon. gentleman, whom I had the pleasure of meeting a short time ago, uttered then the same sentiments as those which I quote. They have been alluded to before, but this evening I am bringing forward the words of gentlemen who occupy a position in this country which I have not, gentlemen whose words cannot be confuted by hon. gentleman opposite. This hon. gentleman, who sat for a long time in the House of Commons and who is now in an important position in the Government of Ontario, was called to face Mr. Chamberlain during the short stay which that gentleman made in Canada, and, like all Canadians who are proud of their country, he was able to make a good showing for Canada, and was able to tell that distinguished gentleman from England that—"It is Canadian enterprise that has made this country. It is a great deal to have done that. Had he seen it fifty or forty or, perhaps, thirty-five years ago, or thirty years ago, when our forests were unbroken, when our industries were undeveloped, and when we had scarcely a mile of railway, he would have said that not even the most enthusiastic and sanguine expectations could have hoped for a condition of national prosperity such as we have in Canada to-day."

He also said:

"There is abroad a spirit—"

Is it a spirit of despair, as the hon. gentleman would tell us, a loss of national hope and a feeling of dependency upon our neighbors? Not so. He says:

"There is abroad a spirit of enterprise which only waits the natural growth and development of ordinary opportunities and time to produce results which we can scarcely dare even to imagine in case we should be charged with exaggeration or perhaps something worse. There are $174,000,000 in our savings banks, and of paid-up capital of our railways there are $623,000,000. We possess all the advantages of civilisation, and are surrounded by all those influences which tend to make up a peaceful, happy and contented people. I am glad he has seen these things, for it has sometimes struck intelligent Canadians, when they have been visiting the old country, that among Englishmen—though not of course, among those of Birmingham (laughter)—there exists very erroneous ideas with regard to the civilisation and comforts and happiness of the Canadian people."

And that is the language used in 1888, by a leader among the gentlemen who stand up here and sing, as the hon. gentleman who spoke last sang, mournful ditties in reference to the condition of our people. So this Commercial Union, or unrestricted reciprocity, or anything which may get our necks under the yoke of American manufacturers, is referred to by the gentleman who has promoted it so much, in a pamphlet which is called Commercial Pamphlet No. 4, in which he takes issue with these hon. gentlemen:

"By a uniform tariff against all nations, she has shown her real and complete commercial independence, and under this condition has made a progress and attained a position of which every Canadian has good reason to be proud."

Now, why do they not, like men, come and face the issue and discuss it on the merits, and not occupy the time of this Chamber and the time of this country by abusing our country, by minimising its resources, by telling us everything is going wrong? Why do they not come up like men, as Mr. Wiman has done, and as I believe, as far as I have seen, Mr. Butterworth has done, and tell us plainly that the reason why we should join our destiny with that of the United States is not on account of our poverty but on account of our strength, and that, as enterprising men who have built up industries here, as Mr. Wiman says, and have built up a position which should bring pride to every Canadian heart, we will be benefited by joining our destinies with theirs, and marching on in the same line with them, of united prosperity. I could respect their arguments in that line, but, instead of that, they take up the whole time by keeping as far away from that resolution, as far away from the particulars of that resolution, as far away from the tariff that would be framed under that resolution, as far away from the condition of the revenue which would result under that resolution as possible, and by talking to us about our miserable and wretched state. They know, Mr. Speaker, that their position is unsound, and is opposed to the latest utterances of any of them when speaking without strong feeling of partisanship. Now, I have cited some evidence; and I would recall, too, the eloquent language of the late leader of that party, a gentleman now regaining health, I hope, on the other side of the world. That hon. gentleman was able to speak in the most elegant language at Edinburgh, when he met an old colleague of Mr. Chamberlain's. He told Mr. Gladstone, and was able to boast in Edinburgh, of the magnificent strides in the path of progress made by his native Province of Ontario. He used language that I wish to God we could hear oftener from him and from his colleagues in this House. It is the language used on this side of the House, it is language that would give hope to the young men of this country, and would spur us on to greater endeavors in the future. The hon. gentleman who leads in this debate, on the other side of the House, when he went to England to borrow money, when he asked the English capitalists to invest their money in this country, did not harangue them in the style, or upon the facts or matter, that he has done on this occasion. Every hon. gentleman is familiar with the bright side of the shield that was shown then, and the honest side, as well. I have given you, Mr. Speaker, some testimony that I think ought to carry weight as to the condition of affairs in this country, and to prove that the position taken by the hon. gentleman is unsound. I wish to quote, also, the language of the hon. member for South Oxford when he sat on this side of the House in 1818, on an occasion when he visited the Maritime Provinces. I am not now dealing with the childish charge of inconsistency. In citing language previously used by the hon. gentlemen opposite inconsistent with the language used by them in this debate, I cite it for the purpose of the argument contained therein, and I cite it for the purpose of proving the insincerity of this movement. At Halifax, on August 19, 1878, when, as every one knows, and as no one has denied, the condition of affairs in Canada was far worse than it is to-day, when hon. gentlemen were apologising, so to speak, all over the country for the condition of affairs, this hon. gentleman, who now tells us that there is retrogression and that the country is getting into a frightful condition, used this language:

"These men who tell you that it is impossible to exist as a commercial people unless you have reciprocity might as well tell the United States that if they want to drive you into the Union all they have to do is to refuse you reciprocity for a certain number of years longer, which is the very best way that can be adopted of inducing the American people to enter into commercial relation with us. For my part I will deny that we are dependent upon them in one way or another. No Canadian statesman can do a worse service than to spread that idea among a great number of his fellow-countrymen."

What is the hon. gentleman doing now, Mr. Speaker? Driven, as I say, desperate by the serious reversals which he has met with at the hand of the people, kept out of office for so long a time, after having changed his political faith in order to obtain office, that hon. gentleman is now pursuing a course which he said no Canadian statesman worthy of the name would pursue, and so affect a portion of his fellow-countrymen. Well, we were particularly referred to the Maritime Provinces. The hon. gentleman seemed doubtful whether he could convince the splendid yeomanry of this Province, of whom I now speak, with whom I have had the pleasure of conversing, and whose condition I have examined, he seemed doubtful whether he could convince them that they were in this dependent, this abject, this poverty-stricken condition. But with that contempt for the Maritime Provinces which seems, in this debate, to have characterised the utterances to which I am about to allude, he turned around and said he expected to hear something from the Maritime Provinces. He expected to hear a wail of woe sounded from that quarter. Yet I will do my hon. friend the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) the credit for saying that he rather turned the table on his leader for the nonce. He told him that down in the Maritime Provinces the farmers—if I do not misrepresent his language—were not so badly off; it was the mortgaged ridden farmer of Ontario that was suffering, and his leader might turn his attention to his neighbors and not treat the Maritime Provinces with contempt. I think I can fancy the reason of the sincerity of the hon. member for Halifax. I think I know why he did not talk about the drying up of the cities by the sea. That is a great phrase in the mouths of the Reform leaders in the east, that we are drying up in the Maritime Provinces, that we are not as rich as we used to be, that real property has gone down, that assessment is low, &c. I think I know why the hon. gentleman drove slowly over the ground; I think he had read the words put into the mouth of His Honor the Lieutenant-Governor of Nova Scotia, at the opening of the present Session, wherein his own allies in Nova Scotia politics, now snugly ensconced in office, stated that they were happy down by the sea, and that things were not going wrong. This is the language of the hon. gentleman's friend and ally, Mr. Fielding, put into the mouth of His Honor on the 23rd of February, 1888:

"1. In welcoming you to the scene of your legislative duties, I am glad to be able to congratulate you on the fair measure of prosperity enjoyed by our Province during the past year. While in some quarters exceptional conditions have operated unfavorably, as a rule the labors of our people, in the various branches of industry, have been remunerative and there has been an improvement in business which, it is hoped, will continue."

"2. I have particular pleasure in calling attention to the activity that prevailed in mining, an industry of great importance not only because of the capital and labor engaged in it, but also because of its value as a contributor to our provincial revenues."

The hon. gentleman touched a little on another subject, the effect of reciprocity on the coal trade, that branch of trade that brings to the coffers of the Provincial Treasury such a large proportion of its revenue. The hon. gentleman knows that there are members in this House from the coal regions of Nova Scotia that could meet him upon any ground such as that which he took only for the moment from Mr. Lithgow. And en passant I may say that I was surprised, that I was amazed, at that hon. gentleman's attempting such a weak thing, at his laying himself open to the emphatic answer that he did. Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman who formerly represented Pictou in this House (Mr. Vail) read this old letter of 1879 from Mr. Lithgow, and yet he was answered in this House, and the hon. gentleman must have known what the answer was, that Mr. Lithgow took it all back after experience. Mr. Lithgow prophesied that the duty on coal would be of no advantage, he wrote as the hon. gentleman said he did, but he was honest enough, and sensible enough, after experience, to take back every word that he penned in that letter; and he sent it to the press, but that is not kept in the scrap book of the hon. gentlemen opposite. They do not keep the bright side of the shield now-a-days, they have turned that away in hopes that it will rust. Now, the hon. gentleman ought to know that the statistics of his Province are against him, if he attempted to stand up here and asperse too heavily the fair fame and commercial position of the Province of Nova Scotia. He knows well enough that he and I had to pay, as taxpayers, for the publication of a document issued after the so-called repeal victory, when these men—I won't say demagogues; perhaps it is not fair—but when these men had the hardihood to go all over the Province from one end to the other, and talk about Nova Scotia as Ontario members have not hesitated to talk about Ontario. Those hon. gentlemen when they found themselves in responsible positions holding the seals of office, ambitious of a good record and a good showing while public affairs were under their control, published at the expense of the people of Nova Scotia an official document to be circulated broadcast in the British Isles. And what did they tell us of the condition of that country long years after the abrogation of reciprocity, twenty years after Confederation, twenty years after the time when we were threatened with commercial annihilation? These so-called anti-confederates, these so-called repealers, these so-called secessionists, these so-called annexationists, were induced to confess to the world that everything in the Province of Nova Scotia was lovely, that any man who had brains, that any farmer who had industry could obtain in a short time a livelihood, impossible to get, where? In the mother country alone? No, but in the American union as well. They issued a document, a copy of which I hold in my hand; it was issued by the Government of Nova Scotia in 1885 and it gives the names of the members of the Government. I wish to quote from it somewhat at length to show the hollow hypocrisy of the party that has taken part of the colors of our party, and patched up a new flag at this time of day. I wish to quote from this document also to bear out what I have said. At page 16 we are told:

"There are plenty of farms already under cultivation which may be bought at very reasonable rates, and any practical farmer with a small capital may at once possess a good and comfortable home."

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. TUPPER (Pictou). I am glad the hon. gentleman is pleased.

"And by energy, industry and enterprise may make for himself a fortune and position in Nova Scotia in a few years, such as he could not obtain in a lifetime in Great Britain."

Here we come to the poor workingman that hon. gentlemen opposite are so fond of commiserating, and I suppose the fisherman is included. The report says he gets very well paid in Nova Scotia,—and this is twenty years after the abrogation of reciprocity, and several years after the introduction of the accursed National Policy to which the hon. gentleman has so eloquently referred. On page 37—I like to stick to the record, and especially to the record of the hon. gentleman—this is the statement:

"By moderate industry the owner of such a place can rear his family, on better food probably than he could give them in England, with the same expenditure of capital and labor. And that is about all the average Nova Scotia farmer attempts. He does not knuckle down to his work in the severely continuous style that is practically compulsory in England and Scotland."

The hon. gentleman tells us the farmer barely lives; but he does live, and when the hon. gentleman's friends were clothed with the responsibility of office they did not hesitate to say that the farmer does not knuckle down to work as the farmers in other countries do. The report continues:

"If he had a reasonable rent to pay, as well as a living to earn, he would be compelled to work harder, to cultivate less superficially, to loiter less around the country store, to do less riding in his buggy, to get his woman folk to make more butter and less pastry, and in short by dint of having to make a struggle to escape eviction and bankruptcy he would often land himself into a state of comparative affluence. But there is not much hope of any such result from the average Nova Scotian farmer."

"Mr. Imrie's description of the average Nova Scotian farmer is pretty nearly correct, but in every county in the Province there are farmers who are pretty considerably above the average, who have placed themselves and their families in more than comfortable circumstances, and have by their industry and attention to business acquired considerable wealth. Such men are second to none in intelligence and standing in the Province."

What condition of affairs does my hon. friend expect? Is he looking for some Utopia where a farmer can obtain more than that, where by honesty and industry he can obtain more than a comfortable living in Nova Scotia? Is he to roll in wealth without working; or what is the condition of affairs to which the hon. gentleman would prefer we should bring the people of the country? Next, as regards shipping. That hon. gentleman attempted to teach me, as one of the inhabitants of Nova Scotia some years ago by his long speeches that American shipping under the tariff of the United States and under their shipping regulations was being swept off the sea, the condition of trade in the United States and the condition of labor there was frightful to behold. But the Government of the day in Nova Scotia, in sympathy with, perhaps in council with the hon. gentleman, but at all events the Government of the Liberal party in Nova Scotia, said in 1866, in this report at page 17:

"Nova Scotia owns more shipping in proportion to the population than any other country, and our vessels do a larger proportion of the carrying trade of the world."

Mr. WELSH. When is that?

Mr. TUPPER (Pictou). In 1866.

Mr. WELSH. How is it now?

Mr. TUPPER (Pictou).

"They may be found in every port of the habitable globe, loading and discharging cargoes on our own and foreign account."

I knew the hon. gentleman would contradict me, but I did hope he would not contradict the official organs and publications of his own party. Well, then, it is not unreasonable for me to suppose that the hon. gentleman had some reason for passing lightly over the condition of affairs in Nova Scotia in supporting the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford. I wish to complain of a habit in which the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), indulges as a representative statesman of this country. The comparison which the hon. gentleman makes between the condition of affairs in Canada and the United States is unfair to Canada and unworthy of him. I say that no comparison he has made has been fair—he has never acted as any reasonable man would expect him to act, when making a comparison. He compares our condition with the condition of the United States when they have sixty millions of people, at a time when they have startled the world by the leaps and bounds by which they have gone forward in the path of progress, at a time when they have reduced their national debt almost one-half, at a time when everything in that country so far as matters affect us are definitely settled. He compares our condition at a time when in the States all secession is gone, not at a time when, as in Canada, small politicians are endeavoring to set Province against Province. I say if the hon. gentleman were fair, if he had the courage of his convictions, if he were strong in the faith he preaches to this House and the country, he would compare our condition with that of the United States when they had four or five millions of people and not when they have fifty or sixty millions. We may not live—perhaps we may—to see sixty millions of people in this country; but there are many men who have looked into this matter whose views can be accepted who have not hesitated to say that, judging from our past progress, our future will be even greater than that of our neighbors to the south. Let me give you, Mr. Speaker, a few statistics, not many, to show and to explain the unfairness of this argument. For instance, he speaks of the frightful and alarming reductions in our aggregate trade and he takes for his illustration two years. He takes the year 1873 and he takes the year 1887. He calls attention to the fact that our aggregate trade has dropped from $217,000,000 in 1873 down to $202,000,000 in 1887, and he tells us that is an alarming state of affairs and that we must ponder over it. Well this so-called reduction being admitted, I must remark that he did not tell us the other side of the story. When that hon. gentleman took charge of affairs in 1875, when he refused to adopt the National Policy, when he attempted to hold our markets with a 17½ per cent. reduction against the American competitor, the retrogression began. In 1875 it dropped to $200,000,000 and when in 1876 when that hon. gentleman was in power to $175,000,000, and in 1879 to $153,000,000. That hon. gentleman as an ex-Finance Minister of the country standing here to explain honestly, and candidly, and fairly our financial condition tells the House and tells the country that we are in an alarming state, and that there was an alarming reduction in the volume of trade. I will read you when in 1878 this reduction was going on most rapidly, the statement made by that hon. gentleman vindicating the position of Canada, glorying in the position and boasting of our commercial strength, but he told the House then something different to what he tells it now. He told the House that these were not alarming features, although the volume of trade was being reduced. When he made his finance statement in 1875 he did not hesitate to say:

"It is not necessary for me to spend any further time in reviewing the volume of our exports and imports."

It had dropped then below the figure at which it now stands.

"I do not consider that it is any proof that a country like ours is retrograding in any way because there is a check to the exports. Many authorities who are entitled to great respect are inclined to think that we have rather overstepped the mark in our progress in this direction."

Now, Mr. Speaker, this shows the inconsistency and insincerity of the hon. gentleman advancing an argument like that as compared with what he advances to-day. I shall ask the House to bear with me in vindication of the position of our country as compared with the United States. I compare the total trade, the volume of trade, as the hon. gentleman calls it of the United States when they had a population of 17,000,000 with the condition of affairs and the volume of trade in Canada, when we have five million. In 1840, the aggregate trade of the United States, amounted to $239,000,000 or about $14 per head of the population. In 1850 it still amounted to $14 per head of the inhabitants, who numbered then to 23,000,000. We have seen that in Canada, during the year 1887, when the hon. gentleman says the volume of trade has decreased so alarmingly, that it amounts to $202,000,000 on the figures which he gives, and that this represents $40 per head for every Canadian in this country from one end of it to another. I say the purpose seems to me suspicious when an hon. gentleman of that gentleman's ability stoops to an argument so unfair and an argument so directed against the position and against the reputation of his own country. Then about the exodus. How he delighted and how every year he seems to delight over the exodus which he says is taking place from the older Provinces to the West or to the Western States. And he thinks that those features are alarming. Well, Mr. Speaker, we have his colleagues on record with utterances on this point which will give us hope. We have, for instance, the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones), when it was his business—it was his pleasure, I hope—to sound a different note in Canada, and when he did not think it was necessary to rouse sectional feeling, and to talk about the desire of the Provinces to get away from Confederation. He came as Minister of Militia to Halifax in 1878 to render an account of his stewardship;

he came and he admitted the exodus from Canada, which is admitted by all sides and cannot be gainsaid, at a time when the people were leaving the country in large numbers. The Minister of Militia said:—

"Why, we find those very people clamoring to get back to Canada. What is the reason for this? It is because those men, attracted for a time by the high wages offered in the States, now find themselves utterly without the means of support, and are desirous to come back to this country of Canada—this wretched country of Canada."

We have, fortunately, statistics giving the condition of our friends on the other side of the line. Taking the States of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Connecticut and Rhode Island, and comparing them with the older Provinces of Canada—Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island—the statistics show that according to the census of 1830–31 there was a population of 1,953,717; in 1881 4,010,206, showing an increase in 50 years of 2,056,309; whereas the figures for the older Provinces of Canada show, in 1830 and 1831, 1,065,215; under the last census 4,141,424, showing an increase of 3,076,209, as against 2,000,000 in the States I have mentioned. Now, Mr. Speaker, one is almost forced when the argument, as far as the statistics are concerned, shows different results, to think that the figures have been made to suit a purpose. It reminds me of the story of the judge long ago, who, in dealing with a case before him, asked the counsel to explain where this land was situated in reference to which there was a dispute. One counsel said the land lay on this side (pointing to one place), and the other counsel said that it lay on the other, and the judge wanted to know what he could do in the matter. The debate has shown that figures can be used in reference to the condition of the country in very false lights. For what purpose did those gentlemen ransack their brains and devote their ingenuity in a most unfair manner to try and show that a deplorable state of things exists in favor of a country which we all ought to try and advance in every way possible. Now the hon. gentleman came to the question of inter-provincial trade, and as the Minister of Marine has devoted considerable attention to that I do not propose to go very closely into it, but I again appeal to the record. I again ask the House to take as some proof in support of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that an inter-provincial trade exists. My friend from the Maritime Provinces will say that there is less inter-provincial trade existing to-day than existed in 1878. Mr. Power in his address to the electors of Halifax in 1878 said that the quantities of furniture, machinery, &c., sent into those Provinces from the upper Provinces were such that if the tariff be increased as the Conservative leaders proposed and as would be the case if the Conservatives were returned to power those Provinces would be flooded with Canadian manufactures of every description. The senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) in the same year, when referring to Nova Scotia being the slaughter market for Canada, speaking to the people of Nova Scotia, said:

"But where does the competition come from in regard to Nova Scotia manufacturers of which I regret to say we have not more?"

They were in a bad state in those days.

"It comes almost exclusively from the old Provinces of Canada."

Then you will see, Mr. Speaker, that the grievances of the hon. gentleman's allies in Nova Scotia are not against manufactures as manufacturers, but against manufacturers as Canadian manufacturers, since Canadian manufacturers come from the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec. The party opposite is welcome to an ally of that description, Ontario and Quebec. The hon. gentleman endorsed the statement of Mr. Longley that even under the present condition of affairs those dried up Provinces, those Provinces dependent on the United States could get $10,000,000 from the States every year to send to Quebec and Ontario for those manufactures. Well, this is a happy condition of affairs and there is nothing to complain of in that. The hon. gentlemen want the money from the United States and the hon. member from Halifax says they can get it. Then he tells us that this trade, which he is forced to admit does exist, is not a natural trade, but a trade forced over the Intercolonial Railway at great cost to the people of Canada. Now, I will answer the hon. gentleman by a letter he wrote a short time ago, in which he insisted that instead of that being a cause for complaint, these ruinous rates of the Intercolonial Railway were actually too high and ought to be lowered. Only a year or two ago, he wrote to the press, saying:—

"We did indeed complain of the rate on sugar being too high, both for us and for them, as has been abundantly proved during this winter, when all the sugar for Montreal, instead of being landed here, as heretofore, has, by the unwise and narrow policy of the Dominion Government, been diverted to New York."

I call the attention of the House to his particular reference to the rates on sugar and coal.

"The Intercolonial was built to promote and accommodate the industries of the country, and to facilitate inter-communication at the lowest possible rates. It was never expected to pay as an investment any more than the canals of the west expected to pay interest on their cost—and my complaint is that the rates have always been too high, and that the department have not carried out the object for which the road was constructed."

He says again:

"I repeat my contention, therefore, that the rates of sugar are and always have been too high, both for the Montreal refiners and for us as well."

The rate was then 18 cents.

"I am not disposed to find fault with the Government for making this reduction in tolls, as I think it wise policy that so far as possible our public works should be made the hand-maid of commerce, and on the same grounds the rates on the Intercolonial Railway should be very considerably reduced so that the object for which the road was constructed may be carried out and all parts of the Dominion receive the advantage of it in that way."

Could inconsistency go further? Now, on the question of fish the hon. gentleman, as was natural, dilated. He endeavored to persuade this House—and he based the statement on his reputation as a dealer in that article—that we pay the duty on fish, and from that argument the House was called to follow him through the rest of his argument to show that we pay the duties on the other articles we export to the United States. Well, Sir, the day was when the hon. gentleman would have spurned that proposition, inconsistent as it is with the teaching of every teacher of Free Trade. The day was when he did advocate a very different theory—the true Free Trade theory, that the Americans paid the duty on what they bought from us. In August, 1878, when the senior member for Halifax was not the free lance he is now, ready to fire a shot at his own allies if by it he can gain an advantage in the Lower Provinces, when he was not ready to join any movement in the hope of getting his party into power—that hon. gentleman, holding an official position, at a time when his utterances were weighed more carefully than they are now, did not hesitate to tell an audience in Halifax that:

"Fish are sent to the United States and the West Indies, and are not affected in their value in any way by any regulation that may be imposed here or elsewhere."

I might go on quoting from the language of the hon. gentleman. Time was when he found it necessary to oppose a measure of reciprocity with the United States—to oppose the Government for obtaining the concession of free fish from the United States. To-night we hear a great deal from him about the advantages of free fish in the American market; we are told that the poor fishermen pay the duty to the American Government, and what a boom it would be to them to have it taken off. But the hon. gentleman opposed a measure to take the duty off in 1872, when he belittled the whole Washington Treaty and all the advantages that Canada was gaining under it, as many members of the opposite party have done, as the hon. member for North Norfolk did as late as 1878, when his own friends were charged with not having done much in that direction. The senior member for Halifax at that time said he had found that under the Reciprocity Treaty, over seven per cent. more of our fish went to the United States than when the duty was imposed, and he said the paltry amount given to Canada only amounted, in the year which he took for the computation, to the small sum of $94,000 on the quantity exported. But an hon. gentleman in this House, who holds perhaps a more important position in his party, who does not fight them in his own Province, or abuse or villify them when he turns his back on them and comes to Ottawa—the hon. member for Queen's, who is an authority on fish, who played an important part in the negotiation at Halifax and there obtained some knowledge that he should now impart to the minds of those hon. gentlemen who are so fierce about the advantages of free fish—that hon. gentleman, in my hearing a few years ago, when speaking on another subject, said:

"I am not going into the great question of who pays the duty on the mackerel, the consumer or the producer. The general question has been debated very often in this House, and it is not applicable to this peculiar business. The question in this case depends simply on whether or not the home production at the time is equal to the home demand. * * I acknowledge that in some years we have to pay the duty to some extent, and I am now speaking, mark you, of only one species of fish, mackerel, for which the Americans give us our sole market, but ordinarily we do not pay the duty because they do not catch enough off their own coast to supply the demands, and the price goes up sufficiently to induce us to supply the deficiency."

And mark my words, if these hon. gentlemen discuss the new treaty, that has been laid on the Table, you will hear them talk about the exhaustion of the fisheries on the American coasts, and then we shall be able to form the conclusion who pays the duty. It is true, the hon. member for Queen's only referred to mackerel, but the hon. gentleman who buys fish every day and makes his money out of them, did not hesitate to oppose the Washington Treaty, and to tell this House as a merchant that it was of no advantage to the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces. I do not intend to say whether he is right or wrong; I am not taking that line; I am exposing—and I believe I have succeeded by the proofs I advanced—the hypocrisy of the party, which in this eleventh hour, in its desperate position, has nailed these false colors to its mast. Hon. gentlemen opposite have expressed their love for the American manufacturers, and if we adopt their ideas of what they consider beneficial for the American manufacturers, and give up what we consider beneficial for the Canadian manufacturers, then we will go in and enjoy the benefits of this union, which some call commercial union and others unrestricted reciprocity; we will adopt some change or any change, so long as it will excite a popular feeling which will bring hon. gentlemen from that side of the House to this. The real design of our American friends is shown by the language of the advocate to which allusion has often been made. What did Mr. Butterworth say in the United States? Did he go through that country like a demagogue, telling them they were all going to ruin, that protection had ruined their shipping and their farming industry, and that trade combinations all over that country necessitated a radical change? No, and this is, indeed a curious coalition which has been forced between Mr. Butterworth, an out-and-out protectionist and these men who have been haranguing all over the country in favor of free trade. Mr. Butterworth is consistent. He declares himself to be a protectionist, he says he is always an American, and not one of those men who one day talks of tariff for revenue only and another about free trade, and again hold out the policy of unrestricted reciprocity. He says, I believe in protection; I believe the time is not ripe when we can safely meet the manufacturers of Great Britain in an outer market; I believe if we can gain the Canadian market, we can sell there our surplus products and manufactures, and we can relieve the congested state of our markets at the expense of the Canadians. Of course this is my language.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. TUPPER. If the hon. gentleman wishes, I will give him Mr. Butterworth's own words. In a letter which he addresses to all the members of Congress, he uses the following language with reference to Canada:—

"The location of her great highways of traffic, lakes, canals, rivers, railways, open up to us at once an exhaustless supply of raw material, and a constantly growing market for our manufactured surplus."

Does the hon. gentleman doubt the statement that I made? We are to be a slaughter market for the surplus manufactures of the United States.

"While correcting the inequalities in our tariff, we can, at the same time, remove from the trade and commerce of our people every restriction and burdensome tax which is not essential to the proper protection of our home industries, or necessary for the collection of needed public revenue."

"I see it stated in some of the public journals that in case the proposed arrangement is consummated, foreign goods will pour through Canada into the United States. Whether goods were entered at a Canadian port, or in the United States, would be of no consequence, since the tariff would be the same on both sides of the line."

My hon. friend says he knows they will insist on that, but that is not contemplated in the motion. What he said at Charlottetown, he contends, is all right, but that depended on the tariff, as against other countries other than the United States, being at our will and pleasure, and to expect they would have unrestricted reciprocity with us under this state of affairs was to suppose the Americans were arrant fools. But Mr. Butterworth is no arrant fool. He says that the Americans shall hold our markets in the hollow of their hands and slaughter their goods as they please, from one end of Canada to the other. Our people have had a sample already of the slaughtering business that went on before 1878, and it will take more than the arguments and ingenuity of hon. gentlemen opposite to make them forget how our trade then suffered. Mr. Butterworth proceeds to give his record:

"I am a protectionist; but we will agree that protection properly deals with the unequal conditions which exist in the field of competition as between our manufactures and those of the Old World. Those conditions, relating in the main to the cost of labor, and being so largely in favor of the plants of Europe, manufacturers there are in certain lines of trade enabled, in the absence of the influence of our protective system, to control the markets at our very doors. But this reason has no possible application to competition with Canada; and the reason ceasing, the rule ceases with it.

Not contempt, mark you, when they talk of competition with the manufactures of Great Britain. No, they fear competition with the manufactures of Great Britain, but they only feel contempt when speaking of competition with Canadian manufactures. That is their opinion of the stage at which our industries have advanced; they have no fear of competition within us. Are hon. gentlemen opposite prepared to follow in the wake of a man whose designs are admitted, who is honest in his attacks against Canadian independence if you like, or Canadian commercial independence. Let us now deal with the other apostle of commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity, or anything that will ultimately lead to annexation. Mr. Wiman has put himself on record. Mr. Wiman says, as giving us some idea of what is contemplated when this consummation is brought about:

"The productions of Canada are so insignificant as compared with the total products of the United States that for many years they would not enter into competition to any serious extent with American products."

What a grand thing for our farmers. We were told by the ex-leader of the Opposition, when the National Policy was introduced, that it would bring about a few years of prosperity. The people took him at his word and adopted the policy which has since brought us continued prosperity; and to-day the opponents of the National Policy now bring forward a policy, which will bring about the consummation they appear to desire, when we will be able no longer to enter into competition with the American producer or manufacturer, with any hope of success. The hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Charlton) told us in grand and forcible language of the magnificent condition of our American neighbors. He dilated upon the fact that they were the best fed, the best living, and the best clad people in the world. Well, was it by cringing for reciprocal relations with other countries that those people became rich, happy and prosperous. Was it reciprocal free trade that gave them their present comfort, independence and wealth? Was it by fawning and cringing at the feet of other nations and asking for help, that they became rich and prosperous? Or was it not by the adoption of the policy which has been proved to be so successful with them that we adopted it ourselves and have followed in their wake ever since. But a new incentive is given for a change of policy. We are told that reciprocal trade will rid us of monopolies and combines, that, Sir, is very good clap-trap. I have no wish to use that term offensively, but it does seem ridiculous that men in their sober senses, in an enlightened country like this, can argue that under unrestricted reciprocity, combines and monopolies would be out of the question. Why every one knows that monopolies exist in England and the United States as well as in Canada; and every one would rather, if he is to be subject to a monopoly, that he should be subjected to one that invests its capital in Canada rather than be one which expends all its means in a foreign country. Hon. gentlemen opposite have tried to bring before the House an issue which has been fought out long ago, and which has nothing to do with the question under discussion, the issue of the National Policy. That is beside the question, in my opinion, entirely. Hon. gentleman opposite ought to know that at one time the great Paisley works of Scotland held the monopoly of the thread trade in the United States. The Americans placed a duty on thread, the consequence of which was that the Paisleys were compelled to start works of the same character as their works in Scotland in the United States, involving the investment of a large amount of capital in the State of Jersey, in order to retain control of the American trade, and the result was that the Americans got their thread cheaper than they ever did before, and American labor was solely employed in its manufacture. The same cause has had the same effect in this country in other articles. The tobacco duty killed a New York monopoly which had control of our trade. The McAlpin manufactory had a large amount of capital invested in New York in the manufacture of tobacco which they sold in our market. The duties were raised. The result was a transfer of half of the establishment with some 500 hands, who are now busy in the city of Toronto. Does any hon. gentleman suppose that Toronto in Canada did not get the benefit of this transfer, and so it would be with this unrestricted reciprocity? And this is only one instance out of many which I might adduce. Do you suppose that the factory would remain in Toronto, that the taxpayers of that city would be helped by that industry or by any similar industry in that case? Certainly not. They would go back to the place whence they came; they would go back to the large centres, so as to be near, as hon. gentlemen say, the largest markets; and so they would control our market just as the anthracite coal miners are controlling Ontario since the duty was, I may say, at the request of all sides, removed from anthracite coal. It illustrates the strength of the National Policy when the coal owners of Nova Scotia could afford to have that duty taken off, and I have not heard that they have made any complaint on that score, but it has strengthened the National Policy in the minds of many when the result of taking off that duty has been, not the reduction of the price of coal, but the inclusion of Ontario in the district of Buffalo, and the increase in the price of coal. Knowing the effect of these rings, they want to rope in every Province under the power of these rings in the United States. They are against Canadian combinations, if you like, but they are in favor of American combinations to any extent. When I heard the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) tell us, as the eloquent and able gentleman from Bruce (Mr. McNeill) mentioned to the House to-day, that we owed little to old England, that old England had not done much for us Canadians on this side of the Atlantic, and that we had to look out for ourselves,—that is virtually what he told us—irrespective of the interests of the mother country, and yet wind up by telling us that no one was to accuse him of disloyalty, and reminded us that he was a Privy Councillor, that he was a sworn adviser of the Queen and had been a member of the Government, and that he was as loyal now as he was then, I was reminded very much of an old story in reference to a counsel in an Ontario court, who was pleading and was advocating the cause of his client as best he could, though he was not endowed with a superabundance of ability. One of our American friends from Ogdensburg was present in the court, which I think was held at Prescott, and he asked, "Who is that fellow?" He was told: "That is a Queen's counsel." He said: "Do you call that kind of a man a Queen's counsel? Then, from the bottom of my heart, and from my inmost soul, I say for the first time in my life, God save the Queen." And so may Canadians say under such circumstances as I have referred to, God save the Queen. The senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) let the cat out of the bag, I think. He told us that we ought not to say very much because Sir Charles Tupper had gone as far as the hon. gentleman wished to go, and it did not lie in our mouths to take any position antagonistic to that resolution on that account. That proves the position which I take, it exposes the hypocrisy of this movement, it shows that there is no sincerity in it, but that it is a mere political trick brought to the attention of the country; but is it desirable that we should seek to have a second slap in the face in the same year? Everyone knows that that correspondence bears but one sensible interpretation. It is in the hands of everyone, and can be understood by everyone who can read, and whether Sir Charles Tupper, or the Liberal Conservative party, or the Government, wanted the freest and most unrestricted reciprocity or not, the statement was made there formally and diplomatically and was made to a gentleman who, as they say, had asked that we should treat on a commercial plan, it was made as broadly as any hon. gentleman could desire, and that offer was met with more than a point blank refusal, as these hon. gentlemen say, with more than a statement, as they say, that they had not power to treat. They have talked a great deal about a letter which was written by Mr. Bayard in May, and they make a great deal of the fact that Mr. Bayard did not come to that commission armed, as he said he would be, with the power to treat in relation to this matter. What is the responsibility resting on this Government as to Mr. Bayard's instructions, or Mr. Bayard's action, or Mr. Bayard's commission? The hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) read to-day the instructions which were given to the British plenipotentiaries to go as far as they now desire this Government to go. The offers which were made by this Government show that they were authorised to make the broadest offers for commercial privileges.

Mr. MILLS. (Bothwell). Hear, hear.

Mr. TUPPER. "Hear, hear." They made a proposition to treat in the broadest manner. That is there in writing, and nothing could be plainer.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then it was not treason.

Mr. TUPPER. The interruption of the hon. gentleman does not affect my argument that, no matter what their intention was as to the tariff which would be ultimately drawn, or as to the manner in which the industries of the country were to be ultimately affected, they put the proposition in plain, bold Anglo-Saxon: Will you make a trade arrangement with Canada—any trade arrangement, if you like; we are ready to receive a proposition, we now make a proposition that we arrive at an understanding on reciprocal trade. No language could be plainer in order to carry out that idea, and what was the answer? Not that they were not then authorised, but a distinct, unequivocal refusal. I see hon. gentlemen shaking their heads; perhaps I do not understand the Queen's English. I will read the letter, after I have given the purport of it, which is not only that they were not authorised to enter into that arrangement, not only that they would not accept the proposal, but that they would not ask for power to consider it, that they would not ask for the necessary instructions or the necessary power to enable them to consider it.

Mr. LAURIER. They say they are prepared to renew the proposals they made before, in the letter of the 27th November, which is kept back.

Mr. TUPPER. I am referring to the official reply.

Mr. LAURIER. That is in the official reply.

Mr. TUPPER. I am not referring to the correspondence which preceded it.

Mr. LAURIER. That is in the official reply.

Mr. TUPPER. This is the official reply: "While continuing their proposal—"

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. TUPPER. My hon. friends seemed to be ignorant of that when they were discussing the matter, and now they want to have added to that the contents of a proposal of a certain date. Surely they are not so barren of argument, surely they are not so weak in their contention, as to add to the letter of Mr. Bayard and to force the people of Canada to suppose that we have refused to consider a proposal which is not before the people, and is not in writing. What does the hon. gentleman mean by saying that this refers to a proposal made before that date?

Mr. LAURIER. He says distinctly that the American proposal was made on the 27th November, and that the proposal of the British plenipotentiaries was made on the 4th December, and then that there was a reply on the 7th December, and that is kept back.

Mr. TUPPER. Then the hon. gentleman wishes the people to imagine that that proposal was what he thinks it was. Is it not a little hasty on their part to ask the House to vote want of confidence in the Government because they imagine—and we know that they have imagined very curious things—that a certain proposal was made? What form of denial does the hon. gentleman want? Does he charge this Government now with suppressing a document relating to trade? Does he charge this Government now with doing a dishonorable, a foul, a cowardly act? Does he seek to bring his party to vote on a charge like that? I ask the hon. gentleman does he make that insinuation?

Mr. LAURIER. I made no insinuation of any kind. The papers have not been laid before us. But I say the hon. gentleman has no right to say that they made such an offer of unrestricted trade, when it is proven that the American plenipotentiaries made an offer which was refused by the Canadian Commissioners.

Mr. THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman has been told time and again that the whole proposal in relation to trade was now on the Table of the House, and the paper which the hon. member for Pictou has just read is to this effect: while renewing our proposals of such a date we decline to consider any trade negotiations relating to the fisheries.

Mr. LAURIER. Surely the hon. gentleman does not mean to say that we have the proposals of the American Commissioners? We have the proposals of the British Commissioners, and nothing more.

Mr. THOMPSON. I mean to say that the hon. gentleman was told time and again that Sir Charles Tupper had asked the consent of the American plenipotentiaries and of Sir Lionel West, to lay on the Table of the House everything relating to proposals looking for trade relations between the two countries, and he has done so; and it is disingenuous then to contend that the proposal that is referred to here, but which is not before the House, has any relation to trade at all.

Mr. TUPPER. I am glad I brought this subject up. I am glad now to know upon what material the hon. gentleman is acting when he makes this sudden change of base upon an entire supposition that has no foundation in fact. If he does not take the statement made by the Canadian representative, perhaps he may be able to believe Mr. Angell, one of the American Commissioners, who makes a statement in entire accordance with the statement just made, that that proposition was refused absolutely. If my hon. friend had allowed me to continue, I think I could have satisfied him that no matter what theory might exist in reference to that proposal there was nothing in it of the nature the hon. gentleman imagines. The reasons for refusing the proposal would be reasons that would prevent Mr. Bayard or any representative of the American Executive from making such proposals as is contemplated. Now, what are the words:

"While continuing their proposal heretofore submitted—on the 30th ultimo,—and fully sharing the desire of Her Britannic Majesty's plenipotentiaries to remove all causes of difference in connection with the fisheries; the American plenipotentiaries are constrained, after careful consideration, to decline to ask from the president authority requisite to consider the proposal conveyed to them on the 3rd inst. as a means to the desired end, because the greater freedom of commercial intercourse so proposed would necessitate an adjustment of the present tariff of the United States by Congressional action; which adjustment the American Plenipotentiaries consider to be manifestly impracticable of accomplishment, through the medium of a treaty under the circumstances now existing."

And with a reason like that, can my hon. friend seriously press this theory, that in defiance of all that rule, such a proposal was ever made or conceived? But if a further answer was necessary, we have it in the American plenipotentiaries declining to admit:

"That such a mutual arrangement as is proposed by Her Majesty's plenipotentiaries, could be accepted as constituting a suitable basis of negotiation concerning the rights and privileges claimed for American fishing vessels. It still appears to the American plenipotentiaries to be possible to find an adjustment of differences by agreeing of the interpretation or modification of the treaty of 1818, which will be honorable to both parties, and remove the present causes of complaint, to which end they now—as they have been from the beginning of this conference—ready to devote themselves."

Well, Mr. Speaker, has it not been stated by hon. gentlemen opposite that the fixed and stated policy of Congress is now, and for some time has been, not to permit any such arrangements to be made by the Executive? Is not the position taken in this debate that no authority outside of Congress can interfere with fiscal matters. If that position be correct, how can he suppose that, on the contrary, such a proposal as is suggested, could have been made, or was ever contemplated? I will not weary the House by reading, and I could, a resolution from Congress, illustrative of that. It has been admitted on the other side. The Judicial Committee of the House of Representatives, in 1885 solemnly decided that no treaty could be made by the Executive of the American Government which in any way interfered with the fiscal matters of the people of the United States, that all changes in the tariff were to be discussed openly in Congress; and that has been the reason, as every one knows, why, since the treaty of Washington, no such arrangement has been entered into by any country in the world by the United States, and that was a long time ago. Treaties had been made, but no treaty touching fiscal matters has been ratified by Congress since that day. Therefore it is unnecessary to argue further to show how utterly impracticable is the step that the other side ask us to take. I have gone on to show the sinister object underlying their object. But I wish to point out, in addition, that these steps taken by hon. gentlemen in this debate, the attitude adopted by them, are, according to their own opinion, calculated to prevent our receiving the benefit of a certain amount of reciprocal trade with the United States, and why? Every one knows that this party, the Government representing this party, is the only party that ever obtained trade advantages from the United States. They negotiated and obtained the Washington Treaty. The negotiations for the Reciprocity Treaty under Old Canada, were made without reference to the fishery question. We have the cause of irritation so far removed that we have identified ourselves, our party and our country, with the interests of a powerful and growing party in the United States, and we now see a measure introduced into Congress in which nearly every article which we desire to be put on the free list, a great many of the articles of the treaty of 1854, are put on the free list, and when we are moving in this direction, is it wise, is it statesman-like, is it worthy the Canadian people, that we should fall down and worship the Americans and tell them that if we fall short in this matter, we are left in a state of dire extremity? If there is any way, and I have the opinion of hon. gentlemen opposite to back me up, by which we might be excluded from the advantages of reciprocal trade, it is that pursued by hon. gentlemen opposite, which tends to drive us into annexation with the American Union. I was not astonished—some things did surprise me—that the financial exponent of the Opposition should take special care not to give any details or any scheme or any definite statement in which this unrestricted panacea business would work, because that hon. gentleman years ago, used to make a financial prophecy, he used to come down to the House and in the same emphatic and loud manner, tell Parliament and the country that they could mark his words, and that the imposition of certain duties would give a surplus of so much, whereas the general result was a deficiency. At Halifax, however, the hon. gentleman went further. He came there to enlighten the people by the sea, for whom he has expressed unqualified contempt that emboldened him to use language which I was sorry to hear from the lips of any man in the Canadian House of Commons. The hon. gentleman came to Halifax as Minister of Finance to endeavor to rally his party in that Province. He talked a little about direct taxation there. He tells us in his opinion now that there is no danger of direct taxation, but, even if there is, it would be a very good thing for the people. He went on to show it was the correct way of taxing the people that it would make them more careful as to how the money was spent, and for a long time he argued in its favor. However, in 1878, the hon. gentleman, knowing then a good deal more perhaps of finance and the working of the revenue than he does now, because he has been long out of office, said:

"If you deprive yourselves of your present Customs tariff (17½ per cent.) you will have to resort to some method of direct taxation, and that of a very formidable kind."

I ask that hon. gentleman now how is it that in 1878 it was a dangerous thing to interfere with the 17½ tariff for fear of being met with direct taxation of a most formidable kind, when now, as we well know, when the needs are such that a larger amount of revenue is required, he tells us, he does not hesitate to say that though you interfere with the 25 per cent tariff, as it has been called all around, there is no danger of our having to resort to direct taxation? The hon. gentleman cannot explain this I feel confident. But he was more definite. He went into figures and, knowing how he has failed to accomplish the results he predicted formerly, I am not surprised that he comes to such a conclusion now. In that summer, as reported in the Halifax Chronicle, the hon. gentleman said:

"The National Policy was a loss of ten millions of Customs duties which would have to be made up by direct taxation, equal to an income tax of 20 per cent."

I always felt a certain amount of comfort in the hon. gentleman's prophecies of gloom. I stated on a previous occasion to this House that, having studied the hon. gentleman's career with some interest, I had come to the conclusion that when he declared the condition of affairs in the country were very much down, they would be very much up, and I find as I live and grow older—and the hon. gentleman reminded me last year that I was very young—I have good reason to hold that opinion of him. The hon. gentleman told us then that with the slightest interference with the existing trade of that day direct taxation stared us in the face, and the hon. gentleman who sits behind him, who sat quietly in his seat while his Province was maligned, said that if there was the slightest chance of direct taxation he would cry: "Stay your hands." Let us see if the hon. gentleman has the courage of his convictions. The hon. member for South Oxford, from whom I have quoted already, and the statement from the old speech of the late Minister of Finance of the Mackenzie Government, lead to the same conclusion, that there is considerable danger of direct taxation. I want now to deal with the charge of corruption, and I may say that the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) can be excused, because I have noticed of late years that he seems to burden his mind with all the charges that so disgrace the political hustings in Canada. Now that hon. gentleman heard the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), charge as one of the serious dangers threatening Confederation, one of the causes of the threatened disruption of Canada, the bribery of Nova Scotia. He did not say in so many words that it was bribery under what is known as "better terms," but he alluded to the transaction known as the "Act for better terms." He charged that, as the Toronto Globe charges it, a bribe paid to Nova Scotia to keep her in Confederation, and naturally he thinks that the men who gave that bribe are worthy of condemnation. He indicts them, he charged not only the men who gave the money as bribers, but the Province generally as being bribed, and he declared that it was that reason alone that Nova Scotia was kept in Confederation. Will he be surprised to learn that on the hustings at Halifax the leader of the secessionists, the leader of one wing of the party in this House said to the people that he was the man to whom the people of Nova Scotia owed the credit of the bribe, that he was the man most instrumental in obtaining better terms for Nova Scotia. He boasted of it; yet he sits quietly and takes that frightful slap over the face from his leader without uttering a single word. I have something more to say in regard to it, because there is no hon. gentleman who could keep quiet on such a subject. The hon. gentleman heard the hon. member for South Oxford asperse and malign a leader under whom they were at one time proud to serve. Instead of our being guilty of the bribery—the party to which I have the honor to belong—what would the hon. member for South Oxford think of this; that if he believes the statement made by the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) under his own hand in a letter he wrote to the press in 1872 when the subject was much discussed—and then I thought it was discussed for the last time—the hon. gentleman who follows his leader tells him that he was the person who proffered and gave the bribe. The senior member for Halifax said:

"What Blake and Mackenzie wanted was that the increase to our subsidy should be made as on the basis of our debt and public work, and had their advice been followed we should have had $240,000 per annum for ever instead of $160,000 as at present, $85,000 of that being only for ten years, five of which have already expired."

Is the Liberal party to be charged with being guilty of high crimes, misdemeanors and corruption because that party offered only one-half the amount with which hon. gentlemen opposite would have bribed the Province? But then the hon. member for South Oxford, and the senior member for Halifax are accustomed to hold up their hands in holy horror in regard to bribes in the shape of subsidies. The railway subsidy they declare to be a high expenditure, and I would remind the House that we have been told over and over again by hon. gentlemen opposite the same old story that the granting of such large bonuses would inevitably lead to direct taxation. The senior member for Halifax denies that they would cut off the subsidies. That is too near for him, it is not the policy he desires, but I am afraid his influence is on the wane when he can sit and listen to attacks made on Nova Scotia, and can stand up and assail the interests of Ontario and Quebec as he has done this evening. But the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) says that this retrenchment is going to be based upon the stoppage of all the railway subsidies. "We can save," says the hon. member, "the railways subsidies and avoid any repetition of such little scenes as occurred in No. 8 a few years ago; we can save by putting an end to the system of bribery in giving grants to railway lines of $3,200 a mile; we can cut off the whole thing with advantage to our treasury, advantage to our markets, advantage to our country, advantage to our hopes in the future, not only in this world but in the world to come." Now, will the hon. gentleman resign his future in the world to come for the sake of getting on those Treasury benches? We have had a taste of the qualities of the hon. gentleman from Halifax (Mr. Jones); we have heard his speeches in Opposition and we have heard his speeches when he was in power. Why, there was not a more liberal, large-minded man when he was in power in his professions to what he would spend if he got a hold of the public money. When he was in power the same hon. gentleman who advises retrenchment to-day (I trust that it is pardonable to allude to a past debate, but some of the hon. gentleman's most earnest addresses have been in reference to the increase of expenditure rather than to the decrease), in 1878, when running for an office, or running an election at any rate in the city of Halifax, he there claimed credit not only for the agitation for better terms, and when a Minister of the Crown this mild and subservient follower of the hon. gentleman who has defamed and villified both his Province and mine, villified him and myself and every man from that Province, this hon. gentleman went down to Halifax as a Minister of the Crown in August, 1878, and as a reason for support claimed on the public hustings "that the present Government," that is, the Liberal Government, have expended $1,250,000 in Nova Scotia, during five years, more than the late Government expended in seven. But now it is a terrible thing for a Liberal Conservative candidate to make promises. You must not say, according to the new code of morals laid down, that when you get to Parliament you will advocate the granting of a subsidy for a railway in your county, nor will you advocate the expenditure of public money upon post offices. Post offices and public works generally were alluded to as having been promised the electors in Prince Edward County. This is a terrible thing, but now we see that in 1878 a Minister of the Crown and the Minister of Militia of that day, the senior member for Halifax of to-day, said to the electors from the hustings at a political election, "that if he were elected he would use his influence to get the Government to extend the Intercolonial Railway to westward. It is wrong for us to promise that the Government will spend money upon public works, but it is all right for the hon. gentlemen opposite. It is all right for them to talk about retrenchment when in Opposition, but it was quite a different thing for them to practice it when they held the public purse. The same hon. gentleman further said:—

"That during the time the late Government were in power"—

The late Government was this extravagant and this corrupt Government—

"they had only spent on an average three millions a year on public works, but during the time the present Government"—

That Government that preached retrenchment and reform from 1867 down to 1874—

"they have spent on an average of six millions a year. That is the best evidence of the way the money is being expended by this Administration."

They gloried in the expenditure then and of course my hon. friend would not go back upon the policy of aiding railways and local subsidies because he knows that having regard to this question of bribery, he knows that he claimed the Government ought to do more than it has done in that Province of Nova Scotia. He knows that he and his party have wrung the changes from one end of Nova Scotia to the other, to the effect that we have been neglected since Confederation in regard to railway expenditure, and that the Government ought to have built those railways long ago which they promised to build and which I will say they will carry out their promise in this respect as they have in all others. I thought the question of bribery was settled last year, when the late leader of the Opposition discussed the matter with the present Minister of Finance, and when the present Minister of Finance was able to read the language of that gentleman and that party's lieutenant in Nova Scotia when he came down to a public meeting and promised there a far larger expenditure on railways to the Province of Nova Scotia if they would only support the Liberal party. I thought that matter of bribery was threshed out then. It does seem extraordinary that this hon. gentleman's allies down in the Province should have blamed us at public meetings for not spending enough money, and then form an indictment against us in the House for having spent so much. I think, Mr. Speaker, that this discussion will not be fruitful; that it will not aid us at least with the United States to obtain unrestricted reciprocity by washing this dirty linen of Nova Scotia which the hon. gentleman has brought before the House of Commons of Canada and which will bring neither credit to him nor to the people who sent him here. Now we have the record of the speech delivered by the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). He took up a large portion of the time of this House by telling us the other night about the effect this duty had upon our barley, and about our dependence upon the American market, and that we had to pay a duty on all the products which we send into that market. When the late Government was in power that Government which spent their money with such a lavish hand—when they occupied the Treasury benches, when also the late George Brown had failed to negotiate a Reciprocity Treaty with the United States the hon. gentleman's question was of another kind. At Simcoe on February, 1878, he made a speech, and I ask the attention of the House to this, for the argument answers the very weak and disingenuous argument he addressed on the other side of the question during this debate. The hon. gentleman said:

Mr. TUPPER (Pictou).

"It may be claimed that the agricultural interest has been interested by the abrogation of the Reciprocity Treaty. With one single exception the average prices we have received since the abrogation of that treaty have been higher than they were when the treaty was in force. In 1875 we exported 5,400,000 bushels of barley and imported less than 5,000 bushels. Our business is in the exportation of barley; it may be that the American duty reduced the amount exported somewhat, but, of course, we cannot help that as we do not make that treaty and cannot reduce it, but that state of things will not continue longer. We have opened up a great export trade of barley with England and England will take our whole crop. We can say to the United States: If you pay us the same price for this barley less the cost of transportation which England pays you may have it."

He continued to point out that in reference to peas, beans and other articles, it was the American that paid the duty and not the Canadian. Now then, Mr. Speaker, coming again to that speech that was addressed to us to-night by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones), I would like to call attention to the authority he has brought before the House on the question of the assessment of property in Nova Scotia. I think the hon. gentleman is bold. I think the hon. gentleman proved his boldness by quoting, in support of his argument on the coal trade, a letter quoted by the hon. the late member for Digby, which was answered by that gentleman's own letter; but he is a far bolder man when he quotes this statement of James Thomson, of the city of Halifax, in reference to statistics. Mr. Thomson is the man who, in the horrible year 1878, when he said all those things I have mentioned, and he is the man that came under the lash of the hon. the member for Halifax (Mr. Jones). That hon. gentleman held James Thomson up to ridicule in the city of Halifax; that hon. gentleman amused his audience by picturing this man as a statistician and that hon. gentleman christened him "Baron Statistics." Now "Baron Statistics" is the hon. gentleman's authority to-night. James Thomson, when he wrote this article was against the hon. gentleman; he has turned I have no doubt to his side and having turned and made a somersault on unrestricted reciprocity the hon. gentleman takes him up and quotes his statistics. On that occasion the hon. gentleman—and it would have been a help to our side of the discussion if he had repeated his argument—was reported:

"He went into the question thoroughly showing that the benefits of protection would be for the manufacturers of Ontario and Quebec."

Does the hon. gentleman repudiate that argument now? Does he say that protection is not a benefit for the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec? As to Mr. Thomson, here is one extract from the Chronicle:

"Mr. James Thomson was dealt with in a manner that would have stirred the people to indignation against him, if they had not been overcome by the ludicrous aspect of the case."

They ridiculed him as a candidate for a judgeship; they ridiculed him for the manner in which he handled figures and called him "Baron Statistics"; and yet the hon. gentleman asks the House to take his statements as to assessments. My hon. friend knows well, that in reference to that statement of Mr. Thomson's, two things can be said. If it be true, according to the assessment rolls of Nova Scotia, that property happens to have had a lower value in 1884 than it had in 1868, the hon. gentleman knows that the burning question in local politics in that Province is, how to get a fair and rational and sensible assessment, how to get the property assessed at its proper and true value; and he knows that that argument is puerile and weak, whether it came from "Baron Statistics" or any other baron. He knows that property in Nova Scotia reached a boom value immediately after Confederation. He knows that the promises which he held up to ridicule as deluding the people as to the wonderful prosperity that was going to come to them, raised the value of property to an abnormal value in 1868, and the value has no doubt since gone down to its proper and normal level. But the hon. gentleman knows that the statistics I read to-night from the authorised publications of the repeal Government give a full and complete answer as to whether the Province is poorer or richer than it was before. Now, I have taken up considerable time, Mr. Speaker. I have carried my remarks further than I interded; but young as I am, and mindful of the rebuke I received in this House a session ago that when a member, authorised by the people of Nova Scotia, should speak, and when he should not, should be gauged by the years of that member, and yet remembering the liberal sentiment which pervades this House, I felt justified in taking up some time in quoting from the mouths of these hon. gentlemen and their friends throughout the country, to show that this movement, first of commercial union, now of unrestricted reciprocity, vague, indefinite, meaningless, about which hon. gentlemen on the other side are now squabbling and disagreeing among themselves, was nothing more nor less than a small and petty dodge of a very desperate and hopelessly beaten political party in the Dominion of Canada. These hon. gentlemen have made specious promises before; but I will tell them that in all these political wiles, as some one has said, you can fool some of the people all the time, you can fool all the people some of the time, but you cannot fool a majority of the people all the time.

Mr. RINFRET moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 11.45 p.m.

House of Commons Debates

SECOND SESSION, SIXTH PARLIAMENT.—51 VIC.

Vol. XX.

Ottawa, Tuesday, March 20, 1888.

No. 19.

NOTICE TO MEMBERS.

Necessary corrections to Members' Speeches, for the bound edition, must be forwarded to the Debates Office within twenty-four hours after the printed copies of the speeches have been circulated, as after that time the contractors may print the copies for the bound edition without further delay.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 20th March, 1888.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

MEMBER INTRODUCED.

Henry Corby, Esq., member for the Electoral District of the West Riding of Hastings, introduced by Sir John A. Macdonald and Hon. Mr. Bowell,

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 50) to incorporate the Ottawa, Morrisburg and New York Railway and Bridge Company.—(Mr. Hickey.)

Bill (No. 51) respecting the Federal Bank of Canada.—(Mr. Cockburn.)

Bill (No. 52) to amend the Act incorporating the Mas-kinongé and Nipissing Railway Company.—(Mr. Coulombe.)

Bill (No. 53) to make further provision respecting the Brantford, Waterloo and Lake Erie Railway Company.—(Mr. Patterson, Brant.)

Bill (No. 54) to incorporate the South-Western Railway Company.—(Mr. Hall.)

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. DAVIN. I would ask permission of the House to make a personal explanation. In the Evening Telegram, March 19, there is an article which professes to give the exact words that I used, when speaking the other night, and the words are between quotation marks so as to show more pointedly that they were those I made use of. They are as follows:—

“Goldwin Smith he characterised ‘as a student blowing bubbles in his library.’ He went on: ‘The Anglo-Saxon, the Celt, penetrated our virgin forests, tilled our virgin soil; our land will never suffer them to lapse from its memory; all our rivers and streams mingle with their fame for evermore. Who, then, shall speak of geographical obstacles? Goldwin Smith, forsooth.’”

Now, I desire merely to say that I did not use that language. It would be disrespectful to a distinguished man, a man whom, however we may differ with him, we all honor for his great literary attainments, and I thank the House for permitting me to say here that I did not use the language attributed to me.

THE FISHERIES COMMISSION.

Mr. EDGAR. Yesterday I enquired from the Government as to bringing down the instructions of Lord Salisbury to the Fisheries Commission, and the hon. the Minister of Public Works said he would speak to the First Minister about it. Has he done so?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I mentioned the matter to my colleague. He will be here shortly, and I will mention the matter to him again.

THE KENT ELECTION.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Some time ago we had the matter of the Kent election before us. I believe, Sir, that you were prepared to issue the writ for that election, but the gentlemen on the Treasury benches took a different view and the matter was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. In cases where a writ is not issued, and it is alleged that corrupt practices generally prevailed, the law imposes a certain duty on the Minister of Justice. That duty has, to some extent, been shifted to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The committee ordered the evidence to be printed. It has not hitherto been found necessary to delay the proceedings of the committee for any length of time in consequence of the printing of any evidence necessary to be brought before it, but on this occasion nearly a fortnight has elapsed since the order was given for the printing, and up to this moment, so far as I know, the evidence has not been printed, the committee has not been called, and this large district is deprived of the representation to which it is entitled. Hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches ought to be in a position to inform the House why all this delay has occurred, and why whatever steps may be required to be taken have not been taken to issue the writ for the holding of an election in the county of Kent. I mentioned in the committee that rumors were abroad that it was the intention of the Government to secure delay, and everything so far certainly points in that direction.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. If the hon. gentleman would believe all the rumors he hears, he would have a great deal of work to do. I do not think that the rumor he mentions is well founded. The hon. gentleman may remember that, when the committee ordered the other day that the evidence in this case should be printed, the chairman was directed to have that done and promised that he would do so, and I have no doubt that he gave the necessary orders. Unfortunately, the chairman has been away for two or three days and I understand he will be back to-morrow, and I have no doubt that, on his return, he will take the necessary steps to have the committee called together and to have the evidence put in the hands of members. However, I will ascertain whether the evidence has been printed, in order that there may be no delay in the consideration of the question, but at the present time it has been left to the chairman of the committee, as it is in every case of this kind.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The amount of evidence which was sent to the committee is not a greater document than we receive here almost every day, and more than a fortnight has gone by since the order was given for the printing of the evidence. I think it is a breach of the privileges of the House that such a delay should have existed.

RECIPROCITY WITH THE UNITED STATES.

House resumed adjourned debate on proposed motion of Sir Richard Cartwright, on the motion of Mr. Foster in amendment thereto, and on the motion of Mr. Jones (Halifax) in amendment to the amendment.

M. RINFRET: M. l'Orateur, les honorables députés qui ont jusqu'ici adressé la parole contre la motion de mon honorable ami le député d'Oxford-Sud (sir R. Cartwright) ont tous insisté sur un même argument qu'ils prétendent bien fort à l'appui de la politique du gouvernement: c'est que la prospérité règne au Canada.

L'évidence de ce fait ne me paraît pas aussi éclatante que la lumière du soleil puisqu'il faut pour l'établir, ou plutôt pour le faire avaler aux électeurs du Canada, un si grand déploiement d'éloquence, tant de longs discours, appuyés sur de fausses représentations des faits, sur des conclusions qui ne sont justifiées par aucuns principes de saine économie politique.

Le Canada est prospère, s'écrient-ils, donc il est bien gouverné. Il va sans dire que les honorables messieurs de la droite se donnent tout le mérite de cette prétendue prospérité, et qu'ils l'attribuent aux lois fiscales qu'ils ont établies, il y a quelques années, dans le but de créer des revenus considérables pour faire face à leur extravagante administration, et favoriser quelques individus pour avoir leur appui en temps d'élection.

Le Canada, M. l'Orateur, n'est pas assez prospère; il n'a certainement pas atteint le degré de prospérité auquel il aurait droit, si l'on tient compte de ses immenses ressources minières, de la fertilité de son sol dans une immense partie de son territoire, et des avantages immenses qu'il offre à la navigation et au commerce. Ce fait a été prouvé, suivant moi, d'une manière absolue par les orateurs qui ont parlé avant moi en faveur de la motion de l'honorable député d'Oxford.

Ce que je me propose de faire, ce n'est pas autant de prouver que les prétentions de nos adversaires sont erronées et que la prospérité n'est pas aussi grande qu'ils le prétendent—plaise à chaque électeur instruit et intelligent à décider par lui-même et par ce qu'il voit autour de lui, ce qu'il y a de vrai dans cette prétention. Ce n'est pas autant cela que de comparer notre situation actuelle à ce qu'elle devrait être, à ce qu'elle serait, en effet, avec un bon système fiscal, des lois qui rendraient justice à toutes les classes de la société, des traités de commerce qui nous donneraient accès à tous les grands marchés du monde.

Les différences d'opinion sur ce sujet entre nous et nos adversaires peuvent se résumer en deux mots. Le gouvernement a adopté une politique de restriction et nous voulons une politique d'expansion commerciale.

M. l'Orateur, il y a neuf ans, c'est en 1879, lorsque nous avons commencé, contre le parti conservateur, la lutte que nous continuons aujourd'hui, l'accusation favorite de nos adversaires était que nous étions théoriciens, mais que nos principes et nos théories ne pouvaient recevoir aucune application pratique, dans un pays comme le Canada, qui, d'après ces messieurs, pour toutes sortes de raisons, ne devrait pas tomber sous le coup des principes généraux de l'économie politique. Cette prétention était absurde et les faits le prouvent amplement. Quels sont aujourd'hui les effets de cette politique sur les intérêts généraux du Canada?

Le second effet a été d'enrichir certaines classes privilégiées aux dépens du reste de la population.

Mr. RINFRET.

Le troisième effet a été de ruiner certaines industries qui contribuaient autrefois à la prospérité du Canada en rendant impossible l'exportation de leurs produits à l'étranger, et en outre, d'imposer sur le peuple des taxes assez lourdes pour affecter d'une manière sensible les revenus des particuliers et drainer au profit du trésor et de certains favoris du gouvernement, nos ressources nationales.

D'ailleurs, M. l'Orateur, il n'y a pas un homme sensé qui n'admette aujourd'hui que cette politique de restriction ait eu pour effet de paralyser notre commerce général qui est resté stationnaire depuis une dizaine d'années, et l'agriculture, cette source principale de nos revenus, par les taxes énormes qui pèsent sur les instruments agricoles, et les articles de nécessités premières, de paralyser notre agriculture en ne donnant pas à nos cultivateurs les marchés nécessaires pour l'exportation et la vente de leurs produits.

Mais un des effets les plus désastreux de la restriction commerciale tant au point de vue moral qu'au point de vue économique, c'est l'établissement des monopoles exclusivement à cette politique antinationale: monopoles pour les compagnies manufacturières et monopoles plus désastreux accordés aux compagnies de chemins de fer.

Il est un principe qui régit le commerce et qui est basé sur le droit naturel, c'est que les prix doivent être réglés par les lois générales de l'offre et de la demande. Du moment que les demandes ne sont plus suffisantes pour maintenir par elles-mêmes une industrie, il devient évident que son utilité a cessé, et c'est une grande erreur que de décider par législation de la maintenir aux dépens du public. Mais que dire d'une loi qui permet à un certain nombre de manufacturiers, dans une même branche d'industrie, de se coaliser ensemble contre les intérêts du public et de former une triple combinaison comme l'ont fait ensemble les raffineurs de sucres, les marchands de gros et de détail de cet article de nécessité première.

Voyons ce qui s'est passé: les manufacturiers de sucre ont fait une convention ensemble pour fixer le prix de vente aux marchands de gros. Ceux-ci ont fait la même convention pour fixer le prix de gros entre eux, et le prix du détail avec tous les marchands de détail du même article. Le but de cette convention est de maintenir un prix plus élevé que le prix normal du sucre et de faire payer au consommateur un ou deux centins de plus par livre sur le prix du détail qu'il ne devrait légitimement payer.

Mais, M. l'Orateur, les raffineurs ne sont pas les seuls monopoliseurs. Il faut ajouter à la liste les manufacturiers de coton, de laine, de caoutchouc, les marchands de whiskey, de charbon et une foule d'autres.

Comment se fait-il que des combinaisons de ce genre peuvent se faire? C'est bien simple. La plupart des manufacturiers qui se coalisent ainsi contre les intérêts du peuple, afin d'amasser des fortunes considérables dans deux ou trois années sont des favoris du gouvernement qui, pour des raisons plus ou moins légitimes ont obtenu une protection spéciale pour leurs industries respectives. Le gouvernement du Canada a fermé l'entrée aux produits étrangers par l'imposition d'une taxe de 30, 40 et même 50 centins par dollar sur les articles manufacturés par ces favoris. Ces droits élevés, en empêchant toute compétition étrangère, permettent à ces manufacturiers de vendre au prix qu'ils veulent, pourvu seulement qu'ils puissent réussir à s'entendre entr'eux pour dépouiller les consommateurs, c'est-à-dire tout le peuple du Canada.

Une loi qui permet des actes comme ceux-là est une loi qui légalise le vol et un parti politique qui permet un tel état de choses ne mérite pas la confiance du public.

Le gouvernement, en adoptant la proposition de mon honorable ami le député d'Oxford-Sud (sir Richard Cartwright) ferait disparaître du coup toutes ces combinaisons ruineuses. Il porterait un coup mortel aux monopoles de toutes sortes. Il ferait diminuer par cela même le prix de ce que les consommateurs achètent et favoriserait en outre d'une manière sensible toutes les grandes industries du pays, en leur ouvrant les marchés d'une population d'au-delà de 60,000,000 d'âmes, et en faisant abonder au Canada les immenses capitaux de la république voisine, pour le développement des ressources naturelles de toutes sortes dont le Canada peut disposer.

Je ne crois pas être taxé d'exagération, M. l'Orateur, en disant que nous avons au Canada probablement les plus beaux et les plus puissants pouvoirs d'eau du monde entier. Il y en a partout dans les diverses parties du pays. On ne trouve presque pas un comté parmi ceux qui bordent le Saint-Laurent ou les grands lacs, qui ne soit sillonné en tous sens par des rivières qui ont leur embouchure du grand fleuve et qui pourraient faire marcher des centaines, et peut-être des milliers de moulins de toutes sortes.

Pourquoi ces moulins ne sont-ils pas construits ? Pour deux raisons : d'abord, nous n'avons pas les capitaux nécessaires pour utiliser ces richesses naturelles, et ensuite nous n'avons pas les marchés nécessaires pour l'écoulement des produits des fabriques nombreuses qui pourraient s'y construire.

La réciprocité commerciale nous donnerait les deux ; les capitaux pour construire ces fabriques et le marché pour l'exportation de leurs produits. Et nos compatriotes, qui partent chaque année par milliers pour s'en aller aux Etats-Unis, resteraient avec nous, parce qu'ils trouveraient ici tous les avantages que leur offre la république voisine ; ils auraient le même ouvrage à faire, les mêmes gages, la même prospérité générale, sans avoir à supporter les regrets de l'expatriation et en continuant à jouir de tous les droits politiques et civils dont ils sont privés à l'étranger. Mais, ce sont les cultivateurs surtout qui devront retirer des bénéfices énormes de la réciprocité commerciale avec les Etats-Unis. Il est inutile de rappeler aujourd'hui que les lois fiscales actuelles qui devaient protéger tout le monde, non seulement n'ont pas protégé les cultivateurs mais leur ont même été tout à fait nuisibles, pour la bonne raison qu'elles ont augmenté le fardeau des taxes sans pouvoir augmenter d'un seul centin le prix des produits agricoles. Mais ce qui leur est surtout préjudiciable, ce sont les droits imposés d'un côté par le Canada et de l'autre par les Etats-Unis sur les produits naturels des deux pays.

Nous ne sommes séparés de nos voisins que par une ligne imaginaire ; mais, malheureusement, cette séparation est devenue réelle par l'imposition des droits de douane qui élèvent, au point de vue commercial, une muraille entre les deux pays.

On ne parle plus aujourd'hui que pour en rire, du fameux marché national que nous promettaient les auteurs du tarif protecteur de 1879. Si nous n'avions que le marché national pour les produits de notre agriculture, une grande partie des grains et céréales pourraient dans nos greniers ; et ces articles-là, de même que le foin et les animaux de toutes sortes, ne pourraient que commander un prix normal. Le Canada est avant tout un pays agricole ; ce qu'il lui faut ce sont des marchés pour l'exportation du surplus de ses immenses produits. Pour un certain nombre de ces produits, son marché le plus naturel, parce qu'il est le plus rapproché, est le marché des Etats-Unis. C'est presque notre seul marché pour les chevaux et autres animaux ; les volailles, l'orge, le foin, les patates, le beurre, les œufs et une foule d'autres produits. Sur ces divers articles, nous payons des droits variant de 10 à 20 pour 100. L'abolition de ces droits, non seulement ferait vendre plus cher chacun de ces articles, mais aurait de plus l'effet, d'ici à peu d'années, d'augmenter considérablement la production et par conséquent l'exportation.

Les honorables messieurs de la droite ont prétendu à maintes reprises que les droits que nous imposons sur les produits naturels des Etats-Unis sont une protection, sur nos produits de même nature, pour les cultivateurs du Canada. Il n'y a rien de plus faux que cette proposition. Je dis plus : dans presque tous les cas, les cultivateurs et les consommateurs du Canada payent le droit non seulement sur les produits naturels qu'ils sont obligés d'importer, mais même sur ceux qu'ils exportent aux Etats-Unis. Je vais essayer de le prouver. Mon honorable ami le député de Kamouraska (M. Dessaint) en a cité un exemple très concluant, l'autre soir, quand il a parlé du commerce des chevaux. C'est un fait connu, que les commerçants américains achètent tous les ans sur nos marchés un bon nombre de chevaux aux prix réguliers de notre marché, qu'ils payent les droits de 20 pour 100 ad valorem pour les revendre ensuite avec profit sur le marché américain. C'est établir de suite que le prix des chevaux est plus élevé aux Etats-Unis d'au moins 20 à 30 pour 100.

Supposons pour le moment que le droit disparaisse, qu'arrivera-t-il ? Il est évident que si le nombre de chevaux exportés est le même, le marché américain ne sera nullement affecté. Le prix se maintiendra tel qu'il est, et, par conséquent, le seul effet sera d'augmenter de 20 pour 100 le prix des chevaux du Canada. Le prix de chaque article est réglé par la loi générale de l'offre et de la demande. Il est donc évident que si nous exportons le même nombre de chevaux qu'aujourd'hui, cette loi générale, n'étant nullement affectée, les prix, toutes choses égales d'ailleurs, resteront les mêmes.

Mais, supposons que la disparition du droit et la hausse des prix aient pour effet, d'ici à quelques années, d'augmenter considérablement la production, et partant l'exportation, il est possible alors que ce surplus ait un effet quelconque sur l'offre et la demande, et que les prix diminuent dans une proportion quelconque ; mais cette diminution ne peut être considérable, si nous tenons compte du fait que notre population n'est que de cinq millions, et que celle des Etats-Unis est douze fois plus considérable : c'est-à-dire 60 millions. Alors, le surplus de production compenserait pour la diminution possible dans les prix.

Il n'y a absolument aucun doute, dans tous les cas, que si ce droit disparaissait tout-à-coup, le cultivateur canadien vendrait de suite 20 pour 100 plus cher, et ceci démontre encore que c'est lui qui paye ce droit. Il est sûr, d'un autre côté, que même dans l'avenir, l'abolition de ce droit ne peut que favoriser dans une grande mesure les éleveurs de chevaux du Canada.

Ce que je viens de dire à propos de l'article des chevaux, s'applique avec autant de force à l'exportation des bœufs et des moutons, des patates, du foin, du beurre et divers autres articles.

Nous exportons chaque année une quantité considérable de patates sur le marché américain, malgré les droits énormes de 15 cts par minot que nous avons à payer. Que le droit disparaisse, et de suite non seulement le prix augmentera de 15 pour 100, mais la production doublera.

Les droits sur le foin sont de $2 par tonne. Ils sont entièrement payés par le producteur. C'est un fait qui a été reconnu par les tribunaux américains dans un procès qui a eu lieu il y a un an ou deux entre les exportateurs des comtés de Maskinongé et autres de la rive nord du St. Laurent et le gouvernement des Etats-Unis. Le gouvernement des Etats-Unis s'est décidé à remettre une partie des droits ou surcharge prélevés par la douane américaine. Et c'est la preuve la plus concluante possible que ces droits sont portés par les cultivateurs canadiens et non pas par les consommateurs américains.

Les droits sur le beurre sont de 4 cts par livre, sont également une perte sèche pour les producteurs canadiens, puisque le prix du beurre est régulièrement beaucoup plus élevé aux Etats-Unis qu'ici. Je pourrais multiplier les citations, mais je ne veux pas prolonger trop longtemps mes remarques.

Les conclusions pratiques sont faciles à tirer des faits que je viens de citer.

Dans le district de Québec, où se trouve situé le comté que je représente, les cultivateurs ont considérablement changé leur système de culture depuis quelques années. La culture des grains et céréales diminue d'année en année, pour être remplacée par la culture du foin, l'amélioration des pacages pour l'élevage des bestiaux et la production du beurre et du fromage.

Il est évident que la culture du blé ne peut plus actuellement, et ne pourra, pendant plusieurs années à venir, supporter la compétition des grands producteurs de blé du Nord-Ouest, de l'Ouest des Etats-Unis, de l'Inde anglaise, de l'Australie et de divers autres pays, qui peuvent produire à meilleur marché que nous, tant par la fertilité incroyable de leurs terres, comme on le voit dans les Etats de l'Ouest et du Nord-Ouest, que par le bas prix du travail de l'Inde anglaise et la fertilité inouïe de ces Etats et de l'Australie. La production augmente par millions de minots annuellement, et l'encombrement qui s'en suit entraîne, comme conséquence naturelle, la diminution des prix et l'impossibilité de compétitionner pour les cultivateurs de notre district. Le prix du blé affecte dans une certaine mesure le prix des grains et des céréales, au point de rendre leur culture un peu moins profitable qu'elle ne l'était dans le passé. C'est un devoir pour moi, M. l'Orateur, comme un des représentants de ce district, d'encourager toute politique qui puisse aider un nouveau système de culture que la nécessité pose aux cultivateurs que j'ai l'honneur de représenter.

Cette protection, seule la réciprocité commerciale peut la donner, parce que, pour le foin, les animaux, le beurre, les volailles et les œufs le marché naturel de beaucoup le plus avantageux est le marché des Etats-Unis. C'est là que nous vendons nos chevaux et nos animaux de toutes sortes, et nos volailles; c'est là que, sans l'imposition des droits, nous vendrions notre beurre, notre fromage et le surplus de foin dont nous pouvons disposer. Les profits actuels seraient augmentés de 15 à 20 pour 100, c'est-à-dire qu'ils seraient doublés. En effet, s'il est un fait qu'il n'y a pas besoin de prouver et que tout le monde admet de suite, c'est que si l'on fait abstraction de tous frais de culture et dépenses de toutes sortes faites pour nourriture, élevage et engraissement des animaux, les profits nets réalisés ne sont pas en moyenne de 15 à 20 pour 100. En conséquence, je ne serai pas du tout taxé d'exagération en disant que les profits nets seront doublés, et même plus que doublés par l'ablation des droits que les Etats-Unis imposent sur ces articles.

M. l'Orateur, la réciprocité commerciale aura aussi le bon effet de rendre plus facile le commerce de grains dans certaines parties du pays, quoique, en général, elle ne puisse avoir un effet marqué sur la hausse ou la baisse des prix.

Le prix du blé, de l'avoine, des pois, en général de tous les grains et céréales, à l'exception peut-être de l'orge et des pois, est réglé pour le Canada et les Etats-Unis par le marché de Liverpool. C'est un fait qui est aujourd'hui admis de tous excepté de ceux qui ne veulent pas voir et qui ne veulent pas entendre. La raison en est bien simple : ici et aux Etats-Unis, il y a un surplus de tous les grains et céréales qu'il nous faut exporter sur un marché immense que ne pourraient contrôler, même affecter, n'importe quelle législation ou combinaison qu'on pourrait faire de ce côté-ci de l'Atlantique.

Cette proposition est vraie et juste en autant qu'on parle du commerce général du Canada. Et c'est la raison pour laquelle nous avons combattu comme insensée l'imposition de taxes sur les grains venant des Etats-Unis au point de vue de créer un marché national. Nous voyons aujourd'hui quels sont les effets de cette absurde politique fiscale. Les prix des grains n'ont pas augmenté du tout; ils ont même été régulièrement plus bas depuis 1879 que la moyenne des dix années précédentes. Et, si nous prenons la peine de comparer les quotes des marchés ici, aux Etats-Unis, et en Angleterre pour ces quelque 15 ou 20 dernières années, nous arrivons à la conclusion que ces taxes sur les produits agricoles n'ont eu que l'effet d'embarrasser le commerce de grain sans donner aucun bénéfice quelconque aux cultivateurs. Je dis plus : Dans quelques cas, ces taxes sont devenues vexatoires; citons en particulier la taxe sur certaines classes de farine que nous ne produisons pas en quantité suffisante pour la consommation et que nous importons des Etats-Unis, les fleurs de bas prix, qui sont consommées surtout dans les provinces maritimes et certaines parties de la province de Québec, et la taxe sur le blé d'inde qu'on a prouvé être directement nuisible aux cultivateurs et qui pèse surtout sur la partie la plus pauvre du peuple.

La disposition des impôts sur les grains et céréales, non seulement ne ferait de tort à personne, mais ne ferait que du bien aux cultivateurs; elle ferait disparaître une taxe injuste et vexatoire sur un article de nécessité première et n'aurait pour effet que de rendre le commerce plus facile en donnant le libre échange complet entre certaines parties du Canada et certaines parties des Etats-Unis qui se touchent et qui n'auraient qu'à profiter mutuellement en échangeant leurs produits.

Mais, M. l'Orateur, ce sont les producteurs de blé du Nord-Ouest qui retireraient des bénéfices énormes de cette disparition des impôts parce que ça leur fournirait l'occasion de se débarrasser du monopole du chemin de fer du Pacifique qui leur fait payer des tarifs exagérés.

L'honorable député de Marquette (M. Watson), à la dernière session, a attiré l'attention de la Chambre sur le tort énorme que fait aux cultivateurs du Nord-Ouest la compagnie du chemin de fer du Pacifique. Et je voyais tout dernièrement dans un journal les prix comparés pour le transport du grain entre St-Paul et New-York, et, entre Manitoba et Montréal. Ainsi, en juin dernier, les cultivateurs du Manitoba payaient pour le transport du grain de Winnipeg à Montréal 50 centins par 100 livres. La distance est de 1423 milles. De St-Paul à New-York, une distance de 1420 milles, le prix du transport n'était que de 32½ cents par 100 livres, soit une différence de 17½ centins par 100 livres en faveur des cultivateurs du Dakota et du Minnesota. Ce seul fait suffirait à expliquer comment il se fait que les immigrants ne veulent pas s'établir au Nord-Ouest et pour quoi, ils passent presque tous de l'autre côté de la ligne. Mais malheureusement, il faut ajouter à cela les droits énormes sur les instruments agricoles, et la mauvaise politique générale adoptée par le gouvernement pour la colonisation du Nord-Ouest.

M. l'Orateur, nous avons dépensé millions sur millions pour la colonisation du Nord-Ouest et la construction du chemin du Pacifique. Nous avons contracté pour cela une dette immense qui devrait nous être remboursée par la vente des terres fédérales et par l'augmentation des revenus publics qui devraient s'accroître à mesure que notre population croîtrait par l'immigration dans les immenses territoires du Nord-Ouest. Je regrette de dire aujourd'hui que les espérances de ceux qui nous gouvernent n'ont été jusqu'ici que des illusions et que, de jour en jour, il devient plus manifeste qu'il ne faut plus compter sur les ressources de cet immense territoire tant que le gouvernement ne renoncera pas franchement à la politique de monopoles et de restriction commerciale à laquelle il se cramponne aujourd'hui.

Il n'y a pas de risque à changer nos lois fiscales, M. l'Orateur, nous ne pouvons faire pis. Essayons la réciprocité. Nous l'avons déjà eue pendant 12 années—1854 à 1866—et ceux d'entre nous qui étaient alors en parlement, comme mon honorable ami le député de St-Jean (M. Bourassa), se rappellent que jamais les cultivateurs du Canada n'ont joui d'une aussi grande prospérité que pendant cette période. L'avoine se vendait alors 60 cts par minot, l'orge a atteint le prix presque incroyable de $1.50 à $1.60 le minot, les grains et céréales de toutes sortes, les patates, les animaux, non seulement se vendaient à des prix élevés, mais étaient littéralement enlevés sur nos marchés pour être vendus sur le marché américain. Notre commerce avait aussi pris un immense développement. En 1860 il avait doublé, et presque triplé en 1865.

Voici une appréciation que je cueille dans l'ouvrage de M. Turcotte : "Le Canada sous l'Union," à la page 527.

Ce traité avait été avantageux aux deux parties. Il avait considérablement favorisé les Etats de l'Ouest qui s'étaient procurés le bois de construction sur le marché canadien et qui avaient profité de nos canaux pour l'écoulement de leurs produits; il avait encore donné à quelques Etats de l'Est de grands revenus; aussi la population de ces Etats travailla-t-elle à maintenir le traité, mais elle était en minorité. Le traité avait aussi beaucoup contribué au progrès matériel des Canadiens et leur avait permis d'écouler le surplus de leurs produits sur le marché américain, et d'acheter sur ce marché, à des conditions plus favorables, les articles dont ils avaient besoin pour la consommation et l'alimentation des manufactures. Depuis le traité de réciprocité entre le Canada et les Etats-Unis, le commerce d'importation et d'exportation avait presque triplé. Il était de $24,000,000 en 1854, et l'année fiscale de 1864 en portait le chiffre à $69,150,000.

Et M. l'Orateur, ces appréciations de M. Turcotte ne peuvent être taxées de partisanerie en faveur du parti libéral puisque c'est un fait connu que ses sympathies politiques étaient en faveur de nos adversaires, et son histoire d'ailleurs le prouve amplement.

Sans doute que la condition actuelle du pays n'est pas exactement la même qu'elle était alors. Nous ne pourrions pas espérer de voir une augmentation considérable du commerce de transit sur nos canaux, à moins de les améliorer et à moins de donner dans les ports de Montréal et de Québec, de même que sur les canaux, des facilités qui les rendent capables de lutter pour le transport des produits de l'ouest contre les voies américaines, et surtout le canal de l'Erie. Il peut y avoir quelques inconvénients qui nuisent jusqu'à un certain point à la réalisation de cette grande mesure d'intérêt public; mais il est une chose que personne ne peut révoquer en doute, c'est l'influence énorme que la réciprocité exercerait sur la prospérité des cultivateurs et le développement de l'agriculture par tout le pays.

Le Canada, M. l'Orateur, est un pays agricole, c'est par l'agriculture qu'il peut compter un jour d'occuper une position élevée parmi les nations du globe. Nous avons dans Manitoba et le Nord-Ouest un nombre incalculable de terres fertiles, qui sont rangées à bon droit parmi les plus fertiles du globe. Il nous faut développer cet immense territoire. Mais ces terres ne sont pas les seules; dans la province d'Ontario, dans la province de Québec, il y a des contrées d'une grande richesse qui doubleraient de valeur si on ouvrait un débouché pour leurs produits. Et quel marché peut nous être plus avantageux que celui des Etats-Unis qui sont à nos portes et qui ont besoin de nos produits pour leur immense population de 60 millions d'âmes.

M. l'Orateur, nos vieilles provinces sont dépeuplées et dévastées par le fléau de l'immigration. Chaque année, nous voyons partir pour les Etats-Unis des familles en grand nombre, et une multitude de jeunes gens qui sont la fleur de notre population. Pourquoi ces gens-là s'en vont-ils? Pour trouver de l'ouvrage à l'étranger, pour faire de l'argent pour payer leurs dettes. Ils s'en vont aux Etats-Unis parce que c'est un pays prospère, parce qu'il y a plus à faire pour eux qu'en Canada. Il y a plus de commerce, plus d'ouvrage, plus d'industries de toutes sortes. Il y a aujourd'hui au-delà d'un million de Canadiens aux Etats-Unis, c'est-à-dire près de 20 à 25 pour 100 de la population du Canada, et avant peu, M. l'Orateur, si cela continue, il y aura autant de Canadiens aux Etats-Unis qu'au Canada. C'est une affaire sérieuse, M. l'Orateur, que cet exode sans cesse croissant des enfants du Canada; c'est une affaire sérieuse qui devrait attirer l'attention de ceux qui nous gouvernent. C'est leur devoir de trouver au plus tôt un remède à cette plaie sociale de l'émigration, s'ils ne veulent pas voir d'ici à quelques années le dépeuplement complet du pays.

L'honorable député d'Oxford-Sud (sir R. Cartwright), dans son magnifique discours de l'autre jour, attirait l'attention de la Chambre sur l'émigration considérable de nos compatriotes aux Etats-Unis, et spécialement de la province d'Ontario. Il a donné des chiffres qui sont à établir que non seulement la population d'Ontario n'augmente pas mais qu'elle est probablement moins considérable qu'il y a quelques années.

Je regrette, M. l'Orateur, d'avoir à corroborer cet état de choses alarmant, pour ce qui regarde le comté que j'ai l'honneur de représenter ici. Dans mon comté, depuis quelques années, certaines paroisses sont restées stationnaires, mais d'autres, — les plus pauvres, — ont subi une diminution considérable de population.

Je le répète, M. l'Orateur, il est malheureux de voir nos compatriotes obligés d'émigrer aux Etats-Unis pour payer leurs dettes. Et je crois devoir signaler au gouvernement que le seul moyen, selon moi, d'enrayer ce flot d'émigration serait d'adopter la réciprocité commerciale avec les Etats-Unis, ce qui, tout en faisant la prospérité du Canada ferait affluer au pays les capitaux américains pour le développement des richesses naturelles du pays et l'établissement des industries de toutes sortes. La réciprocité commerciale, en ouvrant les marchés immenses des Etats-Unis aux produits de nos forêts, de nos mines et de notre agriculture, donnerait au Canada une prospérité inconnue jusqu'ici; donnerait du travail et des gages élevés, et ferait rester parmi nous ceux qui sont forcés de s'expatrier.

Pour toutes ces raisons, M. l'Orateur, je voterai pour la proposition de l'honorable député d'Oxford-Sud parce que je crois qu'elle est dans l'intérêt des électeurs que je représente et l'intérêt général du pays.

Mr. GIGAULT. Mr. Speaker, after the speech made during the last electoral campaign by Mr. Blake, the ex-leader of the Liberal party, I had hoped that the National Policy would have been accepted by both political parties, but I am sorry to find that I was mistaken. After having fought a protective tariff the Liberals now combat even a revenue tariff, which according to them was sufficient to foster our manufacturing industries, and now they come even to unrestricted reciprocity. If a revenue tariff was absolutely necessary to foster our manufacturing industries, why should the Liberals adopt such a change to-day and come even to unrestricted reciprocity? I do not contend, Mr. Speaker, that the protestations of the Liberals are not patriotic. They may have in view the best interests of the country, but, to my mind, by favoring unrestricted reciprocity they are committing an error, the consequences of which will be highly detrimental to the interests of the Dominion. The last speaker said that the farming community would be highly benefitted by a reciprocity treaty or unrestricted reciprocity. That hon. gentleman should remember that the circumstances to-day are quite different from what they were under the old Reciprocity Treaty. What contributed largely to make the American market during the old Reciprocity Treaty so advantageous to our farmers was the American war. That war has terminated. Since the end of that war the Americans have devoted a large portion of their energy and intelligence towards developing their agricultural resources, building at the same time in their fertile North-West new railways for the cheap and rapid shipment of the agricultural produce. The result of that policy has been that the agricultural productions of the United States have enormously increased. We see, according to the Trade and Navigation Returns of the United States of 1887, that in 1861 the Americans exported cattle, sheep and hogs to the value of $254,930, while in 1887 they exported the same articles to the value of $9,991, 614; in 1861 our neighbors exported breadstuffs to the value of $472,152,366, while in 1887 the value exported was $165,768,662. In 1861, during the old Reciprocity Treaty, they exported provisions and dairy products to the value of $32,000,000, while in 1887 the value reached $92,000,000, or an increase of more than $70,000,000. So the hon. gentleman who last addressed the House should not have lost sight of the fact that the circumstances in the United States have so greatly changed that that market is far from being as beneficial to our farmers to-day as it was during the old Reciprocity Treaty. We can ascertain that fact, also, by the decrease in the imports of agricultural produce by the United States. An allusion has been made to hay. During the last three years there has been a constant decrease in the importation of that article by the United States. In 1885 our neighbors exported hay to the value of $1,517,883; in 1886, $1,035,408; in 1887, $7,091,686, so that if we compare the value in 1885 with that of last year we ascertain that there was a decrease in the importation of that article by the United States of more than $700,000. They also imported last year less breadstuffs than in 1885, and also imported less provisions than in that year. That decrease in imports by the United States, has been ascertained not only by myself, but also by a member of the Liberal party, who, in 1878, proposed to impose a duty on corn and oats coming to the United States from Canada. That member of the Liberal party said:

"The circumstances are changing in the United States. We are now far from exporting to the United States as large a quantity of oats as we formerly exported, and even the United States export to Canada more oats than we export to the States."

That Liberal member also said in his speech that we imported from the United States in 1876, 623,368 bushels of oats; in 1877, 672,834 bushels; while we exported in 1877, 73,078 bushels to the United States; and that Liberal member stated at the same time that our exportation of oats would go on decreasing, from the fact that the farmers of the western States during the last five years had been growing that product very extensively, and that already they provided a sufficient quantity to supply not only the United States market, but to send a surplus to foreign markets. The United States not only exports a surplus of agricultural products to Europe, but even to Canada. Last year we imported a large quantity of agricultural products from different countries, on which we collected a duty of $668,707, and that amount would be lost to the revenue if we adopted unrestricted reciprocity. We imported live animals to the value of $2,684,000; grain of all kinds, $931,517; flour and meal of all kinds, $958,740; butter, cheese, lard, $1,187,108; vegetables, $201,684; in all, we imported agricultural products to the value of $3,547,449. As the Minister of the United States says in his report to Congress:

"The United States has to export their surplus of agricultural products to countries which have a deficiency."

That is the right principle. We must expect to send our agricultural productions, not to countries which have a surplus, but to countries which have a deficiency of agricultural produce. That is the reason why I agreed with the member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), when he said that the price of our agricultural produce was regulated, not by the American market, but by the Liverpool market. That hon. member showed, by stating so, that the natural market for our agricultural produce was not in the United States, but in England. But I may say immediately that I have always been, and am still in favor of a reciprocity treaty for the natural productions of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Why?

Mr. GIGAULT. Why? Well, it has always been the policy I have supported, and that policy was included in the Statute-book of 1879. We said then that, as soon as the Americans were willing to give access to our agricultural produce, we were willing to admit their agricultural produce free of duty into our country; but there is a thing which I am not ready to do in order to obtain that reciprocity treaty for the natural productions, and that sacrifice which I am not ready to make is the sacrifice of our manufacturing industries and of our home market. That is the reason why I am in favor of a reciprocity treaty for natural productions and am not in favor of unrestricted reciprocity. If in reciprocity there would be certain advantages, we must consider also what would be the disadvantages of that unrestricted reciprocity, and I believe that, after we have considered the disadvantages, we must have come to the conclusion that unrestricted reciprocity would be much more detrimental than beneficial to the interests of this country. First of all, we would lose a large portion of our revenue from customs, and would be obliged to resort to direct taxation. I know it has been contended by our Canadian free traders that it would not be necessary to resort to direct taxation on account of the loss of revenue which would follow unrestricted reciprocity, but I do not see how such an opinion can be upheld. We would lose certainly more than 7,000,000 on the imports which would come from the United States; our imports from other countries would certainly also decrease, and I think I may safely say that we would lose more than ten or twelve millions of revenue by the adoption of unrestricted reciprocity. And, for that loss of revenue, what advantage would we have? We sell to the Americans, our neighbors, the same kind of agricultural produce for the sum of $15,000,000. Well, in order to sell agricultural produce to the amount of $15,000,000, we would be obliged to resort to direct taxation for ten or twelve millions. We pay now about 20 per cent. upon our agricultural produce exported to the United States, but, if we adopt unrestricted reciprocity, we would perhaps pay 30 or 40 per cent. on account of direct taxation upon property in Canada, so that, instead of decreasing the duty, we would increase it upon the exports of agricultural produce which we would sell to the United States. The hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Rinfret) has attacked the National Policy and has contended that the National Policy has a detrimental effect upon the condition of Canada. He speaks of the increase of manufactured goods which are made in our manufactories, as if a protective tariff had the effect of increasing the price of manufactured goods. What do we see in the United States? According to the Returns of Commerce and Navigation for the year 1887, they give the prices of the different commodities manufactured in that country. We see that in 1847 the price for standard sheetings, per yard, was 8 cents, and that in 1886 it was only 6 cents. We find that the price of standard drillings, per yard, was 8 cents in 1847, and in 1886 it was 6 cents; that the price of bleached sheeting, per yard, in 1847 was 14 cents, and in 1886 it was only 10 cents; that the price of standard prints in 1847 was 11 cents, and in 1886 only 6 cents; that the price of printed cloth, 66 by 66 inches, per yard, was, in 1847, 6 cents, and in 1886, 3 cents. That is the way that the price of those manufactured goods has been increased by a protective tariff in the United States; while here in Canada we ascertain by facts that the prices of almost all the manufactured goods of Canada have been reduced since the adoption of a protective tariff. But there is another thing which should not be lost sight of by our farmers. I contend that unrestricted reciprocity would almost destroy, or greatly diminish, the importance of our home market. Let the free traders say what they like, I know that in the county of Rouville a protective tariff has produced a very good effect. I know that our farmers are increasing their deposits every year in the banks. I know that in the cities of St. Hyacinthe and Montreal, the number of consumers of agricultural produce is largely increased. Every week our farmers resort to those markets; every week parties go through our rural districts buying eggs, poultry, animals, fruit and other articles of farm produce. And where do these articles go, and in a much larger quantity than in the past? They go to the markets of St. Hyacinthe and Montreal, where there is a much larger number of consumers than there was in the past. Destroy, by unrestricted reciprocity, the manufacturing industries of those two cities, throw out of employment the thousands of workmen who gain their living in those manufactures, and what would be the result? Our market for agricultural produce would lose its importance; that would be the sad result of unrestricted reciprocity. The hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Rinfret) has alluded to our magnificent water powers, and he seems to believe that, under unrestricted reciprocity, the American manufacturers would leave their own country and come here to build up manufactures in Canada. Such a thing cannot happen, Mr. Speaker. When our doors are thrown open to the trade of the United States, it will not be necessary for the manufacturers to come and settle in Canada. They will have free access to our country, they will make it a slaughter market for their surplus manufactured goods. In England, in France, in the United States public men have always felt it to be their duty to protect equally the manufacturers and the farmers. They believe that they should be equally prosperous, that alongside of the farmers there should be mechanics and workmen in order to consume the agricultural products. Napoleon I, that man of genius, whom all nations have admired, not only endeavored to favor agriculture, but he also made great efforts to encourage and foster manufacturing industries. He wanted the fields covered with abundant harvests, he wanted to have villages and cities inhabited by numerous workmen in easy circumstances. He did not rely upon foreigners to create a home market and home industries in France; he relied upon the intelligence and industry of his fellow countrymen. That is the line of conduct that we should follow; and I hope we shall continue to follow it, and to encourage our manufacturing industries as we have done in the past. We have no reason to be despondent. Our North-West is developing itself rapidly, our deposits in the savings banks are increasing, our manufacturing industries are growing, and I believe that under present circumstances Canadians can create for themselves a most enviable position.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). In rising to perform the task which now becomes my duty, I must compliment the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Gigault) on the speech he has just made, for the manly, upright and honorable way in which he has presented his case. I never object to any individual entertaining opinions contrary to my own, because if I have a right to hold opinions, another gentleman has an equal right to hold different opinions, as long as he places them before the House and the country in a gentlemanly and straightforward manner. I have very great pleasure indeed in complimenting the hon. member who has just taken his seat for the remarks he has made, not that I agree with his arguments, nor with the deductions he has drawn from his statistics; that does not necessarily follow. But to my mind his speech was very refreshing, because of its contrast to the harangue of personalities which we had to submit to last night, for three hours, and which appeared to be the crowning effort of the day's work. In fact I was so sick yesterday of the personalities that were flung from one side of the House to the other that I felt as if I would like to be out of the House altogether. I think that, as representatives of the people, we should deal as seriously as we can with the great issue before us. I must express it as my candid opinion that there has not been such a great issue before the Canadian Parliament since the Provinces were united into a Confederation. I do not believe that there ever was a question that attracted more attention throughout the length and breadth of Canada than the question which has been discussed during the last few days. But I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that when the intelligent men outside read a discussion containing so many personalities, they will be anxious to get down to the real question that is under discussion, and will give credit to those who discuss facts apart and free from personalities, which are undignified and ungentlemanly. We were told during this discussion that the Reciprocity Treaty which lasted from 1854 to 1866 was not a success; we were told by others that it was a comparative success, and we were told by others still that it was a great success. Indeed, Sir, it appears to me there is a difference of opinion among hon. gentlemen opposite as to whether it was a success or not. It will therefore devolve upon me, as rapidly as I can, to prove by statistics and otherwise that the Reciprocity Treaty which we had in Canada from 1854 to 1866 was largely in the interests of the people of Canada, largely in the interests of the products of the great industries of the country, and contributing to their great success. It was stated the other evening, by the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Porter), that there were attendant circumstances, that other events occurred during those years which rendered Canada more successful than it otherwise would have been. He stated that the Grand Trunk Railway was built during those years, forgetting the fact that the Grand Trunk Railway was commenced about five years before we had reciprocity, and a large proportion of the money that was spent on account of that railway was spent before we had the benefit of the Reciprocity Treaty. He also told us that we had a war in Europe which gave large prices to farmers for their products. It was true there was a war, but the war was nearly over when this treaty went into operation in the United States, because the treaty went into operation in March, 1855. But the hon. gentleman did not give this House to understand that on account of the excessive prices that prevailed for a number of years previously never did more distress prevail in this country than in 1857, and that there was such a depreciation in the money markets of this country that there was a great number of insolvencies and a great many destructions of property in this country. There was never a period in Canadian history when we recovered more rapidly from depression than we did in 1857, and this was on account of the impetus given to the trade of the country on account of the operation of the treaty. We are told again that in 1860 or 1861 the war in the United States had given a great impetus to the trade of Canada. Now, if the hon. gentleman who made that statement will look up statistics upon that matter he will find that our trade did not increase rapidly during the American war; he will find also that a large proportion of the Americans were cut off from the markets of Canada by that very war. The South was blockaded and 10,000,000 of people could not be reached during the war, and the result was that Canada, which formerly supplied largely to the southern States, was cut off from trading with them, so that, by the blockade of the southern portions of the American Union, we lost more than we gained in that respect. The statistics of the trade of this country with the Americans will show that that Reciprocity Treaty was a great advantage to Canada. We have it from Government figures that in 1854 the export from this country to the American Union was a little less than $9,000,000, and in 1866, or about one year afterwards, our export was $54,000,000. That proves without a cavil or a contradiction, and proves against any argument that can be brought to the contrary, that a great trade had sprang up between this country and the United States under the operations of the treaty. It must be remembered, upon the other side, that we had the advantage under the provisions of that treaty. Our trade grew from $9,000,000 to $54,000,000, while their trade only rose from $23,000,000 to $29,000,000 in the same number of years. Our trade rose 500 per cent. and their trade only 24 per cent. It is perfectly clear from this that we in this country derived great advantage because of having the United States markets open to our products and thus giving the lumbermen, fishermen and miners of this country an open market in which they could sell the products of their toil. To show to you, Mr. Speaker, the extraordinary bounds which trade reached between the two countries during this period, allow me to give you a few figures which bear upon the point. We take first Canada; that is, old Canada, Upper and Lower Canada as it is called now. The export trade in 1854 was $8,642,002. It increased in the twelve years to $31,770,251, so that the increase of the export trade in those Provinces was 300 per cent. in twelve years. Nova Scotia had an export trade in 1854 of $1,593,428, and her trade increased to $3,228,550 in this period, or 100 per cent. in the twelve years. New Brunswick had an export trade in 1854 of $489,650, and her export trade in 1866 rose to $1,855,944, or 280 per cent. Prince Edward Island, of which we have heard so much and in such eloquent terms, had an export trade in 1854 of $81,782; under the auspices of the reciprocity treaty which existed during those twelve years she increased her export trade to $1,058,642, or during the period an increase of 1,200 per cent. in the export trade of that Province. This proves to you beyond a doubt that the Reciprocity Treaty had a great effect in stimulating trade in those eastern Provinces. Now, Sir, if we compare the increase during those twelve years with the increase from 1856 to 1867 it will show you a large increase in the former period over the latter period. As I have shown, we had in Upper and Lower Canada an increase of 300 per cent. in the first period and only 70 per cent. in the last twenty years, or 300 per cent. for twelve years as against 70 per cent. in twenty years. In Nova Scotia we had, during the first period to which I have alluded, an increase of 100 per cent., while during the last twenty years we had only 158 per cent., increase, or quite a considerable percentage less, taking the number of years into consideration. In New Brunswick we had an increase in the former period of 220 per cent. for twelve years, and in the same Province during the latter period an increase of 160 per cent. for twenty years. Now coming to Prince Edward Island the increase during the twelve years of the Reciprocity Treaty was 1,200 per cent., but for the latter period of twenty years it was only 20 per cent., or one per cent. per annum. Those facts go to show that the Reciprocity Treaty had a tremendously beneficial effect upon the export trade and the trade generally of the eastern Provinces, during the period of reciprocity and prosperity in those Provinces. Now take the shipping of those Provinces: Nova Scotia in 1863 built 31,038 tons of shipping, and in 1887 she only built 15,932 tons of shipping. New Brunswick built in 1868, 24,919 tons of shipping, and in 1887 only 6,817 tons. In 1868 Prince Edward Island built 26,041 tons, and her shipbuilding industry has been nearly wiped out altogether, for she only built this year 1,686 tons as against over 26,000 tons ten years ago. Does not this prove that the shipping industry has been wiped out, as it were, wholly and entirely by the operation of this protective or restrictive system which has been adopted in this country and continued for a number of years? Sir, I want to point out another fact in connection with this matter. As I said before, the total export trade of this country was $8,931,904 in 1854, and $54,704,909 in 1886, an increase of 600 per cent. The imports to the United States during those years only increased 12 per cent., showing that we had the advantage of that trade during the reciprocity year. Was there a difference of opinion in this country as to the advantages derived from the Reciprocity Treaty when the United States in 1864 gave notice of the abrogation of the treaty? We see there was not. There was consternation throughout the length and breadth of the Dominion, and the Executive Council, the Government of the day, met for the purpose of memorializing the English Government to take steps to prevent such a calamity falling upon the Canadian people. In order that I may give the exact words allow me to read you the report of that committee made in 1864. The report was made the 19th February, 1864, and reads as follows:—

"The Committee of the Executive Council deem it to be their duty to represent to Your Excellency, that the recent proceedings in the Congress of the United States, respecting the Reciprocity Treaty, have excited the deepest concern in the minds of the people of this Province.

"Those proceedings have had for their avowed object the abrogation of the treaty at the earliest moment consistent with the stipulations of the instrument itself.

"Although no formal action, indicative of the strength of the party hostile to the continuance of the treaty has yet taken place; information of an authentic character as to the opinions and purposes of influential men in the United States, has forced upon the Committee the conviction that there is imminent danger of its speedy abrogation, unless prompt and vigorous steps be taken by Her Majesty's Imperial advisers to avert what would be generally regarded, by the people of Canada, as a great calamity."

If in those days the abrogation of that treaty would be considered a great calamity to the people of Canada, would not the return of that treaty be considered a great blessing for the people of Canada? If the loss of anything is a great calamity, to receive that same thing must be a great blessing. Nor, Sir, was this all. There was a convention held in 1864, for the purpose of bringing to bear on the American people as much influence as possible with the view of obtaining a continuance of the treaty. You will no doubt remember that great convention which took place in the city of Detroit, and which was attended by many delegates from this country, for the purpose of discussing this question; and you will remember the great speech made on that occasion by the great father of Nova Scotia to whom every Nova Scotian looks back with pride and honor—I mean the Hon. Joseph Howe—that speech, in which he set forth the desirability for wider and freer trade with the American Union than we should have if the abrogation of that treaty took place, and in which, with unusual eloquence, he brought forward argument after argument to prove that it would be advantageous, not only to Canada, but to the United States as well, to continue in the new relationship which existed for twelve years. Now, Sir, all these facts go to prove that that treaty was a great blessing to the people of this country; and it was considered by the people of this country to be a great blessing, because there were efforts made year after year to obtain a renewal of the treaty after it was abrogated in 1866. The hon. leader of the Government had a high appreciation of its advantages, because he never gave up the prospect of obtaining freer trade relations with the American Union until this so-called National Policy was established in 1879, by which the combines and monopolies and manufactories in the country, in their influence and money, have been enabled to keep him in power. Then he forgot what he had stated in those former years, which were the years of greater prosperity than the present.

Mr. SPROULE. Is your resolution for the same kind of a treaty now?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). My dear Sir, our resolution is in principle the same. We on this side of the House are perfectly willing to accept the Reciprocity Treaty upon the same terms as before; but you know very well, if you know anything at all about it, that the United States will not grant the same privileges that we had before. Are we, then, Sir, to deny the great boon to the industrial classes of this country, because the United States will not give it unless we give up the special protection to the manufacturers of this country? Are we going to neglect the farmers, the fishermen, the lumbermen and the miners, to whom it has been a great boon, because, forsooth, a number of manufacturers say it will interfere with their interests and deprive them of some of the profits that the hard-working people of this country contribute out of their earnings? If the hon. member will get it, I am sure the Liberal party will hail with gladness a reciprocity treaty identical with that which we had from 1854 to 1866. But we had at that time the best end of the stick, and they will not give it to us again. But we are willing to go further to-day to get the other great boon; and I say, if it should injure the manufacturers, their interests must be sacrificed for the interests of the great body of the people of this country. It is a principle of all Governments to sacrifice, if necessary, the interests of a few for the purpose of securing benefits for the great majority of the people.

Mr. SPROULE. That was not what your leader promised at the last general election.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). The hon. the present leader of the Government was favorable to a renewal of the reciprocity treaty. Nay, more, he pronounced himself a free trader on the public platforms of this country. Let me read some of the expressions he made use of. Probably the hon. gentleman who has been disturbing me does not remember so far back as that; probably he did not read those speeches. Probably he feels quieter and more complacent in his mind when he does not read what took place in his own party. You will remember that 1877 was the year in which it was decided by the Conservative party that the great National Policy should be made the issue before the country in the ensuing general election. They went up and down through the country preaching the great benefits that this so-called National Policy was to secure. But did they go to the people, and say, We are going to change this into a protective country? No, they said to the people, We have been trying for years to get a reciprocity treaty from the United States, and they refuse to give it to us; in consequence of that refusal, we are going to adopt a high protective tariff, and force them to come to our terms and give us the great boon we have been asking for. I ask hon. gentlemen if that was not the case. Now, listen to what was said at that time by the hon. leader of the Government, then leader of the Opposition, which he will likely be again after the next general election. The hon. gentleman, at Napanee, on September 11th, said:

"He was a free trader if he could get free trade."

That is just what we are to-day, and if we cannot get full free trade, with the American Union, we are willing to take partial trade. We are willing to go in for reciprocal free trade and are therefore standing on the same platform the hon. leader of the Government stood upon when he delivered that celebrated speech. At Cobourg, on August 29, he said:

"The Canadian farmer would raise his barley for say $1 a bushel, and it would not be the brewer who would pay the 15 cents; he paid $1 for his barley, no matter where it was from or from whom it was bought, but the duty came out of the pocket of the Canadian farmer."

Now, I think this principle the Tory party deny at the present time. When hon. gentlemen on this side were setting forth the amount of money we lose in consequence of the duty on the barley we send to the United States, it was thrown back that it was not the Canadian farmer, but the American consumers who lost it. But let me read what the hon. leader of the Government said at Newmarket, on September 14th, 1887:

"If we cannot get reciprocity of trade, we must get reciprocity of tariff."

I hope the hon. members will remember this language. The protective tariff was only put forward as an alternative to what was wanted—if we cannot get reciprocity of trade, then we must get reciprocity of tariff, but he preferred reciprocity of trade. At Hamilton, on October 17th, the hon. gentleman said:

"I want the Canadians to say to the Americans, We will have free trade, fair trade, or reciprocal trade if you like, but if you will not have any of these, we will have a reciprocity of tariff."

That proves beyond any cavil that the present leader of the Government was favorable to unlimited reciprocity up to 1878, when he fell into the trap of the National Policy; and ever since he got into that large strong trap, the combines and monopolists and manufacturers have put their foot so strongly on the spring that the hon. gentleman has never been able to get out of it. He has made up his mind to die in that trap, and his followers are determined to keep him there. But I understand there are still among the Conservative party, and even among the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches, gentlemen who are in favor of reciprocity in a wider degree of trade between this country and the United States; and I believe one of these is the hon. gentleman who, I am sorry to say, has been compelled to be absent for many days on account of illness. I believe the hon. the Finance Minister has enlarged views on this question, and I believe this from many circumstances. I am, therefore, sorry he has been unable to attend this debate, so as to give us the expression of his own opinions in this matter; for I am of opinion that had he been able to do so, he would have thrown a bombshell into the Government ranks. The right hon. the leader of the Government has often told us that Providence comes to his assistance in time of need. He once, indeed stated that Providence made the wheat grow as soon as his party came into power; and I am sure confidence in a higher interposition has been verified on this occasion, and that Providence has come to his assistance during the last few days, by opportunely shunting off from the track a gentleman of great ability and great force, while the great car of Unrestricted Reciprocity was being driven across the House. But I sincerely hope that the hon. gentleman will be here before the close of this debate, to give his views on this subject. I wish to make a few remarks with regard to those papers of which we have heard so much. Among the papers placed at our disposal, is a letter written by the Hon. Secretary Bayard to the Hon. Sir Charles Tupper, to whom I refer now in his capacity as one of the plenipotentiaries. From this letter, I learn that a desire was expressed on the part of Secretary Bayard to have the commercial relationship between the two countries settled. We are told that Mr. Bayard writes his letters with his own hand,—that he writes both personally and officially; and anyone who knows the position that hon. gentleman holds at Washington, knows that he can speak on his own responsibility, and that in so doing he is in the confidence of the president and the six other executive officers who wrote with him. Anyone who knows the position Mr. Bayard occupies in the Washington Cabinet, knows well that whatever he pens with his own hand, even unofficially, may be taken as an indication of the policy of the American Government. Now, what has that hon. gentleman penned? He has penned the following words:—

"The immediate difficulty to be settled is found in the treaty of 1818 between the United States and Great Britain, which has been a question vexata ever since it was concluded."

That is the immediate question which the plenipotentiaries are supposed to meet to decide; but he says further:

"I am confident we both seek to obtain a just and permanent settlement—and there is but one way to procure it—and that is by a straightforward treatment on a liberal and statesmanlike plan of the entire commercial relations of the two countries."

You see the force of the word "entire," and his pointed use of it. He does not mean a relationship between the farmers of both countries, or between a particular class in each country. No, he evidently embraces all the industrial classes of the United States and the Dominion, and you see how careful he was to explain himself:

"I say commercial, because I do not propose to include, however indirectly, or by any intendment, however partial or oblique, the political relations of Canada and the United States, nor to affect the legislative independence of either country."

Now, where is there any reference to commercial union in this language? In the first place, Mr. Bayard pointed out that his plan was not intended to affect the political relationship of either country, and he goes further; he adds, "It is not to affect the legislative independence of either country." Now, commercial union will affect the legislative independence of this country, because under it we must have equal customs laws with those of the United States. There must be an arrangement between ourselves and the United States as to the customs laws, which must be the same in both countries, and any alteration in these laws, in years to come, would have to be based on an agreement between the two Governments. Therefore, independence of legislation under commercial union would be affected. But Mr. Bayard says it is not to be affected, and we must conclude from this that commercial union was not in his mind at all. Sir Charles Tupper agreed with the sentiment to which Mr. Bayard gave expression. Any of you who have read these papers will see how the words correspond, even in their verbal character. The language used by both hon. gentlemen is almost identical. Sir Charles Tupper replied:

"I entirely concur in your statement that we both seek to attain a just and permanent settlement,—and that is by a straightforward treatment on a liberal and statesmanlike plan of the entire commercial relations of the two countries."

Mr. Bayard's object was to call Sir Charles Tupper's attention to the method which he proposed, by which the whole commercial relations of the two countries would be brought under the consideration of a commission, on the supposition that in all probability the Government of Canada would refer the matter to the Government of England, and that power would be given the commission to take into consideration all these questions. But such power was not granted. Now, let me show you how the powers were granted in England. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper) brought up a question last night—to which I wish to draw his attention—in order to show that this proposition with regard to enlarging the trade between Canada and the United States was a buncombe proposition. If you turn to the powers granted by Her Majesty Queen Victoria to her plenipotentiaries, you will find the following:—

"Whereas for the purpose of considering and adjusting in a friendly spirit with plenipotentiaries to be appointed on the part of our good friends the United States of America, all or any questions relating to rights of the fishery in the seas adjacent to British North America and Newfoundland, which are in dispute between our Government and that of our said good friends, and any other questions that may arise which the respective plenipotentiaries may be authorised"—

Not "authorised," mark you, but "may be authorised," if an authorisation is required,—

"by their respective Governments to consider and adjust."

Now, that authorisation and power was given to the British plenipotentiaries on the 24th of October, 1887. Powers were not granted to the American plenipotentiaries until the 18th of the following month, and they, of course, granted their plenipotentiaries exactly the same powers. What were the powers granted?

"To meet and confer with plenipotentiaries representing the Government of Her Britannic Majesty for the purpose of considering and adjusting in a friendly spirit all or any questions relating to rights of fishery in the seas adjacent to British North America and Newfoundland which are in dispute between the Governments of the United States and that of Her Britannic Majesty, and any other question which may arise and which they may be authorised by their respective Governments to consider and adjust."

Now, these are the powers that were given. You see that the powers given to each were exactly the same, couched in the same words. Then when this proposition was made by Sir Charles Tupper, in regard to the widening of our commercial relationship with the United States, what did the American plenipotentiaries say in reply? They said: We have no power to consider such a proposition at all; we must first obtain authority from the President. I want to ask the House if the American plenipotentiaries had no power to consider the proposition of Sir Charles Tupper, how had the other plenipotentiaries the power to make such a proposition? They were vested with the same powers from their respective Governments, and if one was not able to receive it, the other was not able to make it, and I believe the whole thing was done in order to lead the Canadian people astray, as the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper) attempted to lead them astray last night. He said we were favorable to it; did not our plenipotentiaries at Washington attempt to obtain it? And then he read the American denial. Could they accept it at all? We were told by the plenipotentiary himself in this House that discussion took place and continued for weeks, over what? Over the trade question? Probably it did. Was that discussion inside or outside of their powers? It was a discussion that took place around the table in a personal way. Each one, speaking on his own responsibility, laid down a line of action, and others laid down another line of action, and our plenipotentiary expected that these propositions and counter-propositions should be laid upon the table in connection with the protocols. But it was ruled out of the protocols. Why? Because neither the one party nor the other had power to consider these propositions, and it was absurd to expect that these would come into a public document upon which they had no power to act, that they could bring into that propositions in regard to which they had no power at all. That proves to my mind that this proposition made at Washington was only made for a sham, and was brought before the Canadian people to lead them to believe that an offer had been made; and I am satisfied that on the public platforms in western Ontario I shall hear that the Canadian plenipotentiary, Sir Charles Tupper, laid a proposition for extended trade on the table at Washington, and that the Americans would not agree to it. How could they bring it about when the others would not consider it? That is what they will say; and I want to say here in my place in this House that they must have known that that could not be carried out when they knew perfectly well that they had not legally the power to do it. I want now to draw the attention of the House to the question as it presents itself to me. I believe that a public trade policy must be based upon the lines along which the strongest capabilities of any country lie, just as it you, Mr. Speaker, or I, had a son whom we wished to educate; we would study his abilities and capacities, and, after learning what they were, we would educate him along the lines of his strongest abilities; and, as that is the true and proper policy in the education of a son, it is just as true in the development of a country. What are the great natural sources of wealth in this country? The first is the farming community. They stand pre-eminently higher than any other class of the community. We have a large quantity of magnificent lands, we have the hardy and sturdy pioneers who have gone to these lands and are working to develop them. There are 600,000 farmers in the Dominion of Canada. They are the largest investors in property, the largest employers of labor, and the largest consumers of what is imported, and the demand is made that this House should adopt a policy which is in their interest, and which the Government have shown in the past they were favorable to in the interests of the farmers. It has been repeatedly stated in this debate that the farmers are well off. I live in an agricultural county, I live in one of the finest sections for agriculture that you can find in Canada, and I am satisfied that the farmers are not well off. They have large and heavy debts upon them; and this brings me to a question which was brought up by the hon. the Minister of the Interior the other night. He tried to show that the farmers of Ontario and of Canada were not in debt, and to prove that he took the returns of the loan societies of this country, and showed that according to their report there are not so very many mortgages on the farms. Did not the hon. gentleman know that there is not one mortgage in five owned by the loan companies? Does he not know that the farmers have become so sick of the shaving and cheating principles of the loan companies that they will hardly accept any money from them? They are, of course, not all of that kind, but the farmers will rather pay a much larger amount for money obtained from other sources, and I believe that now for every one mortgage which the loan companies have, other parties, outside of those companies, have three or four. So his argument falls entirely to the ground, because the premises upon which he built the argument were entirely at variance with the truth. I may ask, how is a free trade policy to favor the farmers? We have been told by a good many hon. members on the other side that this does not afford any relief for the farmers, that it does not give them an enlarged market. If that is so the statistics which are placed at our disposal by the Government of the country do not tell the truth. We were told that on account of the United States exporting large quantities of the articles we had to send there, therefore the American markets were not ours. The hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Porter) brought out that argument very strongly. He said the American market is now filled. They export largely of horses and cattle and other animals, and of the cereals of the country, and therefore that is not a market for Canadian produce. Let me give you what the Trade and Navigation Returns show in regard to our export. Of our exportation of horses, 97 per cent. goes to the United States and $1\frac{7}{10}$ per cent. goes to England; of horned cattle, 39 per cent. goes to the United States and 54 per cent. to England.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear."

An hon. MEMBER. What is the value?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Let me answer one at a time.

An hon. MEMBER. Answer the question.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Which? That as to the value? There is a large number of horses that go to England that are superior to many that go to the United States, and, if the hon. gentleman knew anything about buying and selling horses, he would know that we send to the United States a great many that are lamed and ring-boned and old, which are bought up for markets in the United States, and consequently the prices are low. I will tell the hon. gentleman another thing. Last year we sent 326 horses to England and 18,225 to the United States. The average price for these, as given in the Trade and Navigation Returns, was $121 for those sent to England, and $116 for those sent to the United States. How is that? I challenge the contradiction of these figures, and the very gentleman who has asked this question will, I hope, look up the Trade and Navigation Returns, and show me if I have made a mistake when he speaks on this.

Mr. MASSON. The question of values refers to cattle.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). There is a gentleman who wants to know something about cattle. If that hon. gentleman is a farmer—

An hon. MEMBER. He is a lawyer.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I thought he was some thing, and I do not think he would ask such a question if he was a farmer, because every farmer here knows why our cattle fetch less prices in the United States than they do in England. Our best and fattest cattle go to the English market for beef; it is our stalkers from the grass field that go to the United States. Does the hon. gentleman suppose that the stalkers would fetch the same price as those cattle which have been fattened and fed upon corn and oats for beef in the English market? There are many farmers around me, and I do not wish them to shield me one iota if I do not state what they know to be true. I think, if you study a little less law and more common sense, you would not ask such questions. Here is a list of several articles of export, showing the proportion going to the United States, and the proportion going to England:

| | To the United States. | To Great Britain. |
|--------------------|--------------------------|----------------------|
| | per cent. | per cent. |
| Horses..... | 97 | $1\frac{7}{10}$ |
| Horned cattle..... | 39 | 54 |
| Sheep..... | $81\frac{1}{2}$ | $15\frac{1}{2}$ |
| Poultry..... | 92 | $4\frac{3}{8}$ |
| Eggs..... | $99\frac{7}{10}$ | None. |
| Potatoes..... | $81\frac{1}{2}$ | $\frac{1}{10}$ of 1 |
| Vegetables..... | 90 | $\frac{1}{10}$ of 1 |
| Straw..... | 100 | None. |
| Hay..... | 90 | $\frac{4}{10}$ of 1 |
| Barley..... | $99\frac{7}{10}$ | $\frac{1}{10}$ of 1 |
| Beans..... | $99\frac{1}{2}$ | None. |
| Apples, green..... | $25\frac{1}{2}$ | 73 |
| Wool..... | $91\frac{1}{2}$ | $\frac{3}{10}$ of 1 |

Now, in the face of these facts I would ask hon. gentlemen opposite, I would ask those who said that the United States was not a market for Canadian products, to consider these figures. They are not my figures; they are the figures put into the Trade and Navigation Returns for our use. Where are the men now who say that the United States is not the market for us? It does not matter to us whether they export these articles again, so long as they pay the highest price to us. If we have to send them there after paying a duty and freight, the farmers in this country will not realise the full benefit of having that market; but if, on the other hand, the duty is removed, then we would have a market where we would realise a higher sum for those articles than we are realising now. There is an hon. gentleman yonder, who, by his face, I should say, wants some information; he looks as though he could hold a good deal.

Mr. McNEILL. May I ask the hon. gentleman if I understood him correctly to say that nine-tenths of the vegetables go into the United States and only one-tenth to England?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Yes, our exports.

Mr. McNEILL. I am asking for information on that point—with regard to vegetables.

Mr. LANDERKIN. He will forget if, it is no use.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). He may put it in his pocket. Some men have more room in their pockets than in their heads. Here are the figures I gave: $81\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of our potatoes go to the United States, and $\frac{1}{10}$ of 1 per cent. go to England. Of other vegetables 90 per cent go to the American market and $\frac{1}{10}$ of 1 per cent. to the English market.

Mr. McNEILL. What about our own home market?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh!

Mr. McNEILL. That is amusing to hon. gentlemen opposite. They do not realise the value of that at all.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I suppose I could not please the hon. gentleman if I tried. I suppose, if I told him about the home market, he would ask something about the foreign market, and here he would keep me running around after him, first into one corner, then into another. I do not think the bird is worth the powder, or the shot. Now, I want to make a few remarks upon some of those articles. We send to the American market 18,225 horses.

Now, it is said that we would not realise any higher price for horses. In the American market they require 2,500,000 horses a year. They require 300,000 horses to keep up the supply; we only send them 18,225; which is about one horse out of every 140 which the American market requires; therefore we are not in a position, by our present exportation, to dilute the American market to any marked degree, and therefore we command the price in the American market on account of the demand in that market. Very well; accepting that doctrine as the true one, if we send twice 18,000 horses, still what we do would not dilute the American market so as to affect the price. Then, acknowledging that point, the Canadian exporter will make all the duty. For instance, if a horse is purchased here and crosses the line, and has to pay $20 duty, and goes to the American market and is sold there, he is sold at the same price as an American horse. If the duty is removed, and if we cannot affect the price in the American market by dilution, then we make exactly $20, or, according to the price of horses last year, $24.30 on the value of each horse; the farmer makes that profit on every horse he sells on the other side. But if, on the other hand, we were to send any such large number to the American market as appreciably to dilute it, then that would increase the supply a little above the demand, and the result would be a depreciation in the price, and the Canadian farmer would not realise as much as he otherwise would. But if we cannot alter the price by the number we send in, the Canadian farmer makes every dollar of the duty. The same principle is true in respect to everything else we send in. Now, last year the duties paid on horses amounted to $443,000; that sum would have gone into the pockets of the Canadian farmer if the duty was removed, according to the principle I have laid down. There was $195,000 collected in duties on sheep that went into the United States. There was $9,900 collected on poultry that we sent in to feed those people over there who wanted our poultry. $199,521 were paid in duty on potatoes; and I would ask my hon. friend who is looking me in the face, to consider the fact that in his own Province, that exports over a million bushels of potatoes, and pays 15 cents a bushel duty, the tariff takes that sum out of the pockets of the farmers of Prince Edward Island to-day. Then we export a large amount of hay principally from the eastern Provinces, and we paid last year $139,000 duty on hay. On barley, which the Americans take from us to such a large extent—in fact they take it all,—we paid $994,000 in duty. And just one or two words about barley. It is impossible to dilute the American market with barley. We have a special kind of barley that the Americans must have. We have the hard, white barley that they do not grow, and that is considered the best for malting purposes, and therefore the brewers demand that barley. If the buyers in the United States come over here and buy our barley at 60 cents, they pay 10 cents a bushel duty, which brings it up to 70 cents, the price of barley across the line.

Mr. TAYLOR. They must have it and they must pay the duty. If they want the barley they must pay the duty on it.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I know that hon. gentleman has been a Conservative all the days of his life, and I suppose he will be so the balance of it. I just want to answer him by the leader of that party, a party that would have gone to wreck, head and heels, long ago if it had not him to guide it. He was the builder up of it, he has put the bulwarks around it, he holds it together, and when he dies I believe the party will resolve itself into its original elements. Now, Sir, if I answered that hon. gentleman in my own words he would, no doubt, on account of my being on this side of the House, declare that I was not sufficient authority, but when I place in opposition to his statement the opinion of his own leader, surely, as a loyal follower of the hon. gentleman, he would accept the testimony of the First Minister. Would you not?

Mr. TAYLOR. No.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Does the hon. gentleman say no?

Mr. TAYLOR. It is not necessary to accept it if it is not correct. You gentlemen on that side of the House accept it.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). On the 29th of August, 1877, the present leader of the Government addressed a large audience, and in the course of his speech he went on to prove that the Canadian farmer, and not the United States brewer, pays the duty of 15 cents per bushel on grain that is sent into the United States. He said:

"The Canadian farmer would raise his barley for, say $1 a bushel. It would not be the brewer, who would pay the 15 cents; he paid $1 for his barley, no matter where it was from, but the duty came out of the pocket of the Canadian farmer."

Surely the hon. gentleman is satisfied now. I am sure, rather than have his testimony placed in opposition to that of his leader, he will have the manliness to stand up in the House, beg pardon, and withdraw his opposition. There is another point to which I wish to direct the attention of the House, and it is this, that notwithstanding a duty of 10 cents per pound is imposed on Canadian wool going into the United States, 91½ per cent. of our wool enters the American market. Will any one believe that if the duty upon wool was removed a larger price would not be paid in this country, and that instead of our wool selling at 20 cents per pound, at which it has been sold for a number of years under the auspices of the National Policy, and this for wool which has brought in the United States 30 cents per pound, a larger price would be obtained here, and the 10 cents per pound duty paid on exported wool at present would be retained in the pockets of our farmers in the shape of profits, in addition to the present profits they obtain, which amount to very little? On the articles I have enumerated $2,268,971 duty was paid last year, and if I were to enumerate a large number of the other articles which paid duty, I could show that our people have to pay a very large sum, and that it behoves our farmers, who are at present suffering, to bring all possible influence to bear upon the Government in order to obtain treaty relations with the United States, so that our agriculturists might be able to keep these profits themselves. There is another large industry to which I beg to draw the attention of hon. members here, and of the people in the country, and that is the large lumber interest. That is a source of wealth that requires development, but it is a source of wealth that cannot be advantageously utilised until the wood is converted into cash. We have 9,500 mills in this country, which is a very small number compared with our extensive forests. We have 45,000 men engaged in the lumber industry in those mills, and in addition we have the men employed in the forests cutting down the trees, bringing the logs to the river and rafting them to the mills to be cut into lumber, and a number of men employed in shipping them to the markets of the United States. On every thousand feet of lumber shipped to the American market there is a payment of $2 duty to be made, and this bears heavily on manufacturers of lumber in this country and those having timber limits. I desire to give the House the opinion of a gentleman largely engaged in this industry for a great many years. Mr. A. H. Campbell, of Toronto, President of the Lumbermen's Association of Ontario, said that he himself, out of his own pocket, had paid during the last nineteen years $350,000 to have the products of his own industry placed in the American market. That sum was paid by a single individual, and if the amount paid by the trade throughout the country were aggregated, the amount paid would be very extraordinary indeed. Again, I wish to point out that these are the great producers of natural wealth. What do I understand by natural wealth? Natural wealth is what is brought in, it having actually been made in another country and brought here to be circulated in this country.

Mr. SPROULE. Are the lumbermen suffering badly now, too?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). The hon. gentleman says the lumbermen are suffering badly.

Mr. SPROULE. I said, are they?

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron.) They are suffering more than they would suffer if we had a free trade policy with the United States. I suppose that is a sufficient answer to the hon. gentleman. They suffer to the extent of about $2 a thousand on all lumber exported; that is the amount of the suffering at the present time. There is another drawback which I desire to mention. If we had a free trade policy in the United States in lumber the result would be that there would be a large number of planing mills established throughout the lumbering districts. Under the present tariff no finished lumber, no planed lumber can enter the United States without paying 35 per cent duty, and that is almost a prohibitive duty; but if the duty were removed, then our lumber would pass freely into the United States and increased profits would be obtained by our lumbermen, planing mills would be established in this country, increased employment would be given to skilled hands in those factories, and the result would be a "boom" in connection with our lumbering interest. Then, again, there would be an advantage because the machinery used in those mills and planing factories is largely brought from the United States. I am sorry to say it, but I am compelled and constrained to say, that the machinery for such mill work produced in this country is not equal, and not nearly equal, to the machinery brought here from the other side, and lumbermen would sooner pay the duty on the superior machinery than buy Canadian machinery at a much reduced price. That is the testimony of nearly all the mill owners and manufacturers of the country. Another advantage would be this, that our lumbermen would be able to send to the United States a larger portion of their rough lumber than they are able to send now. The duty of $2 per thousand acts almost prohibitory in this respect, and only the best lumber is sent to the American market, while the rougher lumber is consumed here. Another advantage that would follow, if this free trade policy were adopted, would be, that a larger number of people would be engaged in this particular business and their wants could be supplied at a cheaper rate. Every lumberman almost has to be a merchant; he has to supply the men with clothes, boots, chains, hooks, with everything necessary for the work, and as he obtains the larger portion of his supplies from the United States, on which he has to pay a high duty, he would be able to obtain these goods at a cheaper price and he would thus be able to place a larger share of profit in his own pocket instead of in the hands of the Americans or of the manufacturers in this country. Now, as I have said, in order to develop our natural resources successfully we must develop them along the right lines. Another great source of wealth we possess is the mining interest. I call the attention of the House to this fact, that the Finance Minister delivered last year one of the most eloquent speeches on the Budget that he has delivered for a long time. He dilated very largely upon the extent of ore and the mining industries in this country, but notwithstanding that we see there is not a single blasting furnace in operation to-day in the Dominion of Canada. Take the iron industry in Nova Scotia. We have the best iron in the world. There is no iron superior to it. It is purer than any iron thrown on the American market, because it contains less phosphates; and we have iron in Lower Canada, containing a large proportion of chromine, which is the best iron in the world for making steel, and only one iron can compare with it in this respect, that is, the Swedish iron. We have the coal lying side by side with the iron. We have the limestone in the same neighborhood which is put with the iron and coal for the purpose of melting it with greater facility; yet how is it that our industries are languishing while theirs on the other side of the line are prosperous.

An hon. MEMBER. The National Policy.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). The National Policy. Come with me to the iron mines south of Lake Superior and you will see that they have no coal or no phlox there, and that they have to take the iron ore 1,000 miles down to Pittsburg to the coal in Pennsylvania, still they can put that iron on the market and more than compete with us, notwithstanding our facilities. We have all the commercial facilities to take our iron into the foreign markets. The railroads are passing the mountains of iron in the eastern section of the country, and we have boats and ships lying within sight of those mines. Every facility and advantage lies at our doors; yet why is it that our mining industries lie dormant while those not half so well circumstanced in the United States are prospering to a very large extent? I cannot understand it in any way, neither have I heard arguments that would prove it on any other grounds than this, that our market is so limited that the consequence is that large sums must be invested in order to throw it on the market, and it does not pay for the investment of those large sums. The result is that we cannot get into the American market with our pig iron without paying $6.72 per ton, which is a prohibitory duty on our mining industry, and which injures it in this particular way. Look at the copper industries of the country. I may say again that we have the best and richest mines of copper on the continent of America. We have a larger proportion of copper to the ore than they have in any other place on the continent of America. We have it more conveniently situated to the coal mines of Ohio and Pennsylvania than they have on the south shore of Lake Superior. Look at the Hector and Calumet Mine on the south shore of Lake Superior, and you will find that this mine gives employment to nearly 10,000 men and turns out 2,200 tons a day. Now, if you please, come with me to the mines at Sudbury Junction where the Canadian Pacific Railway touches on the copper district, and not a sound of a hammer is heard. We have mines here with a larger proportion of copper ore than the Americans have. Will any gentleman take a note of this and explain the reason why our ore being richer than theirs in proportion to copper, and we having better facilities than them, how is it that they are mining 2,200 tons a day while our mines are standing idle? The reason is because we have no market in Canada for the copper manufactured in our country. When we send copper ore into the United States we have to pay two and a half cents per pound on the copper in the ore and for the copper itself three cents per pound which is almost a prohibitory duty. The result of this is that the industry lies languishing and not a sound of a hammer or a pick is to be heard, while the busy hum of industry is found in the mines of the United States. Is it the lake between the two countries that makes the difference? Is it because the Canadian people are not as smart as the Americans or is it because we have not the same ambition or enterprise as they have? One Canadian is equal to an American, at any time, perhaps better, but the reason of this sad state of affairs is because we have not the facilities of the great markets as they have. We have not the consuming markets into which we can sell, and the result is that our mines are lying dormant and not a single effort has been made to develop them, while on the other side there is every effort and every energy put forth to develop them to the extent which I have stated. In connection with mining there is another industry which might be developed in this country. We have nickel, and nickel is a very scarce metal on the continent of America. There is only one small nickel mine in the United States, and that is owned by a single individual down in Philadelphia. We have abundance of nickel in the north, and there is no attempt to develop it. It is selling on the United States market for $1.30 a pound, and competent men say that it can be put on the market for 30 cents a pound, yet we have no investments in our country to work our rich nickel mines. We have nickel sufficient to make all the implements of war required by the States and England from the extraordinary and valuable nickel we have to the north of us, but this great storehouse of wealth lies idle, because according to our policy we have to pay 10 cents a pound on every pound which is sent to the American Union, and which is a prohibitory tariff at present prices. Then there is another great industry to which I will refer for a short time—our fishing industry. I will only barely mention that because it is one great source of our natural wealth. We have wealth in the sea of an extraordinary and illimitable character, and we should seek to bring that wealth out by giving to the marine fishermen an open market in which to sell the products of their toil, and by which they can realise a larger return for their toil than they have done in the past. If we had this open market more wealth and more competence would come to the poor fishermen than they have under the present restrictive policy. They could go to the United States market and sell their fish and buy those articles which themselves and their families required at home, and bring them back far more cheaply than by going to the American market as now selling under a protective duty, coming home with money, and going west to Montreal or some other city and buying what they require for their families. Such a policy increased the expenses both to themselves and to their families. I want to draw the attention of the House to this fact, and it is a fact which has been brought out by some of the speakers on the other side. They say that we have no geographical difficulties in this country to prevent an inter-provincial trade. They say that those difficulties can be easily overcome before the ingenuity of man in the present inventive age. There is nothing, they say, to prevent them from overcoming those difficulties. I maintain, gentlemen, that those difficulties can never be overcome to the full extent. They may, it is true, be overcome to some extent for a time, but the enormous expense required to overcome them eats up the profits of the parties who send their goods across them. Those difficulties will always hold. Take the Province of British Columbia—and there are a number of British Columbians here supporters of the Government, but if they are supporters of the Government they are not supporters of the interests of that great Province—that Province contains I suppose more natural wealth than any Province of its size in the Dominion of Canada. What is this great wealth comprised of? British Columbia has rich fisheries; it has immense limits of timber and has rich mines of iron and coal. I would ask those hon. gentlemen from that fair Province with the finest climate in Canada, where do they propose, in the future, to send the products of their hills, the products of their mines, the products of their seas? Will they send the products of those great natural resources across the mountains to the North-West Territories and Manitoba?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron).

An hon. MEMBER. Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Very well, we will see. That man says "yes." I will bear that in mind for a few moments and deal with it when I come to it. We find that out of an export trade of $3,000,000 in British Columbia over $2,250,000 goes to the United States. The exportation of their coal, which is the best coal on the continent of America not even excepting that of Nova Scotia, must have a market somewhere. Will it come across the mountains into the North-West Territories? Have they not coal in the North-West Territories themselves? Have they not coal at Banff? Have they not coal on the Saskatchewan? Have they not coal on the Souris? Have they not limitless quantities of coal? And then, to think that British Columbia will send its coal thousands of miles across the continent—it is an absurdity. Will they send their fish across the Rocky Mountains to the North-West Territories? The people of the North-West have in that country all the fish they want. Great Bear Lake, Slave Lake, Lake Winnipeg, Lake Winnipegosis, the Lake of the Woods and Hudson's Bay are teeming with fish which they can more easily obtain than the fish of British Columbia. Will the British Columbians send their iron across the mountains to the North-West Territories? They cannot. Will they send their timber?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). No, they cannot send their timber; they cannot send their coal; they cannot send their fish.

An hon. MEMBER. They do it now.

Mr. CHISHOLM. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to explain that, as far as the fish business in British Columbia is concerned, I happen to know something about that, for I have been engaged in that business. I wish to state that we do not sell one case of fish to the United States. We sell some to Canada and some to Australia, but the principal part of our fish goes to England. We export about $1,000,000 worth of fish, for the most of which we find a market in England, where it comes in direct competition with the fish of the United States which is put up on the Columbia River.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a correction.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is out of order.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I know some gentlemen are never in the habit of telling the truth themselves, and they form the opinion that others do not. I think the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) is of that character. He is all mouth generally.

Mr. HESSON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman should take that back.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, Order.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). If I understood the hon. member from British Columbia, he told the House that they did not export any fish to the United States. You will find on page 736 of the Trade and Navigation Returns for 1887, under the head of fisheries, the following statement: Export to the United States of fish from British Columbia in 1887, $186,774 worth.

Mr. CHISHOLM. Will you allow me to explain?

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is out of order. He will have to wait for his turn to reply.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I would have thought that the members for British Columbia would have understood something about their own far west country, for it is evident that I know a great deal more about the trade of that country than they do. I believe, Sir, if they knew a little more than they do about the interests of British Columbia, they would not support the present policy of the Government. I believe it would be well for them to devote their energies and their leisure hours to obtaining some information so that they will be at least prepared to discuss intelligently the interests and the trade relations of the little province from which they come; and when a western man who has never seen that sunny clime beyond the Rocky Mountains, speaks of their trade relations, they should not interfere with him, especially when he is a bashful and backward man as I am.

It being six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). When you left the Chair, Sir, at six o'clock, I was speaking of the resources of the great Province of British Columbia. I had spoken of the vast treasures of wealth to be found in its lumber districts; I had spoken of the vast storehouses of wealth that are found in the waters surrounding that Province; I had spoken of the immense quantity of minerals that were found in its soil; and I had begun to speak of its treasures of coal. British Columbia possesses, as I have said, the best coal on the continent of America, not even excepting the good coal of the Maritime Provinces. The United States War Department, a few years ago, made a test of the different coals found on the Pacific slope. They found that 1,800 lbs. of Vancouver Island coal produced a certain pressure of steam; and that to procure a similar pressure, it took 2,400 lbs. of California coal, 2,600 lbs. of Oregon coal, and 2,400 lbs. of Washington Territory coal. That test established beyond dispute the fact that British Columbia coal will command the markets in the southern territories, and that the duty of 75 cents imposed on it, under the National Policy, is exactly the sum that must be paid by those who are developing the coal mines in that Province. Out of an output last year of 326,000 tons, 274,000 tons went to the markets of the United States, and no less than $204,000 duty was paid to enable the producer to place that coal upon the American markets. Were it not for the duty that $204,000 would have gone into the pockets of the coal miners of British Columbia. It is evident that if you have an article which is superior to a similar article possessed by your neighbors, the freer you can get that into competition with theirs the better it will be for you. If this duty on coal were removed, therefore, the consequence would be that the vast coal regions of British Columbia would be developed to a much greater extent, thus giving employment to a much larger number of hands, and greater investment of capital. As it is with coal, so is it with iron; there are very large quantities of the very best iron to be found in British Columbia, within 20 miles of these rich coal mines, with the streams of Georgian Bay intervening between the two, so that they are almost in juxtaposition with each other, and therefore the western Provinces of our Dominion, in a few years would supply the great western coasts of the United States down as far as Mexico with that particular mineral which is so largely required in those markets, and is not possessed by the States to the south of us in the same abundance and with the same facilities for its manufacture. Leaving British Columbia we come to the great North-West Territories and Manitoba, and the question arises, what are the great natural resources of that country? To what elements of industry is the energy and the skill of the people of that country to be applied, so as to develop its various interests and encourage the emigration which we all so much desire? The natural elements of strength in that country are the following: cattle raising, farming, mining, and fishing.

I would ask the hon. gentlemen who are in favor of a restrictive policy, if they will be kind enough to point out the markets in which the products of those industries can be sold to such advantage as they can be in the markets immediately to the south of us. If our coal mines of the North-West Territories are developed, they will certainly require markets in which to be sold; and unless they are developed the employment in developing them that would be given to the people, will be so much lost to that country, and the mines might as well have no existence there. But we are looking forward to the time, which I hope is not far distant, when the people of that country will get an open market in the United States, which they do not possess to-day, and which is to them an absolute necessity. Take the States of Michigan, Dakota and Montana, which do not possess coal. Is it not reasonable to say that there is in our North-West, a large coal district for which we must have an outlet, and what better outlet could we have than those places which Providence has not blessed with this natural wealth? Is it possible that the coal mines at Banff, Saskatchewan, and on the Souris, are forever to be restricted to supplying the home market only, when they cover an area of several thousand miles, and only wait for their development by the exercise of the intelligence and perseverance of the people of this country, to be sent south to the advantage of the neighboring States. Again our North-West is destined to produce a large number of cattle. Its rich pasturage is specially adapted for that purpose, but unless a market is furnished to the south of the line, these cattle will have to be sent over long distances to the eastern coast and thence to the markets of the old world, the long distance and heavy freights cutting away a large portion of the profits that ought to go into the hands of the producer. It may, however, be urged with some probability—although that has no effect on the matter—that there is no market for these cattle in the country to the south. But you know, Sir, that if we allow those cattle of high grades of breed to pass through and go into competition with the cattle in the American States, they will find a market there, and the American cattle will have to pass through to be shipped to foreign countries. We have, in the northern part of this continent, the best cattle, in all particulars, for breeding purposes; we have cattle far superior to cattle in the Indian Territory and the Territories further south, and entering into competition with the American cattle in the markets of Chicago and St. Louis and the other markets, the consequence will be that the Americans will pick out from the eastern bound trade the cattle most suitable to their own wants, and will allow the others to pass through, so that our herds will find a market there to the exclusion of the American cattle. Again, the cereals grown in Manitoba and the North-West are said to be ahead of any grown elsewhere; and it is a cause of a great deal of discontent in that country now, that the farmers have not a local market for their cereals in the country to the south. It is impossible for them to send their cereals to the eastern markets on account of the distance and of the high rates charged on the Canadian Pacific Railway which eat up all the profit, so that there is no encouragement to the farmers there to put forth the energies and the abilities they possess. The consequence is that a great many of them are resting on their oars, and their productive energy has been, to a large extent, thwarted by the restrictive policy of this Government. Another large and natural source of wealth of that country is its fish. That fish, which is caught in the various rivers and lakes that abound so extensively in North-West Territories, would be sent directly south to the people in the American States, who do not possess these natural advantages to the extent we do, were it not for the National Policy. It is well known that in Dakota, the people have not the advantage of having such fine fish as are caught in our

North-West Territories, and the same remark applies to the other States lying adjacent to that territory. And in this way a policy of reciprocity, or a policy of free trade is applicable to every one of these national sources of wealth which are possessed by that country. Then, also, there is a long stretch of rough country between Manitoba and Ontario which will continue to be rough for all time to come. Notwithstanding the efforts which have been made to overcome them, and they have been successful to a certain extent, these geographical difficulties will always continue to exist, and that adds to the charges made by the railway every time a train goes over that section, and the existence of that long section of rough country, which will prevent to a great extent the inter-provincial trade which would otherwise take place, is another reason why a southern outlet should be given to that country. If we come to Ontario and Quebec, we know that our relationship to the American Union is far more intimate than our relationship to any other portion of the world, and, if that country gives us a market, as it does, for a large portion of our export, it is evident to every thinking man that that is our proper and natural market. In order to show how large a market Ontario finds in that country, I may state that the total exports of Ontario last year were $25,658,156, and that Ontario exported to Britain $5,157,273 worth, and to the American markets $20,271,313. That fact, which is taken from the Trade and Navigation Returns, which I presume are correct, proves to a demonstration that the southern market, at least to Ontario, is the great market where the produce of that Province is sold, and, therefore, that the more freely we can get into that market, the more facilities that we can give in that direction, the greater will be the advantage to those who export to that country, and the more prosperous will the people be made as compared with the present system. In the Maritime Provinces you find the same condition of things, that the United States is the market for that part of the country. The total exports of Prince Edward Island last year were $1,266,577. Of that, Prince Edward Island exported to Great Britain $384,700, but to the United States, her natural market, notwithstanding the high restrictive tariff imposed on all articles crossing the line, she exported $667,580 worth, or $282,880 worth more to the American than to the British market. That also proves to a demonstration that, as far as Prince Edward Island is concerned, the United States is her natural market. Then again, Nova Scotia exported last year $3,370,821 all told. She exported to Great Britain $2,478,128, and to the American market $2,733,930, or $255,862 more to the United States than she did to the English market. Does not this also prove to a demonstration that the United States is the largest and best market for the Eastern Provinces. New Brunswick exported last year a total of $4,787,798 worth. To the English market she exported $2,403,379 worth of timber, much more than she sold to the Americans, but outside of the timber, her whole trade with England only amounted to $200,000—that is, all the natural products of that country, consisting of hay, potatoes, oats and many other things of that kind—while that Province exported of these articles of produce to the United States $1,200,000 worth, or six times as much as she exported to Great Britain. That clearly proves that that is her natural market. As the Hon. Joseph Howe said at one time, when he was asked to come into Confederation: No, if we do, we will lose our markets to the south of us; and, standing and pointing with his finger, as it may be supposed, over the Bay of Fundy to the New England States, he said: There is our market for our hay, there is our market for our potatoes, there is our market for our small fruits, there is our market for nearly everything the Nova Scotians produce, and, if I come into Confederation, the duties will be imposed and we will lose the markets which appear to be, as it were, only across the street. That was the statement made by that eminent statesman from Nova Scotia, and, now that the question has been solved by the cementation of the Provinces, that is the statement that the Nova Scotians will make to-day. They will say, there is our market, and that notwithstanding the restrictions which have been imposed by the National Policy for the last few years. This policy has not brought prosperity to the people of Nova Scotia, but it has engendered a feeling of restlessness and a desire to go out of the Union into which that Province was brought by false solicitation several years ago. Now, I have shown you that this system of policy, which we on this side of the House put forth as the best policy, is applicable to every industry in the country and to the condition of every Province. I have pointed out how it will benefit the farmers, who are three out of every five of the inhabitants of Canada. I have pointed out how it will benefit the lumberers by giving them a free market to the south. I have pointed out how it will benefit the mining interests of the country by providing also a larger market for their products. I have shown also how it will benefit the fishermen by giving them the market which they want for their fish. I have shown how it would benefit British Columbia on account of her geographical relationships with the neighboring States. I have also shown how it would advance the interests of Manitoba and the North-West Territories in aiding the development of their natural resources. I have shown that it is the market for Ontario and Quebec. I have, therefore, proved that this is a principle which is applicable, not as the National Policy is to one particular industry, but is applicable to all the great industries of this country, and applicable, not only to the great industries of this country, but to the particular interests of each Province forming part of this Dominion, and, therefore, I think that efforts should be made by this Government to bring this matter before the United States Government in such a way that we may know the terms and conditions on which they will enter into reciprocal trade if they will, for the resolution which is before the House does not commit us to any particular line of action, and does not commit us to accept any conditions the United States may seek to impose upon us, but it simply expresses the view that we think it would be in the interests of the country to have reciprocal trade, and that it would be expedient that the Government should take steps to ascertain if the Americans are prepared to enter into reciprocal trade with us. Is there anything more reasonable? and still it is objected to. It may be said, and it will be said, in the country, that the United States will not accept of reciprocal free trade, that they have been approached on that subject several times, and have shown that they will not accept of it. I have five or six reasons to give why I believe that the United States are more willing now to enter into this arrangement than they ever were before. The first reason is one which will show the consistency of the American Government and the inconsistency of the Canadian Government. You will remember that in 1879 there was an offer placed upon the Statute-book, an offer to the United States that, if they permitted certain articles to go in free, or at a less duty than was then charged, the Canadian Government would allow similar articles to come in free or at a less charge than the tariff set out. The United States in 1883, in the Act passed in the 45th Congress, in the 2nd Session of that Congress, at chapter 121, placed upon the free list a number of the very articles contained in the schedule of our Act of 1879, and up to the present day the Canadian Government has not reciprocated. They placed fruits, trees, shrubs, vines and seeds upon the free list. Now, our apples are allowed to go in free to the United States; but instead of being consistent, instead of acting a manly part, as the Canadian Government should have done, they have allowed apples to be charged 40 cents on each barrel that goes into the United States. Those coming from the United States are charged the usual duties by the Canadian Government, while those going from Canada into the United States go in free. 1884, '85, '86 and '87 have passed and the Government that were so patriotic, so devoted to the people of this country, when they wanted to maintain themselves in power, have not moved a finger to reciprocate with the Americans in any of these articles. I challenge contradiction on this matter, and if I am right, the Canadian Government should remove these duties and place these articles in the same position as they promised to do when they made that offer. There is another reason why I believe the United States are prepared. In 1886 there was a resolution passed in the United States Congress and it received two readings. That resolution bore particularly upon this question, and was considered sufficiently important to draw the attention of the English ambassador at Washington. The ambassador, Sir Lionel West, got a copy of that resolution and sent it to the Canadian Government for their consideration. That resolution found its way to the English Government, and notwithstanding all that, there was no attempt made to open up negotiations. This resolution received its two readings, and was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. But someone will say: Well, it was killed there. Certainly it was killed there. Do you suppose the United States are going to carry through a Bill, come to the Canadian Government and say: We sue for reciprocal trade? No, they wait for the Canadians to take the first step, and it is right that they should, because we are the weaker and the smaller nation, and we are the nation that will receive the greater advantage from a treaty of that kind. This resolution has not been referred to before as indicating the willingness of the United States to negotiate in this matter. On the 5th January, 1886, this joint resolution was read twice and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, that this Congress would look with favor and approval upon any action taken by the executive, dependent upon the Government, tending to a renewal of negotiations with the British Possessions in North America, by compact or treaty, having in view the reciprocal interests of both nations."

That was never taken notice of further than to place it in the public correspondence that took place between the two Governments. In the Fishery correspondence we find that resolution placed before the Canadian public, but not a single move was made, no power was given to the plenipotentiaries to negotiate a treaty of that kind. Then, we are led to believe that the Americans are prepared because not very long ago the President, in his message to Congress, stated that he believed it would be to the advantage of both nations and contribute to promote a feeling of friendship between them, if reciprocal trade was entered into. Then, again, the National Board of Trade unanimously passed a resolution, not very long ago, in the city of Washington, in favor of reciprocal trade with the Dominion of Canada. These facts show to the country at large that the United States, almost with open arms, are inviting us to appoint a commission and send it down to adjudicate upon the whole question of commercial relations between the two countries, and unite upon a reasonable and equitable arrangement which would be advantageous to the people of both countries, and contribute largely to the prosperity of Canada. Now, it is said by hon. members opposite that the National Policy fosters the manufacturing industries of this country. There are many manufacturers in this country who have testified that they are favorable to reciprocal trade with the United States. John Campbell, of London, a large manufacturer of waggons and carriages, says so. Mr. Waterous, of Brantford, a large manufacturer of steam engines, says he is prepared for reciprocal trade, and is able to compete with the Americans on equal terms. Then again, Mr. Raymond, manufacturer of sewing machines, says so, and this is one of the industries that it was promised would be fostered by the National Policy. Mr. Raymond says; I am prepared, yes, I am more than prepared to meet them in open market. I can sell equally as cheap, and I can sell a great many more, because the markets are large." And so I might go on from one to the other. Now, I come to an interest that is specially identified with my county, I mean the salt interest. That interest in my county, is the largest salt interest in the Dominion of Canada. Its exportation reaches within a few barrels of the entire salt exportation from Canada. Now, Sir, the National Policy has been the cause of almost entirely crushing out that interest. I know that those who are at the head of it in our county, who have been strong Conservatives, and have supported the party in power in all political meetings, and in every election that has taken place, but they say now that the National Policy has been the cause of the depreciation of the value of their property. In 1875 the price of salt in this county was from 86 to 95 cents per barrel; in 1887 the price was 50 cents per barrel. The Syracuse salt producers, on the American side, tried the crushing out process for some time, and sent salt into Canada and charged a certain price, and the price was the smaller the further away it was from the seat of production. The result was that our salt men competed in the United States with their salt men, and sold a large number of barrels, bushels and sacks of salt. But a few years ago salt depreciated in value over there, and now the restriction placed upon salt is such that it is impossible for our salt interest to send one bushel there. Twelve cents a hundred is charged upon salt going into the United States in sacks, and 8 cents is charged upon every 100 pounds that is sent in bulk, and the result is equal to a prohibitory duty, and our producers are blocked out of the United States market altogether. Now, let me show what the policy of this Government is doing for the salt industries in the east. No less than two hundred and eight million pounds of salt were brought last year from England. It was brought across the ocean almost for nothing. It has been sent down as far as the city of Montreal, and distributed almost through the eastern part of the country, and all the territory that our salt men have is the Province of Ontario. The consequence is that the salt wells that a few years ago were in full blast and paying large sums of money in wages to workingmen, and paying a profit to those who had invested their money, have depreciated in value, and a large number have gone out of the business, and a number have failed. Now let me give this House and the country the opinion of one of the oldest salt manufacturers in our county. He is an intelligent man, a man shrewd in business and one who knows exactly the ins and outs of his business, and with all that he is an intelligent Conservative, a man who supported the party in power for many years. He has gone upon public platforms and taken their part, I understand, and he supported the National Policy; and hear now what he says in regard to the salt interests under the National Policy. I speak of Dr. Coleman, of Seaforth, in the South Riding of Huron. He says:

"The salt industry of Ontario is in a very bad condition, indeed; in fact, its condition could not well be much worse. There have been many withdrawals from the business, and some bankruptcies. Most of our properties would sell at a low price, and some would not be taken off our hands as a gift. Most of the owners engaged in the salt industry worked and fought for the National Policy. But for years the National Policy did nothing for us, and when it did attempt to do something it only gave us legislation without any substantial benefit."

He further says:

"The assessment of salt property in this town was once over $30,000 per annum. To-day it would not be assessed at half that amount."

That is the condition of the salt interest in the town where that gentleman is one of the principal salt man. He goes on to show the other side of the shield. He has shown what the National Policy did not do, and if it did not foster his industry it certainly did the opposite. That intelligent man goes on to say:

"We have several railroad lines. Their rates of carriage are not uniform and they will not interchange rates of mileage. We use a great deal of iron for pans, tubing, nails, grate bars, shafting, &c. On all these the duty, being very heavy, materially increases the cost of production. The same is true of belting, rubber and leather. I purchased nails in the Eastern States in November last laid down here in Seaforth at $7\frac{1}{2}$ cents per pound. Similar nails from Canadian firms cost me invariably $13\frac{1}{2}$ cents per pound."

Now, will hon. gentlemen opposite say that things are as cheap in Canada under the National Policy as in the United States? Here is one of their own supporters, a Conservative, and who would probably support hon. gentlemen at this time, and yet he gives them the lie in their teeth because he is a practical man and understands what he says. This is one testimony; but if you go a few miles further to the west you come to the town of Clinton. We find there an intelligent man, Mr. John Ransforth, a Conservative who supported the Conservative party with the intelligence and vim characteristic of the man in every department of life. He is prepared to accept reciprocal free trade because the National Policy has destroyed his work. He says:

"It will thus be easily seen that to open the United States market to Canadian salt makers will not result in the extinction of the Canadian salt industry. On the contrary, we claim it will have the effect of developing it to an almost indefinite extent. The reason is obvious. The present condition of the salt trade is most deplorable. If means had been carefully devised to ruin the salt makers and supply Canadians with English salt, no more effectual way could have been found than by the National Policy."

Here is Sterry Hunt's analysis of salts: Canadian salt, $\frac{1}{4}$ of 1 per cent.; English salt, 1.69 per cent; Spanish salt, 1.43 per cent; Saginaw, U.S., salt, 2.00 per cent; Syracuse, U.S., salt, 1.15 per cent. Of all those salts, the Canadian is the purest. Supposing Canadian salt producers were at liberty under a reciprocity treaty with the United States to compete with Michigan salt on one side and Syracuse salt on the other, they having a purer article would be able to compete successfully with the American producers. Is it right and proper for the Canadian Government to prevent Canadians placing a better article on the American market? but when we have to pay 12 cents per hundred pounds in sack and 8 cents per hundred pounds in bulk on all salt going into the American market it is almost impossible, even with our superior article, to compete against the inferior article of the United States. Yet, in the face of these facts, the hon. gentleman who represents that section of country, I am sorry to say, considers the interests of other persons above the interests of the farmers and the salt producers. Salt is the principal industry in Goderich, and it is one of the principal industries in Clinton, which forms part of the hon. gentleman's constituency, his constituents being for the most part farmers, who have admitted on every side they would be benefited by a free trade policy; and notwithstanding that fact he rose the other night and made a long speech, flowery and eloquent no doubt, but we have often seen a great deal of wind without much rain.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I am very much pleased that hon. gentlemen opposite saw the wind too the other night. As I have said, the hon. gentleman did not take the part of those interests which are the most important in his county. He quoted some figures which he said I used here, and he declared that the farmers of the district were doing exceedingly well. He said according to my statement of prices the average products of the farm would reach $620 in a year. But he made a little mistake in that, because I have gone over the calculation and I found that instead of $620 it was $658, call it $660. Let us see if a farmer could make any money out of that. A farmer owning 170 acres of land worth $6,000, and I want to call the hon. gentleman's attention to these figures because he was a farmer once himself.

An hon. MEMBER. A very poor one.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Perhaps he was like a man I heard of. A stranger was walking along a road and he saw a man on the fence. The stranger was astonished at the poor condition of the farm, and the man on the fence, afraid he would think he was the owner of the farm, said: "Sir, I am not so poor as to be owner of that property." Perhaps the hon. gentleman would say something of that kind too, if he were sitting on a fence and a stranger were passing his farm. Let me go on with the statement I was making. I want the hon. gentleman to note my figures to see how much the farmer makes out of an output of $660. The hon. gentleman said I did not mention the sale of horses, cattle or sheep. If he was a practical man he would know that if a farmer sold the produce of the land he could not feed horses, cattle or sheep, because the produce must be on in one form or another, either in hay, straw or cereals or in cattle and horses. One man's labor on the farm would certainly be worth $250 a year, a team with feed $140, interest on $6,000 at 4 per cent. $240, wear and tear of implements, blacksmith's work, &c., $50, seed grain for the farm $30, threshing $16, taxes on the farm $30. We will now see how much the farmer will have, not including his own work. Those amounts come to $756, and taking the produce of the farm at an average of several years during a number of which prices were exceedingly high, wheat at 99 cents, this would leave a deficit of $90 after paying the necessary expenses and 4 per cent. on his investment. The hon. gentleman stated that that was a very fair showing for the County of Huron. If he is satisfied with that showing I am sure that we are not. I can explain very well why the hon. gentleman took that position, I can explain why he did not refer to the salt interest, because it comes under the National Policy. I can tell the reason why he did not refer to the farming interests of that county; and he has a reason which probably you do not all know. They are about improving the harbor of Goderich, and about building a new post office and a new custom house in Goderich. You do not all know that, and some of the hon. members sitting beside him do not know it either. According to the estimates we find that there are figures down there to the extent of $18,000, and I ask you how can any man, if we are human, go against the genial leader of the Government, who is about to spend $18,000 in the town of Goderich, which has supported the hon. gentleman so well. But he must remember this, that if he goes back again to that county, he will have to go to the town of Clinton, the town which elected him last general election. He will find some person there who will say to the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Porter): "Why, Sir, you made a speech here last winter." "Yes Sir." "But my interests were never touched by you, I complained to you that my interests were neglected, the salt interest in which I am engaged was neglected. You know very well I have worked hard for you and that I have gone from door to door to collect supporters for you, but when you went to Ottawa you forgot all about me, because you were about to get $18,000 for the town of Goderich." That is the position in which the hon. gentleman for West Huron (Mr. Porter) is placed. But, Sir, I will not detain the House much longer.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron.) Hon. gentlemen on the other side say "hear, hear." Of course we all know and I often felt it myself that when I was getting the worst of it I was very anxious that my opponents should sit down and I think probably what is human nature on my side would probably be a good criterion to judge the gentlemen by on the other side. But, Sir, I want to say now a word or two in regard to the annexation and loyalty cries. I tell you, Mr. Speaker, without any boasting whatever, that I am as loyal to the Crown of Britain as any man who sits on the other side of the House. I tell those hon. gentlemen that I love my Queen and revere her name just as much as they can. I admire that stately Queen who has sat with such great dignity upon the British throne and who instead of the British crown reflecting honor on her, she reflects honor on it. I believe, Sir, we are as strongly attached to the mother country as any people can be, but at the same time although I am strongly attached to the country from which my forefathers came, the country which has given us our literature, the country to whose history we can turn with pride, I believe, Sir, that in this country of Canada we have the best form and system of government that is to-day to be found in the world. We have everything that is firm in the monarchical form of government, we have everything that is liberal and progressive in the republican form of government, and we have new principles added to these by the genius and political wisdom of the Canadian people. So that we are bound to say we possess the best government in the world. As far as our judiciary is concerned it is above all others in the world; it is not only above impeachment but it is beyond question. When we consider how much the security of our property and our lives depend on a just and proper administration of the law, the Canadian people have reason to be proud of the purity of the judiciary of Canada. We do not ask to join our fate with the Americans. Not at all. We unite with them as friends; we give what we have to them when they buy from us, and we want to buy from them what we want. Therefore this principle which we advocate does not alienate our affections from the crown of England. There are a great many possibilities, and I might go on for a long time discussing them. This question is so wide that one would hardly know where to stop. We know the great possibilities of this great Dominion of ours, and standing here, as we do, and looking forward to the list of years that are to come, we can foretell what the energy, the industry, the perseverance and the skill of the Canadian people is able to accomplish in the future. This is a great theatre of action, and who, looking forward through the long vista of the years to come, can foretell the great achievements under a wise and liberal trade policy, the energy, the industry, the perseverance and skill of the Canadian people are yet to accomplish. Long may this country, Sir, be a home and a refuge to thousands of the super-abundant numbers which the genius of Britain and other countries may send forth to inhabit, fertilise and civilise the untenanted portions of our vast dominions. Long may Canada be the Kianoor in the bright galaxy of gems that adorn the British crown. Long may this country be a land of liberty, loyalty and enterprise, ever increasing in wealth and population. Long may that happy connection between Great Britain and this Dominion in the bonds of mutual affection be an unfailing source of profit and advantage to both, and long may Canada rejoice in aiding and upholding the grandeur, the might and the integrity of the British Empire.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat ventured to make the remark, when a certain amount of applause proceeded from the Chamber, that he fancied and always had fancied during his experience in public affairs, that even when he was getting the worst of it his opponents desired that he should stop. I think I may very well say that the House has had the worst of it in connection with his speech, and that the country has had the worst of it too. In opening my remarks upon this question I intend to tell a true story, apropos of the hon. gentleman's speech. A gentleman who was speaking at a political meeting in Michigan spoke for some two hours, and after the meeting he said to his uncle: "I spoke to-night." His uncle said: "I heard you." "I spoke for two hours," said the man. "I timed you," said his uncle. "What did you think of my speech?" said the man. And his uncle replied: "A sensible man would have said it in ten minutes, and a very sensible man would not have said it at all." But, Mr. Speaker, it is very amusing to hear the hon. gentleman lecture hon. gentlemen in this House in the amenities of debate particularly after the experience we have in the remarks he made to this House. With your permission I would give him a bit of advice across the floor of this House, and that is, "Doctor cure thyself." Now, in the course of the remarks of the hon. gentleman, he dwelt on a question, and I took down a few of his observations in order to prevent mistakes. He drew attention to the fact that a large amount of canned salmon or pickled salmon was sent from British Columbia to the United States, and he used that as an argument why it would be best for the people of British Columbia to have unrestricted trade with the United States, in order that they might gain the advantage. I state here as a merchant, knowing what I am saying and knowing what I am talking about, that the canned fish of British Columbia is an article of commerce which is not to be bought in the United States. I make that statement deliberately, and I defy contradiction.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Take off the duty.

Mr. BROWN. I do not care; take it off if you like. I say the statement made that $186,000 of British Columbia fish were exported to the United States and paid duty is not correct. I challenge any man on that side of the House to stand up and dispute what I say. They are silent. It is because they are unable to prove the hon. gentleman's assertion. They make these grave statements and let them go to the country, and when they are brought to book twenty minutes afterwards they are unable to substantiate them. Now, Sir, if all the statements which have been made by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat are as valuable as the one I have just effectually killed, then I think the country will know how to value his speech. The hon. gentleman has sneered at the National Policy, and has talked of the poverty of the farmers of Canada. He has told us that the records of the number of farm mortgages held against the farmers of Ontario are incorrect, because he says there are three or four private mortgages against them to every one that is recorded against them in public companies. I tell the hon. gentleman that he cannot stand up in his own county and say that. I tell him more—if he goes before his constituents in East Huron—and I know that county pretty nearly as well as he does—and even winks at annexation, they will send him were he ought to have been sent before, not to the Parliament of Canada to advocate annexation—to advocate a policy which in the end will result in nothing else than the annexation of this Dominion to the United States. I have done with that hon. gentleman for the present, simply because I consider I have heavier metal to fight. When the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) opened this debate, he threw across the floor of the House in a voice of sweet melody, the challenge that if hon. gentlemen on this side had the courage of their convictions, they would express those convictions in favor of the resolution which he proposed to move. Well, I have the courage of my convictions, and I am here to express what they are; and I know that in doing so I am backed up not only by the people who sent me here, but by the vast majority of the people of this Dominion. The hon. gentleman in opening his remarks dealt largely with figures. I do not propose to weary the House to-night with figures, but I am obliged to use one table simply to correct a very wrong impression which has been conveyed by the speech of that hon. gentleman. The hon. member for South Oxford drew as usual a doleful picture of Canada. He has not done anything else for a great many years; it would be unnatural for him to do anything else, considering the manner in which he has spoken of the progress or want of progress in the country, and the scare he has sent all over the land. The hon. gentleman spoke of our small total export trade, and made a comparison between the years 1873 and 1878, showing a very small difference, and asked the House to look on this picture and then on that, and to declare with him that the country was not progressing. I hope the hon. gentleman did not intentionally omit the information which I am now going to give to the House and the country. Did he not know that in all the world from 1873 to 1887 in every department of trade, in every article that is grown or manufactured, there has been a great depreciation of value?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron.) I would like to "make an explanation regarding what I said about the exportation of fish from British Columbia. I want to read from the Trade and Navigation Returns to show that I was perfectly right. On page 736, under the heading "Fisheries," will be found the statement that there was exported to Great Britain $664,139 worth and to the United States $186,774 worth of fish from British Columbia.

Mr. BROWN. I am glad, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. gentleman has got up and held up his book. I do not hesitate to say that when I challenged hon. gentlemen opposite to contradict my statement, I set a trap for them, and have got the hon. gentleman in that trap like a rat. I say that those fish were not sent to the United States for consumption; they were sent there in transit on their way to other countries. Now, Sir, here is a book which I will hold up as high as the hon. gentleman did his. This is a volume of the Official Records of the United States for 1887, containing statistics of the foreign commerce and navigation of the United States. The people of the United States have all the salmon they require in their own rivers, and do not need to buy any from us, and they never do buy any unless it may be to supply some slight shortage, or for a picnic or something of that kind. I find by this book that the imports of fish; of salmon, for consumption into the United States, from British Columbia for the year 1887, consisted of one package of the value of $4. Now, the hon. gentleman for South Oxford drew attention to the fact that the total trade of this country in 1887 was very little greater than it was in 1873. We knew very well that it was not the same amount; anybody could tell that; but it was the duty of the hon. gentleman as a statesman to have stated the quantities produced in the two years. If the prices in 1887 had been the same as they were in 1873, the exports from this country of these articles, instead of being $18,000,000, would have been $26,000,000. That is a fair statement of the case to put before the country. The hon. gentleman, by his language and manner, conveyed the idea that Canada was not progressive, that we were not raising more grain and cattle than we did in former years. Why, Sir, hon. gentlemen opposite know we are, and they must know also that all over the world there is a shrinkage in the values of all products, and Canada is not an exception to the general rule.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And you claim that for the National Policy.

Mr. BROWN. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) if I did not misunderstand him, spoke of the provision in our Customs Act, for reciprocal trade in natural products with the United States, and in his usual smiling way he said that it was a delusion and a snare.

Mr. DAVIES. Hear, hear.

Mr. BROWN. Exactly; that is what they say. I propose to show it is not a delusion and a snare. The provision in our Customs Act that we are ready to unite with the Americans in an interchange of natural products is so great a delusion and a snare, that we import from the United States articles amounting in value to $10,000,000, upon which the duty amounts to $2,000,000, and the Americans receive from us articles upon which they pay the duties to the extent of $4,000,000. What an absurdity to seek to convey to the country the impression that an interchange of natural products with the United States, which, in the leading articles, represents a duty on both sides of $6,000,000, is a delusion and a snare. The following is a schedule of the various articles:

| | United States Imports. | United States Duty Levied. |
|---------------------------|---------------------------|-------------------------------|
| Animals of all kinds..... | $ 4,373,999 | $ 874,800 |
| Hay, tons..... | 73,778,255 | 156,510 |
| Barley, bushels..... | 10,361,846 | 1,035,184 |
| Fish..... | | 314,919 |
| Lumber..... | | 1,117,920 |
| Vegetables..... | | 193,451 |
| Coal..... | | 248,706 |
| Peas and beans..... | | 59,774 |
| Total duty..... | | $4,146,092 |

The great burden of all the speeches made by hon. gentlemen opposite during this debate, delivered in different strains and moods, is, from first to last: poor Canada going backwards, and everything indicating that unless hon. gentlemen opposite attain office this country is no place for anybody to live in. I have not the least doubt that at this moment the words of these hon. gentlemen are flying over the telegraph wires, and that the men who control American railways and who have American railway lands to sell are using these words on the other side of the Atlantic to induce people to settle in their country rather than to take up their abode in such a woe-begone place as Canada. We have it on the best authority that not a few of the dupes who have been carried over to Dakota in the years gone by, through the glowing pictures given of that country as compared with ours, are coming back to Canada where they can obtain better homes and have better prospects of success. Not a few of the dupes who have gone into Dakota and have been compelled to burn Dakota grass in their stoves to keep them from freezing, now regret that they ever placed any confidence in the statements, based, in many instances, on the doleful utterances of hon. gentlemen opposite. It is only right, therefore, that on occasions like this men should come forward and give expression to what they really believe and what the people behind them believe, and that is what I am endeavoring to do to-night. Hon. gentlemen opposite have spoken of the lack of progress of this country. Why, there is no country under heaven that has made such progress in the last forty or fifty years as Canada has; there is no people, indeed, who enjoy greater blessings and privileges than do the Canadian people, and if you look back to history, you will find a constant and steady progressive movement has taken place in the advancement of the people. It is disheartening to hear hon. gentlemen, who pretend to be Canadian in sentiment, undertaking to convey to the people of the world the idea that this country is going backwards, and is not a place in which men can be successful. What is the position of the United States as compared with this country, since 1837? Business here has increased thirteen times in volume, and property has increased fourfold in value. Had the United States grown in the same proportion as we have in the last fifty years, comparing the ages of both countries, their population today would be 4,000,000 or 5,000,000 more than it is. We have more than kept pace with them. Fifty years ago all that was known of Canada was about 450,000 square miles, to-day we have 3,470,000 square miles. Fifty years ago, we had only 4,000,000 acres of land under cultivation; to-day we have 30,000,000 under cultivation. Fifty years ago we had invested in banks only $3,000,000; to-day our banks hold deposit receipts for $110,000,000. Fifty years ago, the total circulation, including Government notes, amounted to $1,750,000; to-day it is $50,000,000. In 1837, we had 375 post offices; now we have over 7,000 and 52,000 miles of public mail route and travel. To-day we have perhaps the finest system of education on this continent. The problem of education has been solved in this country, as it has been in no country in the world. Do hon. gentlemen opposite tell the people that in their speeches? Do they tell them that this is a place where an emigrant can have his children well educated? Not they. Every section of our country is dotted with establishments of education and with magnificent temples of worship, and people coming from older countries can here worship their Maker according to their conscience as freely as they can in their own homes. Hon. gentlemen opposite do not dilate on these advantages. On the contrary, their whole policy consists in decrying the country. Before 1878 what did they do? They talk a great deal about the exodus from Canada, but I challenge them to-night to deny the fact that during the years before 1878, the first exodus from Canada of hungry men—starving men—who had to leave this country to get work and send money back to feed their families took place, and it was caused by the masterly inactivity of hon. gentlemen opposite who were then in power. When the distinguished leader of the Government brought before the country a cure that relieved the land, instead of hon. gentleman being gratified to see that the evils from which the country was suffering had been removed, they growled and they grumbled and they have done nothing else ever since. They have been snarling at everything which has been done. Notwithstanding that this policy has done good to the country, they have had this nostrum and that nostrum, and I feel sometime that some of them must despise themselves for the lack of sincerity they have shown in offering to the country supposed remedies under what they call their policy. Nothing was ever like a policy in what they submitted. They have been grasping at every straw and seeking to catch the votes of the people by side winds. I may be permitted to say that the people are not so easily gulled. A great deal has been said of the farmers. I consider the farmer the least gullible man in this country, and there is nobody who knows better than the farmer, and none better than the farmers of that hon. gentleman's county, that the National Policy has been a grand thing for Canada; and nobody knows better than the farmer how to see through the misty mazes of the hon. gentlemen when they seek by catch votes to secure the approbation of the country. When they come forward and move a resolution in support of temperance, they put it in a shape so that the best friends of temperance—and the best friends of temperance in Canada have the honor to sit upon this side of the House—feel that they have to rebuke the mockery, to rebuke the hypocrisy, and to vote as one man, though they are sound and solid on the temperance question, against a resolution which on the face of it has the appearance of supporting the temperance principle. Do the hon. gentlemen imagine for a moment that the people of Canada do not see through a thing like that? They do see through it, and they will see through the scheme too. But the hon. gentlemen have done nothing for years but parading this sort of thing before the country. They are always telling the people of the great blessings they will enjoy, the great progress they will have, that everything will be turned couleur de rose, that we here in Canada will be able to make a living without labor, as it were, all that is necessary to do is to come into this commercial union, or unrestricted reciprocity, and they will get $2 a pair for broilers. This thing that they have been attempting to make the people of Canada believe it would be good for them to adopt reminds me of the story which was put into rhyme, and which did us good service in the last election:

"There was a young lady in Niger,
Took a ride on the back of a tiger,
They returned from the ride
With the lady inside,
And a smile on the face of the tiger.

If this scheme were carried out, the Americans would be the tiger, and we would be inside. The hon. gentlemen opposite, one and all, in the course of their observations, have had a sly dab at the National Policy. They have been all the time saying that the public, that the farmers, that the long suffering community would be relieved from the burdens of the dreadful taxation which the National Policy has imposed upon them. They know perfectly well that, since the introduction of that measure, the farming community of Canada have been able to get larger prices for their goods, because of the increased centres of labor. Speaking for the manufacturing city from which I come—and in speaking of that I speak of the whole country—I know perfectly well that, before 1878, when all the interests were suffering, the farmers in our neighborhood were suffering, as they had no market; but, since then, when these factories have been busy, and we have had our own market to ourselves, and we have had mouths to feed, the farmers in the neighborhood have got good prices for their stuff. Complaints have been made of the small imports into this country during the last few years. Why, that is one of the blessings which has come from the National Policy. We want to import less and to make more here. If our imports are so many million dollars less than they were, that difference goes into the pockets of the workmen of Canada for the labor expended on that. The hon. gentlemen ever since the National Policy has been introduced, have attacked the policy in the vilest manner. They have not only attacked the policy, but they have attacked the respected leader of the Government, who guides the destinies of this country, as the man who first proposed the National Policy. They have attacked him as well as the policy, but in his case character is always a shield against malignity and calumny, and the success of the National Policy is the best argument against all the attacks which those hon. gentleman may make. With the country prospering, the people happy, and no complaining in our streets, what more do we want? We cannot have continued prosperity. There will be instances of depression in business, there will be lulls in trade, there will be changes in the general run of business but that will happen under any circumstances. But let us remember the days before 1878, when these gentlemen were preparing their exodus, when, by their policy, by their inactivity, and by their refusal to do anything to relieve the country from the state into which it had come, people had to go, they were obliged to go. That reminds me of the incident of the ranchman in the North-West, who came from a ranche in the United States. Everything was not couleur de rose there. He came to a place near the Blood Reserve. Some of the fellows knew him, and said: "Hillo, Jack, what are you doing here?" "Well," said he, "down to our ranche the grub is not very good, and I thought I would change. The pay is not very good either. But, when they came down to flap-jacks and scenery, it was not very comfortable for me." Well, this fellow passed, and after a time another came along, and he was asked what was the matter, that all the ranche boys were coming along; and, says he: "It was all very well when he had flap-jacks and scenery, but, when they stopped the flap-jacks, Jerusalem, I had to get, and I have got, and here I am." Before 1878 there was no work to do here, and men had to go away to get employment in order to send money back to feed their families. It is well known that, in the large cities of Montreal, Kingston, Toronto, Hamilton and elsewhere, there were men who were not only unable to feed their families, but were unable to educate their children, and had to take them from school. Now, things are changed, and yet hon. gentlemen decry this policy, not that they think they are right in their views or that they think the country is suffering from this policy, but it is simply another of the straws they are grasping at, and they hope they may catch some favoring wind and get back to this side of the House. But it is not very likely that they will come back to this side of the House for a long time unless they mend their manners toward the people. Those hon. gentlemen seem to think that it is time there should be a change in this glorious Confederation of ours, and that we should seek with the United States a reciprocal alliance which no one in the world can look at for five minutes without being satisfied that it is the entering wedge to annexation. I will read Mr. Hitt's resolution that was introduced into Congress at Washington:

"The House Committee on Foreign Relations unanimously voted to-day to report favorably Mr. Hitt's resolution to promote Commercial Union with Canada. It provides that whenever Canada declares a desire to establish a Commercial Union having a uniform revenue system by which internal taxes will be collected and like import duties upon articles from other nations, with no duties between the United States and Canada, the President shall appoint three Commissioners to meet a similar commission from Canada and prepare a plan for the assimilation of import duties and revenue taxes of the two countries, and an equitable division of the receipts in Commercial Union."

I will venture to say, Mr. Speaker, that should such a measure as this come to pass, in six months afterwards we would not know whether we were Americans or Canadians; we would rather be inclined, even in that short period, to say: Well, we will become Americanised pretty quickly.

Mr. MILLS. Am I, or am I not.

Mr. BROWN. Well, I am a British subject, and I hope that I will always continue to be so. Now, hon. gentlemen opposite have made the depreciation of this country the burden of their song, and in all their speeches they have prepared the way for hearing from this side of the House of our devotion to our connection with Great Britain. They have sneered at sentiment. What they call sentiment, we on this side of the House call loyalty. The hon. member for Huron who spoke the other night, declared that there was a man in his county—I think he said that he was one of a great many—who was verily of opinion that unless we could get reciprocal trade with the United States we should have to have annexation, that we must ask to be taken into the United States. Very well, I would say to the hon. member for Huron, put that friend of his on the list, and if he has an inclination of that sort himself, let him stick himself on the list. Neither will be missed by the people of Canada in connection with this great question. I tell you, Sir, that when we lose sentiment in this country, we lose the grandest thing we have got in it. When hon. gentlemen come forward here and try to mystify the House with figures, when they sneer at sentiment, which we call devotion to our country as against the almighty dollar, I say there are men in this House, and in this country, thousands upon thousands of them, that will never tolerate any such computation of the question at all. Sentiment, Sir, has made this country as great as it is; sentiment has made the country from which we sprung, great; sentiment, which you choose to sneer at, crowned the heights of Alma; the sentiment that was taught at Eton and Rugby, that was instilled into the boys there, won Waterloo; sentiment that you choose to sneer at, was what made the volunteers of Canada jump at the call of duty, and take that journey, at an inclement season of the year, to maintain the integrity of their country. Sneer at sentiment if you will; I tell you, Sir, that there is a band of men in Canada who will never surrender that sentiment, which is one of the proudest and grandest things that belong to us. I noticed in the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite, in this debate, the great care they took to sail close by the wind, so that we might not exactly catch their meaning, and so be able to pin them down; they tried to manifest indifference. Sir, there is no indifference in Canada, under which flag we sail; there is only one desire on the part of the people of Canada, except a miserable minority, and that is a desire to continue to sail and to live under the stainless flag of which we are so proud, the flag of our ancestors. And I tell you that whenever there is any attempt on the part of the public men in this country to haul down that flag and to replace it with another, 50,000 to one will be there to run it up again, to unfurl it high once more to mark their devotion to their country. Hon. gentlemen opposite always wind up their speeches by expressing devoted loyalty to their country, yet at the same time the burden of their speeches throughout has been that they will gladly go into any arrangement of a commercial character with the United States that will, as they must know, result in a political connection. No man living wishes to live in a greater feeling of amity with the United States than I do. They are a great people. The true American is as fine a man as you will find on the earth, and they are a people with whom we ought to live in the closest and most amicable relations. I do not think there are any people in the world who respect Her Majesty Queen Victoria more highly than the true American people—I am speaking of those who are descendants of the early British colonies. I am most sincere when I say that the Americans are a people with whom we should live in the greatest amity, with whom, we should have the freest commercial relations so long as they do not affect the status of this country as a part and parcel of the British Empire. We propose now to have the closest relations with the people of the United States, and our Government have put in the Customs Act a standing offer to interchange with the United States in natural products; but beyond that this country should not and will not go. The hon. gentleman who just preceded me spoke of the iron interests of this country, and said that there was a lack of furnaces in Canada for the development of the iron trade. He pointed in glowing terms to the prosperity of the iron industry of the United States. The hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) last session, when I was advocating an increase of the tariff on iron in order to develop that industry in this country, drew a doleful picture of the iron industry in the United States, and said that we in Canada would reach the same position. However, my hon. friend from Huron says to-night that the industries of the United States are successful. Does the hon. gentleman know why; if he does not, I will tell him. They are successful in consequence of the fostering care of the American Government in the tariff they have placed upon iron. There was a time when not one bar was made in the United States, when every bar came from abroad, and to-day by the fostering care of the United States during a course of years they are not only making all the iron and steel they require in the country, but they are becoming shippers.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) All the iron and steel they require?

Mr. BROWN. They can, if they do not do it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. BROWN. The hon. gentleman may laugh, but I tell him they can.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Why do they not ?

Mr. BROWN. Everything is not done in a minute. I want to tell the hon. gentleman that he is in just a little too great a hurry when he expects the whole iron industry of Canada to be developed into full bloom when it has only had proper protection for one year.

Mr. KIRK. Nine or ten years.

Mr. BROWN. Why, the policy, the only practical policy that was ever put on the Statute-book here to develop the iron industry was that of last session, which was the top stone of the National Policy. Give time and you will see the results. Hon. gentlemen opposite will remember that when the Act was passed the Government in its generosity and in its fairness to the importers of the country gave two months to admit the whole of the iron that was being brought from the other side or could be brought out. That resulted in an immense quantity of iron being brought here. That checked the operation of the iron works of the country, and to some extent probably is the reason why there has not been a movement to erect more furnaces. But that stock of imported iron is about used up now. As hon. gentlemen ought to be informed of the situation of the matter I have taken care to fortify myself with letters from all the large iron industries in the country, and I will read very small portions from them, and with the permission of the House and with the desire to shorten the debate, I will hand them to the Hansard reporters. I have letters here from the Hamilton Bridge Company, Hamilton Forge Company, Canada Pipe Company and Ontario Rolling Company, and all these letters say this: That they approve of the iron tariff, that they are using largely of Canadian iron, that they consider it first-class in quality, and that they look forward to the tariff passed last Session as the means of immensely developing the iron industry of Canada and the cause of the erection of furnaces so as to double the present manufacture.

Mr. MULOCK. Before the hon. gentlemen pass from the subject, I desire to say a word in case he should desire to refer more fully to the papers in his possession and lest he should not get them on record. I hardly think the suggestion he has made would be willingly assented to by the Debates Committee, or that the Committee would agree to it. In fact, I think it would be a very bad precedent to establish, that lengthy documents such as the hon. gentleman mentions should be handed in to the reporters.

Mr. BROWN. Then I will read them. My only desire was to shorten the debate, and as it is important to have them on record I will read them. Here is a letter from the Hamilton Bridge Company:

"We use iron of local manufacture very largely, and find it of at least equal quality to that imported, and the price as far as our experience goes is reasonable and not so high as the full tariff increase would warrant; we also have the great advantage of ordering and obtaining this material just when wanted, and without having to lay in large stocks. We are convinced that the tariff as it at present stands is a wise and far reaching measure, and one which has also an immediate result by causing the cost of material to be disbursed in this country instead of being remitted abroad to pay for the imported goods giving as it now does employment to many who otherwise would have to look elsewhere for work. You may remember that the iron bridge business is the direct growth of our protective system, it has had the effect of keeping out in many cases American structures of inferior design and material; this is shown by the number of bridges of American build, which we are now and have been for some time past replacing and renewing, and which had been erected in Canada previous to the National Policy advent."

Mr. MULOCK. What Bridge Company is it ?

Mr. BROWN. Hamilton Bridge Company. That company is erecting some of the grandest structures in Canada, on the Grand Trunk, Canadian Pacific Railways and almost every railway in the Dominion. The demand upon the company are so great that it is almost impossible for the company to overtake their orders. Here is a letter from the Hamilton Forge Company:

"HAMILTON, 21st Jan., 1888.

"ADAM BROWN, Esq., M.P., Hamilton.

"DEAR SIR,—We now very cheerfully comply with the request made by you in reference to the general effect of the tariff changes in iron inaugurated last May.

"In the first place we respectfully submit that the extension of time given to importers by the Government enabled them to bring into the country a large quantity of the finished article, that otherwise would have been made in Canada, thereby increasing the stocks then held, and to-day this iron has not all gone into consumption; but we are assured the spring will largely reduce, if not wipe out altogether said stocks; we find even now a considerable number of orders coming from men who have refused in the past to buy at home choosing rather the imported article; but they are finding out that iron can be made in Canada equal in quality and finish to any foreign make.

"In our own business we have felt the good effects of the wise and judicious policy of the Government, notably during the past four months, having largely increased our output by running our force full time, both night and day, and within the past few days have started another furnace in our establishment with all the necessary equipment, capable of turning out about one car load more of finished bar iron per day, this will give active employment to twelve skilled men, beside day laborers. We have also increased the capital stock of our company for the purpose of further developing the business, and in the near future we propose placing another mill plant with a capacity 6,000 tons per year.

"In conclusion we have much pleasure in stating that we have never heard a consumer of iron complain of the tariff changes; moreover we desire to place on record the general feelings of satisfaction expressed by them in having their wants supplied promptly at home, without having as in the past to purchase abroad, and carry large stocks, and pay cash for them, they can now secure iron within a reasonable time, that at once goes into legitimate consumption, thereby giving a hearty and vigorous tone to business.

"The continuation of an iron policy, wise in its inception and having for its object the development of the mineral resources of this country, covering the whole Dominion of Canada, meets with our hearty approval, and must eventually lay a foundation broad and enduring, that will be materially helpful to every class of man living between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans.

"We beg to remain, yours respectfully,

"HAMILTON IRON FORGING CO.,

"THOS. D. BEDDOE, Manager."

The Canada Pipe Company writes:

"The immediate result has been that my factory has been steadily employed during the past season, and will soon necessitate the increase to double its present capacity.

"I may say that another foundry for the same product is being built at the Londonderry Works in Nova Scotia, in which it is proposed to produce about double my capacity.

"The effect on the consumers has occasioned a small increase in price, but it has been my policy (and I also think that of others) not to ask the addition to the full extent of the increase in tariff, as what we want is steady work at a moderate profit, rather than the full advance in price.

"Of course, the extension of the time for admitting goods until the 30th June last year affected our business somewhat, but I could not see how that could be well avoided.

"Your respectfully,

"ALEX. GARTSHORE."

The Ontario Rolling Mill Company writes:

"We have not felt at all fully the effects, as yet, owing to the large amounts of material brought in under privilege to July 1st last; however, we knew last summer that we must expect this and governed ourselves accordingly.

"We are now beginning to feel the beneficial effects and expect that by spring we shall be called on to make far more iron than ever before.

"This feeling justifies us in making many improvements in way of increased capacity here. We may say that we shall be able to turn out by spring nearly double the tonnage we ever made here. We are also arranging to start-up the mill we have in London, either there or elsewhere, so that by May we can, if necessary, make in that mill about thirty-five tons per day. As we have explained to you, before our increased capacity, with that of the Forge Company and mills east, will enable Canadian manufacturers of bar iron to turn out more iron per year than has been used in Canada.

"We took the position last spring that under the advanced price of foreign iron made so by increased tariff, that it would tend to lessen the dissatisfaction of some importers and consumers; if we put our selling price down to a fair profit instead of holding it up to all the tariff permitted, and, also, show those who had before imported all their iron and disparaged our product in comparison with foreign iron, that we were disposed to forget all that, and treat them liberally as possible.

"We may say this policy has been followed out by us and the result is satisfactory, so far as we know. While this state of affairs has been brought about, as explained above, we hope the conditions existing between makers, jobbers and consumers, will not be disarranged by further changes. We mention this, as we heard last fall that an effort would be made to have the duty increased on scrap iron this coming session.

"If that were done, it would necessitate our adding the increase to our price of finished iron, and that would raise a general howl over the country. We are firmly of the opinion that the tariff, as it applies to manufacturers of iron, should not be disturbed.

"We may say that it is impossible for us to make finished bars out of imported and domestic puddled bars, and sell, without loss, in competition with foreign bars.

"Should there be any further information that you wish, please let us know. We have not changed our opinion as to the wisdom of the policy of the Government on the iron question.

"We are, yours truly,

"ONTARIO ROLLING MILLS."

Now, Sir, to show you the opinion of those interested in industries there in which probably I suppose there are not less than $5,000,000 invested and which is being increased every day, and to show you that they are satisfied with the policy of the Government on the development of the iron industry, that they believe the policy to be the right one and to show you that we can get all the iron we want in Canada, I will quote some of those expressions of opinion. The hon. gentleman said there was lots of iron in the bowels of the earth, and I need not point out that the object of the National Policy is to unearth it. We know very well that hitherto the policy of our Government has been to do all that it could to promote emigration of the proper kind to this country. I believe with the hon. gentleman that the farmer is at the bottom of the success of our country and I advocate the bringing of all the farmers that we can of the right sort, to this country, bringing them in to plough the furrows, to sow the seed, and to reap the golden harvest which will be sent to the rest of the world. That is what we want in this country and I wish to see as much of it as we can have. Let no man try to gull the country and to gull the farmers by telling them that the National Policy is not a benefit to them. I have here a number of telegrams which I have received from our city of Hamilton and from those interested in different industries there which are all against this policy and which are after this style.

"Commercial Union would kill our forge and preside at the funeral of our rolling mills. As loyal Canadians, we protest against the possibility of our tariff being arranged for us at Washington.

"T. D. BEDDOE.

"Mgr. Hamilton Iron and Forging Co."

"If Commercial Union should be adopted, it would utterly destroy the pipe industry and certainly lead to annexation. Don't let Washington dictate our tariff.

"ALEX. GARTSHORE,

"Canada Pipe Works."

"Under Commercial Union we would have to shut down our works entirely.

"ONTARIO ROLLING MILLS CO."

"Commercial Union would destroy our business in carriage and saddlery hardware and scales, and would seriously damage stove business.

"BURROW, STEWART & MILNE."

"Unrestricted reciprocity would effectually close the canning industry. In most cases farmers receive for their products twice the price paid in the United States, particularly for tomatoes.

"J. W. CUY KENDALL & CO.,

"Rising Sun Canning and Pickling Co."

"Unrestricted reciprocity would close every sewer pipe factory in Canada.

"CANADA SEWER PIPE CO."

"The furniture trade would be severe sufferers, more particularly the manufacturers, for the following reasons:—The American factories are now nearly all large stock companies with large capital, and have all the advantages in purchasing that capital gives. From their large output they have the division of labor so fine that the cost of production would be and is much less than we can hope to arrive at here with a limited production and output. Our manufactures are only now getting nicely on their feet. The large concerns could wipe them out before we could change our style of business to the change of market.

"J. HOODLESS & SON."

"Unrestricted reciprocity would be hurtful to the country and ruinous to our business.

"OSBORNE-KILLEY MANUFACTURING MACHINISTS CO."
Mr. BROWN.

"We consider that Commercial Union would be most disastrous to our interests.

"HAMILTON COTTON CO."

The managers of the Wheel Works, who employ a large number of people, say:

"After considering the question of Commercial Union in all its different bearings, political, commercial and social, we are of the decided opinion that it is not for the interest of this country to entertain the idea. It is but the stepping stone to annexation. As far as our particular business is concerned, we are positive it would injuriously affect it, if not altogether destroy it.

"F. W. HORE & SON."

"Consider risk far too great; can make as cheap, but would have to make New York the chief distributing point for selling; can make fair living now, and no money consideration would make me give up our Canadian independence. When the Canadians show that they have no brains to make living without foreign assistance, by all means let them annex, and wipe themselves out as a miserable race.

"JAS. WATSON,

"Strathroy Knitting Co."

"We believe it would destroy the manufacturing part of it, and resolve us into traders or agents for western houses. Am writing.

"F. W. FEARMAN,

"Pork, Bacon and Lard Packer."

"We should have to share the market here with little prospect of entering the American market. The effect would be ruinous.

"B. GREENING & CO.,

"Wire Workers."

"Were unrestricted reciprocity or Commercial Union to come in force we would at once remove our business to United States.

"D. MORTON & SON,

"Soapmakers."

Now I have a telegram from the Bridge Company, a company that we are proud of, and a company whose structures have excited the admiration of all experts in bridge building in this country. Not only this Bridge Company, but the companies in Montreal and elsewhere, are entirely an outcome of the National Policy. And yet hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, as if it were a mere nothing, and a matter of no importance to the company, wish to have this industry wiped away. Here is what the President of the Bridge Company telegraphs me on this question:

"Unrestricted Reciprocity would destroy our bridge business. American bridge shops are generally attached to iron works, where they have raw material at their hand, and have large capital and an unlimited field, but competition with them is such that few pay dividends. A large part of raw material used by us is imported from Europe, but we use all we can get made in Canada. Our work is preferred to either English or American.

"WM. HENDRIE,

"President Hamilton Bridge Company."

There is another point I would like to refer to, and I regret that the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) is not in his seat as I made a special memorandum for him on this question. He represents a constituency in which the article of cheese is the great staple of the country. Canadian cheese has worked its way up from a very small beginning until to-day it occupies a position on the American market superior to the American cheese. Hon. gentlemen will be astonished when I tell them that I can remember when there was not a man in Canada who made boxes to hold cheese. I believe, Sir, that I saw the first box that was turned out to hold cheese, and to-day the export of cheese from Canada alone to foreign markets, to say nothing of the home consumption, exceeds $7,000,000. Now, the point I want to make is, and on which my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) will have a little difficulty in explaining himself to his constituents, is that unrestricted reciprocity will put Canadian cheese on the same level with inferior American cheese and therefore it will bring no better price to the Canadians than to Americans. Hon. gentleman on the other side may laugh, but I tell you there is no doubt about it and it is a proper proposition to make and a good argument to use.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh!

Mr. BROWN. What is the use of talking. I have here a telegram from the president of the largest cheese concern in Canada on this question.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). That is equal to saying the Canadians do not know cheese.

Mr. BROWN. Some of them do not know beans on the other side of the House. I asked the gentleman if he was president of the Cheese Association, as I wanted to have the highest authority. He answered:

"Yes, I am president of the association. No fixed prices can be given for cheese, as it depends on the supply and demand abroad. Think unrestricted reciprocity would not benefit us. Our cheese at present leads the market in price and quality, and any interference in the present mode of shipment that would be the means of our cheese being sent into the English market as American cheese would interfere with our high prestige against us."

That is the highest authority. This is from a man that leads the cheese organisation in the west.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant) What is the name?

Mr. BROWN. His name is E. Caswell, he lives in Ingersoll, and he will see anybody from 7 o'clock till 9; he is always at his business. Hon. gentlemen seem to have been a good deal mixed in the last three or four weeks, and it is only now that they are getting the tangle taken out. Their opinions respecting this unrestricted reciprocity and commercial union have appeared in various forms through the press; but they seem now to be pretty well whipped into line, and I suppose before this debate is concluded they will all be of one mind as to what unrestricted reciprocity is and what commercial union is. But they seem to have a woeful forgetfulness of what they used to think, many of them, of the noble consummation effected by the Fathers of Confederation, which is making our country great, and which has already commanded the admiration of the world. Perhaps there is no country that has prospered so much, or that has made such satisfactory progress as Canada has done since the time Confederation was accomplished. I would just like to read an extract written at the conclusion of the first decade of Confederation:

"The Dominion of Canada has now completed the first decade, and can with pardonable pride review the history of those ten years while the future can be looked forward to with hopefulness and confidence. Every one acknowledges that Canadian Confederation has been a great success, and those who had the greatest doubts about the venture are now ready to confess that the plan was a wise one, and that the result has been all the most sanguine could have anticipated."

"Ten years have come and gone, and what do we see? Canada stretches from ocean to ocean, and in all her wide domains there is not a section of the inhabitants that is not loyal to her Government and deliberately and enlightenedly attached to her constitution. The idea of annexation is dead. The desire for it is to-day not spoken of as a factor in the politics of the continent. Its discussion is not thought of even in juvenile debating clubs when 'questions' are at a premium and there is a desire to have something that will 'draw.' Never was there a time in all the past when there was more neighborly cordiality between Canada and the United States, and at the same time less thought of or desire for a nearer political relationship than exists at present. Both fare on their way with mutual respect and with a growing conviction that each has a divergent destiny, with different habits, different national peculiarities, special modes of thought, and special civilisations which may have their own particular excellencies and their own shortcomings, but can never be amalgamated without mutual injury and loss."

"While the material progress of Canada has during these last ten years been very marked, her educational and religious progress has not been less noticeable. In every respect we have cause, not for boasting, but for commendable satisfaction. The past is full of encouragement. The future is full of hope. We may all address ourselves with renewed energy and alacrity each to our own proper work, with the full conviction that, individually, we can all help to make Canada flourish more than more in all which really characterises a free and prosperous people, and that as each and all cultivate what is really true, manly, moral, intelligent and religious, so will Canada flourish, and flourish long and ever progressively, sharing as she does and will the glorious, and helping to accomplish the destiny, of the mighty empire which after centuries of trial, and triumph is found to have nothing about it of age, but its matured wisdom; its gathered experience; its prudence without a touch of feebleness; and its true conservatism which is ever found in rational progress and timely improvement and reform."

This splendid extract I have made from the Toronto Globe. Yet hon. gentlemen opposite have for the last ten years sought to disturb this great Confederation which has been the hope of the people of Canada, and which is full of inspiration for the young men of our country—something for them to live for, something for them to work for. But hon. gentlemen opposite and their friends have sought to neutralise all our hopes in the future of this country; they declare that there is no prosperity in store for Canada under its present rule and its present institutions. They declare that we must have our whole fiscal policy changed, no matter if the result may be that we must change the institutions of our country and seek for sustenance and support by allegiance to those of another. Hon. gentlemen opposite, as I have said, had their nostrums now and again. They have sought to excite ill will among the people towards the administration of this country. One cannot help being reminded of the scene of the witches in Macbeth, with all their toil and trouble, their boil and bubble, as they were mixing up the various ingredients in their caldron and say to each other,

"Round about the caldron go,
In the poisoned entrails throw."

The policy of hon. gentlemen opposite since 1878 has been as strange a mixture of heterogeneous compounds as that of the witches' broth, described by Shakespeare, into which they put:

"Fillet of a fenny snake,
In the caldron boil and bake;
Eye of newt, and toe of frog,
Wool of bat, and tongue of dog,
Adder's fork, and blind-worm's sting,
Lizard's leg, and owl's wing—

In these changes they have sought

"For a charm of powerful trouble,
Like a hell-broth, boil and bubble,"

Which after all has produced for them nothing but

"Double, double toil and trouble, Fire burn and caldron bubble;"

And if they continue long the same kind of cookery, the people of the country will get tired of both them and their broth. We have a country well worth living for. I consider the people of the United States about the grandest neighbors anybody could possibly have, and we ought to cultivate the closest relationship with them. They spring from the same blood, and inherit the same laws—the best laws under heaven which have been transmitted to us by the best blood of our forefathers.

Mr. LISTER. And foremothers.

Mr. BROWN. Yes, foremothers; and your foremother was not very proud of you. We should cultivate the best sentiments between these people, and we are doing it; and I hope the day will never come when there will be any rivalry between that country and ours, but that rivalry which will produce the greatest good for humanity. I hope that this alliance of commerce between the two countries will be held sacred in the interests of peace and commerce. I may, with pride, quote to you the words of a distinguished statesman, one who has shed lustre upon his career in this country, one who has adorned the history of Canada. I refer to Lord Dufferin. In his great speech at Winnipeg, speaking of the United States and of the propriety of keeping on the best terms with that country, he said:

"But of no nearer connection does she dream. In a world apart, secluded from all extraneous influences, nestling at the feet of Her Majestic mother Canada dreams her dream, and forbodes her destiny—a dream of ever broadening harvests, multiplying towns and villages, and expanding pastures; of constitutional self government and a confederated Empire; of page after page of honorable history, added as her contribution to the annals of the mother country and to the glories of the British race, of a perpetuation for all times upon this continent of that temperate and well balanced system of government which combines in one mighty whole as the eternal possession of all Englishman the brilliant history and traditions of the past with the freest and most untrammelled liberty of action in the future."

I will not detain the House any longer but I will close my remarks by asking the House if I could give any better advice to the people of Canada or to the hon. gentlemen opposite, in our discussions of all matters connected with our country, than to repeat the words of that same distinguished nobleman Lord Dufferin, when, following up the spirit of his address to the people of Manitoba, he used the following language which should be written in letters of gold, and be taught in the schools of our country :

"Love your country, believe in your country, honor her, work for her, live for her, die for her."

M. CHOQUETTE : Mon intention n'est pas, M. l'Orateur, d'infliger à cette Chambre un long discours, surtout dans une langue qui, malheureusement, ne sera pas comprise par un grand nombre de mes honorables amis. Mais je tiens tout spécialement à faire connaître mes vues sur l'importante question qui est maintenant devant la Chambre, parce que je représente un comté essentiellement agricole et qui a le plus grand intérêt à ce que ses vues soient connues par mon entremise dans cette Chambre et dans le pays.

Je tiens à exposer en quelques mots mes vues sur cette question, surtout pour répudier les avancées qui ont été faits d'abord par l'honorable ministre de l'intérieur qui a guidé le débat de l'autre côté de la Chambre, ensuite par un grand nombre d'autres députés, et spécialement par l'honorable député qui vient de prendre son siège, à savoir, que cette question de réciprocité n'est pas venue devant le pays et n'a pas été discutée devant le peuple lors des dernières élections générales.

Je ne sais pas exactement ce qui a été fait dans d'autres comtés, mais dans mon comté, je puis dire que la question a été spécialement discutée ; elle a été l'un des points principaux sur lesquels la lutte s'est faite. Une des raisons principales que j'avais pour mettre la discussion spécialement sur ce terrain, c'est que mon adversaire se donnait comme indépendant dans le temps, et qu'il disait ne pas différer d'opinion avec moi sur la question nationale qui était une des principales qui agitaient alors la province de Québec.

Et pour prouver son indépendance, il disait qu'il avait comme moi condamné le gouvernement sur la question du Nord-Ouest. Par conséquent, la discussion se trouvait pour ainsi dire resserrée dans des bornes étroites, qui était la seule question de protection et de réciprocité avec les Etats-Unis.

Eh bien ! M. l'Orateur, je dis donc que la question a été discutée chez nous, et la meilleure preuve qu'elle a été comprise par la population du comté de Montmagny, comme de plusieurs comtés environnants, c'est le verdict qui a été rendu.

En 1882, nous avons aussi fait la discussion sur cette question-là. La question de protection s'est présentée aussi incidemment, et le comté de Montmagny qui, à tort ou à raison, — mais à tort suivant moi, — avait refusé mes services, et élu mon adversaire par 120 voix de majorité, s'est prononcé en ma faveur aux dernières élections et m'a envoyé représenter le comté et ses véritables intérêts dans cette Chambre, en m'élisant par près de 200 voix de majorité.

Maintenant, M. l'Orateur, supposons que cette question ne fût pas venue devant le peuple ; supposons que cette question n'eût pas été discutée devant l'électorat, les honorables messieurs de l'autre côté de cette Chambre peuvent-ils nous en faire un reproche ? Est-ce que nous n'avons pas le droit d'amener cette question devant la Chambre avant d'autres élections générales ? Est-ce que nous n'avons pas le droit de mettre devant la Chambre et le pays nos idées sur lesquelles, plus tard, le peuple pourra se prononcer et les ratifier ? Si nous n'avons pas ce droit, est-ce que le parti qui occupe aujourd'hui les banquettes ministérielles peuvent nous en faire un reproche ?

Mr. BROWN.

Lorsqu'on a imposé au pays la Confédération, M. l'Orateur, est-ce que cette question est venue devant le peuple ? Loin d'être venue devant le peuple, lorsqu'il s'est agi de se prononcer sur la question, lorsqu'il s'est agi de la faire approuver ou de la faire condamner par l'électorat, des provinces entières se sont prononcées contre, et cependant, la Confédération a été faite. Lorsque ces honorables messieurs ont amené devant la Chambre le bill des franchises qui changeaient pour ainsi dire la représentation, qui changeait dans un grand nombre de provinces le système représentatif, est-ce qu'ils ont craint qu'on leur fasse des reproches de ne pas s'être adressés d'abord à l'électorat ? Non, M. l'Orateur, ils ont présenté ce bill sans consulter le peuple. Et lorsqu'ils ont jeté les millions au Pacifique, et qu'ils sont à la veille d'en jeter encore, est-ce qu'ils sont allés devant le peuple demander d'approuver leur politique ?

Par conséquent, M. l'Orateur, supposons que la question n'aurait pas été discutée, bien que je prétende que pour ce qui nous concerne elle a été discutée, que le verdict a été rendu sur l'issue qui était soulevée, est-ce que nous n'avons pas le droit de venir devant cette Chambre exposer nos vues sur cette question, et demander plus tard la confirmation de ces vues au peuple ? Je prétends que oui, M. l'Orateur, et je suis convaincu qu'elles recevront dans le temps l'approbation de l'électorat.

Maintenant la question de protection sur laquelle on fait la bataille, cette question de protection telle qu'elle existe actuellement, a-t-elle été mise devant le peuple ? Est-ce que l'électorat a eu occasion de se prononcer sur cette question d'une manière franche et sincère, c'est-à-dire de se prononcer sur un tarif de 30, 35 et 40 pour cent ? Je dis que non, et je vais le prouver. D'abord je dirai ceci : c'est qu'en 1876, 1877 et 1878, lorsque les honorables messieurs qui occupent les banquettes du trésor étaient dans l'opposition, ils ont voulu mettre devant la Chambre et devant le pays des résolutions à l'effet de faire approuver la politique de protection. Eh bien ! ont-ils mis devant la Chambre ce qu'ils voulaient ? Ont-ils réellement exposé leur politique devant le pays ? Ont-ils dit au peuple, par l'entremise de la Chambre, par l'entremise de la presse, qu'ils mettraient une muraille de Chine entre le Canada et les Etats-Unis et qu'ils imposeraient un tarif de 30 et 35 pour 100 ? Non, M. l'Orateur.

Voici la résolution que l'honorable premier ministre proposait alors : —

Que cette Chambre regrette que Son Excellence le gouverneur général n'ait pas été conseillé de recommander un remaniement de tarif à l'effet non-seulement de rendre moins sensible la stagnation qu'on déplore dans le gracieux discours du trône, mais aussi d'offrir l'encouragement et la protection qu'il convient aux manufactures et aux industries en souffrance aussi bien qu'aux produits agricoles du pays.

Eh bien ! est-ce que dans cette motion la politique que le gouvernement devait inaugurer est exprimée ? Est-ce qu'il est dit qu'elle était la proposition que l'on voulait soumettre au peuple ? Est-ce qu'il est dit que l'on voulait lui imposer un tarif aussi élevé que celui qui existe actuellement ?

Prenons la résolution de 1877. L'honorable premier ministre actuel, alors chef de l'opposition, proposait alors :

Que cette Chambre regrette que la politique financière du gouvernement augmente le fardeau des taxes sur le peuple sans procurer comme compensation, aucun avantage aux industries canadiennes, et de plus que cette Chambre est d'opinion que le déficit dans le revenu devrait être comblé en réduisant les dépenses et au moyen d'un remaniement de tarif qui protégerait et favoriserait les intérêts agricoles, miniers et manufacturiers du Canada.

Voilà la résolution de 1877. Elle est à peu près dans la même sens que celle de 1876 ; on a changé les mots et on n'a pas fait connaître au peuple ce que l'on voulait.

Maintenant venons à la dernière session, en 1878. Voici la résolution que l'honorable premier ministre d'aujourd'hui a alors proposée :

Qu'il soit résolu que cette Chambre est d'opinion que la prospérité du Canada requiert l'adoption d'une politique nationale qui, par un rajuste-ment judicieux du tarif, bénéficiera et favorisera les intérêts agricoles, miniers et manufacturiers du Canada.

Eh bien ! M. l'Orateur, je dis qu'il n'y avait rien devant le pays, qu'il n'y avait rien devant la Chambre qui démontrait que le gouvernement voulait imposer les charges énormes qui existent actuellement ; et je dis qu'en allant devant le pays avec ces résolutions, et en imposant ensuite, après avoir été élus sur ces résolutions, le tarif énorme qui existe aujourd'hui, je dis que l'on a obtenu les votes du peuple sous de faux prétextes. Je dis que les honorables députés de l'opposition ne voulaient pas faire connaître leurs vues au peuple parce qu'ils savaient que la vérité leur ferait tort. Alors, s'ils ne voulaient pas sincèrement faire connaître quel était leur but, je dis qu'ils ont trompé le peuple et qu'ils ont obtenu le pouvoir sous de faux prétextes.

Et je dirai plus, M. l'Orateur ; pendant la campagne électorale, un monsieur John Boyd télégraphiait à l'honorable chef de l'opposition d'alors dans les termes suivants :

La presse ministérielle affirme ici que vous proposez d'élever le tarif généralement à 35 pour cent. Puis-je contredire ?

Voilà la dépêche adressée de Saint-Jean, dans le Nouveau-Brunswick au chef de l'opposition qui brigait alors les faveurs populaires, en lui disant : on dit que vous voulez faire telle chose, est-ce que je puis contredire ? On savait donc, M. l'Orateur, que si on ne contredisait pas cette assertion dans le temps, on perdrait des votes que l'on ne pourrait pas capter la confiance populaire et prendre la majorité dans le pays.

Alors qu'est-ce qu'a répondu le chef du gouvernement actuel ? Voici sa réponse :

A. M. JOHN BOYD, Saint-Jean, N. B.

C'est un absurde mensonge. Ni à London ni ailleurs ai-je été au delà de la résolution par moi proposée en parlement. Je n'ai pas parlé d'augmentation de tarif, mais de remaniement.

Eh bien ! voici trois résolutions mises devant la Chambre à trois sessions différentes ; et lors de la lutte électorale, pendant que le peuple était à faire la bataille, pendant que le gouvernement Mackenzie était à subir son procès et qu'on l'accusait de ne pas remanier le tarif, pour protéger les industries agricoles et minières, pendant qu'on l'accusait pour ainsi dire d'être traître à son pays, on demandait à son accusateur : voulez-vous, vous, faire telle chose ? Augmenterez-vous le tarif si vous arrivez au pouvoir ? Et le chef du gouvernement actuel répondait que c'était un absurde mensonge ; que jamais il n'avait songé à augmenter le tarif plus que le comportait les résolutions, bien que ces résolutions ne disaient pas un mot du tarif.

Eh bien ! je le répète M. l'Orateur, on a obtenu les votes sous un faux prétexte, et aujourd'hui les honorables messieurs de l'autre côté de la Chambre ne peuvent pas déclarer sans fausser la vérité qu'ils ont obtenu le pouvoir sous le couvert de la protection.

Maintenant, M. l'Orateur, plusieurs députés de l'autre côté de la Chambre ont dit dans le cours de ce débat, que cette question de protection était réglée ; que le peuple s'était prononcé en trois circonstances différentes : en 1878 et 1882, et 1887 ; que le gouvernement avait eu gain de cause, et que la protection devrait être maintenue dans le pays. M. l'Orateur, je fais objection à cet argument, et je dis que ni le gouvernement, ni les honorables messieurs de la droite n'ont pas raison de soutenir devant la Chambre ce qu'ils disent aujourd'hui, et voici pourquoi : en 1878 le système protecteur, tel qu'il existe aujourd'hui, n'a pas été discuté devant le peuple, et conséquemment ce dernier n'a pu se prononcer sur cette question. Qu'est-il arrivé en 1882 ? A cette époque il a fallu retourner devant le peuple, et expliquer la protection, sur les dépêches, les discours, les motions contenues dans les livres publics, et défendre la position que le gouvernement occupait. Que fit le gouvernement alors ? Comme il savait qu'il allait être condamné par le peuple, il a passé le gerrymander bill avant les élections, et lorsque les élections sont arrivées le peuple n'a pas pu encore se prononcer sur la question, car on avait remanié les comtés de manière à faire disparaître les majorités libérales et à les transformer en majorités conservatrices. Par conséquent pas plus en 1882 qu'en 1878, la question de la protection n'a été portée devant le peuple sur son vrai mérite.

Maintenant en 1882 qu'est-il arrivé encore ? Est-ce qu'on est venu devant le peuple sur la même question franchement ? Est-ce que le gouvernement a soumis cette question au même corps d'électeurs ? Non, M. l'Orateur, parce qu'en 1882 ce n'était pas les mêmes comtés qu'en 1878 ? Mais en 1887, est-ce que le gouvernement a encore demandé aux mêmes électeurs de ratifier sa politique ? Est-ce qu'en 1887 c'était la même population qui devait se prononcer, soit pour condamner ou approuver la politique du gouvernement ? Non, M. l'Orateur, car là encore, afin de remporter les élections, on a fait le fameux bill des franchises, et c'est au moyen de ce bill que le gouvernement a pu se maintenir au pouvoir. Je dis donc que le peuple ne s'est pas prononcé sur cette question ni en 1878, ni en 1882, ni en 1887.

La réciprocité, voilà la question qui se présentera aux prochaines élections. Nous prenons les devants et nous voulons qu'alors il n'y ait pas de faux-fuyants. Nous voulons que les électeurs puissent se prononcer et déclarer si le régime protecteur doit être maintenu, ou repoussé. Nous voulons qu'ils puissent déclarer si la réciprocité doit, au contraire, être adoptée. Voilà la raison pour laquelle j'approuve la présente motion, et j'approuve surtout l'opportunité de la faire dès maintenant, afin qu'aux élections prochaines, elle soit parfaitement connue des électeurs qui auront alors à se prononcer.

Maintenant, M. l'Orateur, le système protecteur qui a été inauguré, le tarif actuellement en force, est-il, ainsi qu'on le prétend, de nature à satisfaire les besoins du pays ? Est-ce une chose que le peuple en général, sans distinction de classe peut approuver, sous prétexte qu'il est dans l'intérêt général du pays ? Est-ce qu'il est véritablement dans l'intérêt général du pays ?

Je dis non, M. l'Orateur. Il suffit de savoir que le mot protection est synonyme de taxe, pour dire que du moment que la taxe existe cela ne peut pas être dans l'intérêt du pays, car la taxe existe toujours aux dépens du consommateur. Ceux qui ont lu Bastiat ou quelqu'autres auteurs en économie politique, peuvent s'en convaincre facilement. Il s'agit seulement de prendre les auteurs qui ont prôné la protection, les auteurs anglais qui ont dit que le tarif protecteur devait être adopté, que c'était le meilleur tarif, et qui ont donné les mêmes raisons que donnent les honorables députés de l'autre côté de la Chambre pour son adoption. Et je citerai entr'autres "Sidgwick, Political Economy," à la page 489, qui dit :

"Of course such a duty—if needed and effective—imposes a tax on the consumers of the article protected."

Comme question de principe, je dis ceci : que du moment que vous mettez un tarif protecteur, vous imposez une taxe ; du moment que vous élevez le tarif, vous élevez les taxes aux dépens des consommateurs ou de ceux qui achètent, et de la même manière cette taxe est imposée au profit des producteurs qui sont représentés par les grands manufacturiers. Je n'ai pas été étonné d'entendre, il y a un instant, l'honorable député de Hamilton (M. Brown), lire devant cette Chambre une foule de télégrammes et de lettres venant de tous les manufacturiers qui se déclarent satisfaits du tarif protecteur. Mais, a-t-il lu une seule lettre ou une seule dépêche venant d'un cultivateur ou d'un ouvrier, d'un consommateur enfin ? Non, il n'a lu que des dépêches et des lettres de ceux qui bénéficient du tarif protecteur.

Je ne veux pas blâmer l'honorable député d'Hamilton, (M. Brown), ni ceux qui lui ont adressé ces dépêches, car, si j'étais manufacturier je ferais peut-être la même chose. Mais, nous députés, qui sommes ici pour défendre les intérêts généraux du pays et non pour favoriser une classe ; qui sommes ici comme les représentants de la grande majorité, les consommateurs, si nous voulons être de bons citoyens,—et je considère qu'il n'y a de bons citoyens que ceux qui veulent le bien du plus grand nombre,—notre devoir est de protéger le plus grand nombre, c'est-à-dire ceux qui achètent et qui consomment. Par conséquent, je dis que ces lettres que vient de lire l'honorable député ont peut-être leur raison d'être, au point de vue des intérêts manufacturiers; mais je défie qui que ce soit de produire devant la Chambre des lettres ou des dépêches venant de cultivateurs ou de ceux qui consomment; venant de la classe pauvre ou agricole.

Or, s'il n'y a que les producteurs, que les manufacturiers qui profitent de ces droits protecteurs, les classes pauvres, les classes agricoles en souffrent, et il est de notre devoir de remédier à cet état de choses. Le remède est dans le traité de réciprocité. Les classes pauvres pourront alors acheter là où il leur plaira et où elles trouveront à meilleur marché. Je dis donc, M. l'Orateur, que les droits imposés pour protéger les manufactures est une taxe. Et je ne comprends pas l'inconséquence des honorables messieurs de l'autre côté de la Chambre, qui, après avoir établi ce tarif protecteur, se lèvent de leurs sièges pour demander des enquêtes contre ces combinaisons formées par les manufacturiers. Ils font comme Saturne, qui, une fois que les enfants étaient nés, les dévorait. Ils imposent un droit pour protéger les manufacturiers, et à la session suivante, ils disent qu'ils ont fait une combinaison et qu'il faut les combattre. Le mode de les combattre, M. l'Orateur, ce serait de permettre la compétition. Ce serait d'empêcher, d'enlever les droits énormes en faveur des manufacturiers au moyen desquels ils forcent la classe pauvre et la classe agricole d'acheter chez eux et au prix qu'ils demandent.

Maintenant, M. l'Orateur, cette question de la protection n'est pas aussi nouvelle qu'on veut le faire croire. Du moins, les honorables députés de l'autre côté de la Chambre n'ont pas toujours été de cette opinion. Il n'y a pas bien longtemps qu'ils sont pour la protection. Ils leur fallait un mot d'ordre pour capter la confiance populaire, et, en 1878, ils ont inventé ce mot qui a eu le résultat que l'on sait dans cette Chambre.

Il a été lu de nombreux documents dans cette Chambre depuis le commencement de ce débat, et surtout hier au soir par l'honorable député de Pictou (M. Tupper), dans son discours où il y avait beaucoup de fleurs mais bien peu de fruits. On a fait beaucoup de citations pour tâcher de mettre en contradiction les opinions des chefs de ce côté-ci de la Chambre; pour montrer que nous étions inconséquents, pour montrer que le parti libéral n'avait jamais eu de programme établi et qu'aujourd'hui on prenait ce mot parce qu'il faisait notre affaire.

M. l'Orateur, c'est une arme à deux tranchants que de rappeler le passé! C'est une arme à deux tranchants que de venir accuser d'inconséquence les honorables députés de ce côté-ci de cette Chambre; de les accuser d'avoir des idées contraires à celles de dix ans passés.

Mais est-ce que les honorables messieurs de l'autre côté qui ont eu, eux aussi, des chefs qu'ils ont respectés et avec beaucoup de raison,—car les chefs dans le passé étaient aussi honorables et aussi distingués que ceux d'aujourd'hui,—est-ce que ces chefs-là n'ont pas aussi changé d'opinion? Est-ce qu'ils n'ont pas donné une opinion contraire à leur opinion dans le temps? Est-ce qu'ils n'ont pas dit, il n'y a pas plus que dix-huit ou vingt ans, que d'adopter la protection ce serait mettre dans le pays le taillant de la hache qui détruirait nos industries nationales? Est-ce que sir George Cartier, en 1871, n'a pas dit cette chose-là après avoir été obligé de voter contre des taxes qu'il avait imposées en 1870 sur le lard, les patates, le charbon, le blé et d'autres produits. Qu'est-ce que disait le Grand Manitou conservateur à cette époque? En janvier 1871, un grand banquet était donné à Québec à ce chef distingué. On lui demandait d'établir un programme politique parce qu'il devait y avoir des élections quelques années après, peut-être dans un temps très rapproché. Le chef s'est exécuté de bonne grâce. Il a fait un discours remarquable; remarquable surtout parce qu'il contredit carrément cette politique de protection que l'on vante tant aujourd'hui, cette politique que l'on maintient toujours pour ainsi dire sous de faux prétextes. Ce grand chef conservateur disait ceci,—et je regrette que la majorité de l'autre côté de la Chambre ne puissent pas comprendre le français, je regrette que ceux qui nous font un reproche d'avoir changé d'opinion ne puissent apprécier le langage de l'ancien chef conservateur. Voici ce que disait sir George Etienne Cartier en 1871, à Québec, dans une ville essentiellement libérale, dont l'un des quartiers a l'honneur d'avoir pour son représentant en cette Chambre notre chef si distingué, celui qui saura toujours, nous l'espérons, prendre les intérêts de la classe agricole, de la classe pauvre, de la classe des consommateurs.

Sir George Cartier disait alors :

Les industriels demandent des droits protecteurs. Cela est absurde avec la protection poussée trop loin, vous tuez votre commerce extérieur comme cela est arrivé aux Américains, et il nous faut avoir recours aux taxes directes. Nous ne ferons pas une telle folie. Nous avons adopté la politique d'imposer un droit fiscal, et non un droit protecteur On demande un tarif protecteur. Mais lorsque vous protégez les manufactures, vous limitez la vente de vos produits à vos nationaux. Si les Etats-Unis n'exportent pas davantage, c'est que la protection élève trop le prix des effets.

Eh bien, M. l'Orateur, voilà sir George Cartier qui disait à Québec : adopter la protection ce serait une folie, c'est absurde, il est impossible d'y songer. Et cependant, lorsque cet homme a disparu, lorsque ceux qui prétendent le représenter et continuer son œuvre, lorsque ceux qui veulent le suivre et marcher sur ces traces, viennent dire tout le contraire, je ne dirai pas que c'est une folie, je ne dirai pas que c'est une absurdité, car je les crois sincères, je crois qu'ils veulent réellement l'intérêt du pays, mais si c'était une folie en 1871, cela ne peut pas être bon aujourd'hui. Les temps ne changent pas si vite. Avec les siècles les choses peuvent changer, mais ce n'est pas en dix ans qu'une folie peut devenir une chose raisonnable.

Eh bien, M. l'Orateur, je dis donc que ces honorables messieurs ont grand tort de parler d'inconséquence. Jamais nos chefs n'ont été inconséquents à ce point. Ils ont pu changer d'opinion; tout le monde est libre de changer d'opinion. Tout le monde sait que le temps, les circonstances, les besoins du pays peuvent modifier la manière de voir sur la politique fiscale du pays, surtout dans un jeune pays comme le nôtre. Mais il n'appartient pas aux honorables membres de l'autre côté de la Chambre de nous taxer d'inconséquence sur ce point.

M. l'Orateur, la protection, suivant moi et suivant le grand chef conservateur est une mauvaise chose, et il doit y avoir un autre système financier qui soit une bonne chose; il doit y avoir un autre système pour administrer les affaires du pays et le rendre prospère. Ce système, c'est celui de la réciprocité. Et ce système, M. l'Orateur, n'est pas nouveau non plus. Sur ce point, les honorables messieurs de l'autre côté de la Chambre se contredisent dans leurs discours, dans leurs écrits et même dans l'amendement maintenant soumis à cette Chambre.

Mais voyons si la réciprocité est une bonne chose. Et si c'était une bonne chose lorsque le peuple était jeune, lorsque notre population n'était pas considérable, lorsque nos ressources étaient minimes, pourquoi ne serait-elle pas bonne aujourd'hui? Pourquoi ne l'adopterions-nous pas aujourd'hui lorsque nous voyons par les documents publics et par l'histoire qu'elle a été avouée par tous les chefs conservateurs? Est-ce que ce serait parce que c'est le parti libéral qui la propose qu'elle est mauvaise? Je dis, M. l'Orateur, qu'un député qui voterait sur une question aussi importante par esprit de parti serait indigne de la position qu'il occupe. Et lorsque je viens ici combattre la politique du gouvernement je ne le fais pas par esprit de parti. Le peuple, leur a donné le pouvoir et nous nous y soumettons volontiers. Nous les aiderons lorsque nous pourrons les aider ; mais lorsque leur politique sera mauvaise nous les combattrons comme nous le faisons aujourd'hui. En 1847, il a été question du traité de réciprocité sous le gouvernement Sherwood-Daly dont faisait partie l'honorable premier ministre d'aujourd'hui, comme receveur général. Et à la page 24 de Turcotte, un écrivain conservateur, voici ce que l'on trouve au sujet de la réciprocité :

La province allait entrer en concurrence avec les peuples plus riches et plus avancés qu'elle, mais, pour lutter avec avantage il fallait lever tous les obstacles qui pouvaient entraver son commerce et accorder l'entrée libre dans les ports canadiens à tous les bateaux étrangers.

Ainsi, en 1847, sous un gouvernement conservateur dont l'honorable premier ministre d'aujourd'hui était un des membres, on disait que le seul moyen d'avancer le pays et de le rendre grand et prospère, c'était d'ouvrir ses portes à deux battants au commerce des Etats-Unis, et d'ouvrir ses ports à tous les vaisseaux étrangers.

En 1854, sous un gouvernement conservateur encore, on trouve ce qui suit à la page 251, de Turcotte :

Le commerce prit une nouvelle extension que la réciprocité commerciale avec les Etats-Unis allait encore augmenter. Déjà, en 1854, le commerce de va et vient atteignait le chiffre d'environ $50,000,000.

Par conséquent, M. l'Orateur, en 1857, on avocassait la réciprocité ; en 1854, on la demandait, et en 1865, lorsqu'il a été question du ministère de coalition de Taché-Macdonald et Brown on faisait un article spécial du programme pour engager les provinces à adopter le système de la Confédération, d'avoir un traité de réciprocité avec les Etats-Unis. Et un des motifs qui a milité en faveur de la Confédération a été que les provinces réunies pourraient avoir un commerce plus étendu.

Eh bien, M. l'Orateur, si en unissant les provinces on trouvait que le commerce serait meilleur ; si en unissant les provinces ensemble on faisait disparaître la barrière qui retardait le progrès du pays, en faisant disparaître la barrière commerciale qui existe aujourd'hui entre le Canada et les Etats-Unis, nous arriverions au même résultat.

Mais il y a plus que cela, M. l'Orateur. Sous le gouvernement McNab-Morin, dont j'ai parlé il y a un instant, et duquel faisait partie l'honorable premier ministre actuel, on a constaté alors que le commerce était dans un état alarmant ; que l'émigration était considérable ; que le pays allait plutôt à reculons que de l'avant. On a alors formé un comité spécial sur l'émigration, lequel je trouve dans le Canadian Pamphlets, N° 25. Ce comité nommé par le gouvernement conservateur, était composé de députés conservateurs. Voici les raisons que l'on donnait pour la formation de ce comité. A la page 2 du rapport de ce comité il est dit ceci :

Quand une ancienne nation, par la surabondance de sa population comparée à l'étendue et aux limites de son territoire, se trouve trop à l'étroit et gênée sur le sol natal, l'émigration qui se fait d'une partie de sa population est une cause de bien-être, un bienfait non-seulement pour elle-même, mais encore pour les pays nouveaux où elle se dirige, et pour l'humanité. Mais quand un peuple, jeune encore, peu nombreux, sobre et courageux, habite un vaste territoire dont la superficie comme la fertilité du sol sont suffisantes pour contenir librement et alimenter abondamment une population cinquante fois plus nombreuse, alors son émigration est un vrai malheur, une vraie calamité publique. Une telle émigration, n'ayant pas de raison d'être dans des causes légitimes, ne peut donc qu'être le résultat, la conséquence de quelque vice radical que la société doit se hâter de découvrir afin de ne prendre aucun temps dans l'application des remèdes que commande une telle situation.

Voilà les raisons que l'on donnait pour la formation de ce comité spécial, composé de conservateurs. C'est qu'il y avait dans le pays un vice radical qui empêchait l'extension du commerce d'une manière aussi complète que le permettaient nos ressources, notre population, la fertilité du sol, c'est-à-dire, de nos mines et de nos forêts.

L'opinion de la plupart des hommes politiques du jour semble être tellement en faveur du libre échange que toute manifestation contraire pourrait paraître injustifiable et opposée à la prospérité du pays.

Ainsi en 1854 des députés conservateurs réunis en comité de cette Chambre disaient que l'opinion publique était tellement en faveur du libre-échange, que ce serait une absurdité, et même que ce serait passer pour traître à son pays que de proposer une autre politique. Le pays était jeune, la population n'était pas très considérable, et cependant, dans ce temps-là, tout le monde voulait du libre-échange et de la réciprocité. C'est donc parce que cela avait quelque chose de bon ; parce qu'on prévoyait que le pays ne pouvait grandir qu'à l'ombre de ce drapeau.

Votre comité croit donc qu'il est de la plus haute importance, pour la prospérité du pays, que la réciprocité dans les droits comme dans le libre-échange devrait exister entre cette province et les Etats-Unis ; qu'avant il devrait être imposé sur chaque article importé des Etats-Unis les droits qui sont imposés sur les articles de même nature exportés d'aucune partie du Canada ;—que notre tarif soit modifié de manière à assurer au manufacturier cette protection légitime qu'il a reçue et qu'il reçoit encore dans d'autres pays où sa position est à peu près la même que celle qu'il occupe aujourd'hui dans le nôtre.

Le comité recommandait donc en 1854 le libre-échange complet avec les Etats-Unis. Mais il concluait, naturellement avec beaucoup de raison : si vous ne voulez pas donner la réciprocité, tâchez de faire quelque chose pour les manufactures, et pour empêcher l'émigration. Cependant on remarquera qu'il demandait en premier lieu, non pas la protection, mais la réciprocité complète.

Or, M. l'Orateur, l'expérience est une leçon. Si le passé peut être de quelque utilité pour juger l'avenir, il me semble que ceux qui depuis 1847 à 1878 ont proclamé la nécessité absolue d'un traité de réciprocité avec les Etats-Unis, ont par là déclaré que la protection est une folie.

Je dis donc que nous sommes placés à un même point de vue, et même à un meilleur point de vue qu'eux, puisque notre pays est plus grand, nos ressources plus considérables, et que si cette politique de réciprocité devait être adoptée alors, je ne vois pas pourquoi aujourd'hui nous ne l'adoptons pas.

Une autre preuve que la réciprocité est une bonne chose, et la raison que je vais en donner se trouve dans le rapport du même comité, qui dit qu'une des causes pour lesquelles le pays ne progressait pas, et la colonisation ne faisait pas de progrès, c'est qu'il y avait de grands propriétaires qui accaparaient les terres publiques pour les revendre à des prix exorbitants ; ou qui, après les avoir laissés exploiter par des colons de bonne foi, s'en emparaient ensuite. Et à cela, ils attribuaient la cause de l'émigration. En effet, à la page 6, ils disent :

2° L'une des principales causes de l'émigration résulte de la concession de vastes étendues de terres qui ont été faites autrefois à un seul individu ou à des compagnies.

L'histoire se répète. Autrefois c'était les grands propriétaires qui tenaient les petits propriétaires sous leur talon, et aujourd'hui ce sont les grands manufacturiers qui tiennent la population, les classes agricoles, les consommateurs sous leurs pieds.

Maintenant, M. l'Orateur, une autre raison que l'on donne encore à l'encontre de la proposition qui est devant la Chambre, c'est que si cette politique était adoptée, on arriverait infailliblement à l'annexion. Personne ne s'est prononcé pour l'annexion dans cette Chambre, bien qu'un grand nombre de députés—et moi-même pour un,—ne trouvent pas que l'annexion soit un épouvantail. Nous sommes bien comme nous sommes, nous devons y rester, et je ne vois pas pourquoi nous changerions notre allégeance. Mais, si pour une raison ou pour une autre, la constitution venait à changer, je ne vois pas pourquoi on ne pourrait pas y remédier. Le pays est prospère, nous sommes contents. Mais je dis que cette question n'est pas en jeu et ne peut pas être un épouvantail. Et les observations qui ont été faites par l'honorable député de Perth-Nord (M. Hesson) : Que les Canadiens qui sont aux Etats-Unis ne sont bons qu'à faire des scieurs de bois ou des porteurs d'eau,—ne sont ni plus ni moins qu'une injure lancée à la face de nos frères de l'autre côté de la frontière. Car nous savons qu'un grand nombre d'entre eux se sont distingués et occupent les meilleures positions municipales et autres chez nos voisins.

Je présume toutefois que si l'honorable député qui a lancé cette injure à nos compatriotes allait aux Etats-Unis, il ne pourrait être autre chose qu'un porteur d'eau ou un scieur de bois. Et peut-être pourrais-je en dire autant de ses électeurs, car s'ils étaient capables d'être autre chose, ils ne l'auraient pas envoyé ici pour insulter nos compatriotes comme il l'a fait. Par conséquent, M. l'Orateur, il n'est pas question de l'annexion. Il est question seulement,—et c'est la seule proposition devant la Chambre,—de modifier le tarif; de faire un traité de réciprocité qui soit de nature à favoriser nos intérêts et faire prospérer notre pays; qui soit de nature à assurer plus de protection, non aux manufacturiers, mais à la classe agricole, à la classe pauvre; et je dis que toutes ces considérations que l'on donne contre la motion de l'honorable député d'Oxford-Sud (sir R. Cartwright) sont des contradictions, car enfin, dans l'amendement, on dit que l'on veut la réciprocité. On l'a dit même dans la proposition qui a été faite lors du traité des pêcheries. Mais, M. l'Orateur, si nous avons besoin de réciprocité pour les pêcheries, lorsque nous sommes plus prospères que les Etats-Unis; lorsque notre commerce de pêcheries est plus considérable et plus prospère que celui des Etats-Unis, je prends le traité des pêcheries comme une autre preuve à l'appui de la proposition que nous faisons, et pour dire que vous feriez bien d'adopter cette politique-là.

M. l'Orateur, on demande d'abolir la barrière qui empêche l'échange de nos pêcheries, et cependant je trouve, dans une brochure écrite par l'honorable député de Gaspé (M. Joncas), qui a secondé l'adresse en réponse au discours du trône,—que nos pêcheurs gagnent $42.00 de plus par année, par tête, que les pêcheurs anglais, et $13.00 de plus que les pêcheurs des Etats-Unis.

Or si nous sommes si prospères, et que nous voulons avoir un traité de réciprocité, c'est donc parce que l'on sent que notre prospérité et notre commerce s'agrandiront, que nous ferons encore plus d'affaires; que notre population sera plus à l'aise avec la réciprocité sur la question des pêcheries. Et pourquoi alors, sur les produits agricoles, sur tout ce qui se vend ou s'achète n'aurions-nous pas les mêmes avantages?

Par conséquent, je dis donc qu'en discutant cette question au point de vue politique, les honorables députés de la droite ont admis dans le passé, et admettent aujourd'hui que la proposition qui est devant la Chambre n'est ni plus ni moins que l'adoption de la proposition faite par l'honorable ministre des finances à la conférence de Washington. Et je dis que le fait de voter contre cette proposition équivaut à un vote de non-confiance dans l'honorable ministre des finances.

Maintenant, M. l'Orateur, une autre raison que l'on donne encore à l'appui des prétentions émises de l'autre côté de la Chambre, c'est que nos revenus diminueront. J'admets que c'est le cas. J'admets que nous perdrons peut-être six à sept millions de revenus. Mais si nos revenus diminuent, c'est parce que les taxes diminueront; c'est parce que le consommateur aura moins à payer. Si le trésor public perd sept millions, c'est donc sept millions de moins qui seront versés par ceux qui achètent dans le pays.

De plus, on dit qu'il faudra avoir des taxes directes ou d'autres moyens de remédier à cet état de chose. Il n'y aura pas besoin de taxe directe; mais on fera ce que l'honorable premier ministre disait lorsqu'il était dans l'opposition: on diminuera les dépenses. Je me rappelle que l'ancien ministre des finances, sir Leonard Tilley, disait que nous ne devrions pas dépenser plus que $22,500,000 ou $23,000,000; et que lui, lorsqu'il serait ministre des finances il ne dépenserait pas plus que cela. Et il ajoutait que l'honorable député d'Oxford-Sud (sir Richard Cartwright,) était un extravagant, un homme qui dépensait trop.

Eh bien, M. l'Orateur, en admettant que nos revenus diminueraient de $7,000,000, on nous demande $35,000,000 cette année, et si les honorables ministres peuvent administrer avec $22,000,000 ou $23,000,000, il me semble qu'ils pourraient administrer les affaires du pays avec $28,000,000.

M. l'Orateur, je n'ai pas l'intention de retenir la Chambre plus longtemps, et je terminerai les quelques remarques que je viens de faire en disant, pour ce qui me concerne, que cette question a été discutée dans mon comté; elle a été posée aux électeurs et la victoire a été en faveur de la réciprocité. Par conséquent, je n'hésite pas à me prononcer immédiatement, et de dire que si j'étais appelé à recommencer la lutte dans le comté, ce ne serait pas par deux cents voix que je serais élu, mais par quatre ou cinq cents.

Je dis de plus, M. l'Orateur, que le traité de réciprocité avec les Etats-Unis a été avoué de tout temps; lorsque nous étions dans une position bien inférieure que celle que nous occupons aujourd'hui; et, s'il a été trouvé bon dans le temps, il doit l'être encore aujourd'hui.

Lorsque je me lève dans cette Chambre pour appuyer la proposition qui nous est maintenant soumise, je ne le fais pas par esprit de parti. Je ne veux décrier ni ma province ni mon comté, et j'appuie cette proposition parce que je la crois dans l'intérêt de mon pays, de la classe agricole et des consommateurs. Je suis un des plus jeunes dans cette Chambre, mais j'aime mon pays. Je suis loyal à la Reine, comme n'importe qui. Je ne veux pas que l'on m'applique ces paroles du poète:

“Ceux qui jeunes encore sont froids pour leur pays,
Quand ils deviendront vieux seront ses ennemis.”

Voilà pourquoi, M. l'Orateur, je travaille pour son avancement et pour sa prospérité. Et quand je ne serai plus je veux que l'on dise de moi: que je l'ai aimé jeune, adoré vieux.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I shall not attempt to reply to the admirable speech which has been delivered by the hon. gentleman who has just sat down. So far as I am concerned, at all events, the speech of the hon. gentleman is perfectly unanswerable. But I shall ask for the indulgence of the House while I offer a few observations on the very important matter which is now under consideration. The discussion which has now taken place upon this question differs in one important respect, at least, from the discussions to which we have been accustomed to listen to in other sessions. I have heard every session, since I have had the honor of a seat in this House, the condition of this country described by hon. gentlemen opposite in very much the same language and the same way that they have described it on this occasion. I have heard the poverty of the country referred to; I have heard it also alleged that the burden of taxation was so great that the people of this country were obliged to leave it and find homes for themselves in the United States. On former occasions, however, hon. gentlemen opposite suggested no remedy for this state of things. They informed us that while a Conservative Government was in power in this country, it was impossible for Canada to make progress or prosper, but they never told us how a change of government would afford any relief. They never told us what policy they would adopt if they were entrusted with the reins of power, which would bring about a better condition of affairs in this country. It is in this respect that this discussion offers a striking contrast to the discussion to which I have referred. They have discovered now that it is unrestricted reciprocity with the United States that we require; they have discovered that if this policy should be adopted in this country, it would remove every cause of complaint, and, I presume, satisfy the wants and aspirations of us all. I feel that it is to be regretted, at least for the credit of hon. gentlemen opposite, that this particular remedy was discovered at some time when they could have fairly claimed to have been the originators of this movement. It is a matter of surprise, to many of us at least, who sit on this side of the House, that the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) who introduced this resolution, did not discover at some former time that this was the real and only remedy for the evils under which we labor, considering the very close investigation which he is every year accustomed to give the financial condition of this country. It is a matter of surprise, too, that this has never been the result of the philosophical searches of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). It is a matter of still greater surprise that the hon. gentleman who, at the present time, leads the party opposite in this House, not very long ago, I believe, should have doubts as to the advisability of adopting this policy; it is a matter of surprise that the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) not very long ago should have felt a preference for commercial union rather than unrestricted reciprocity, and that the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies,) when addressing his constituents in Charlottetown, should have pronounced unrestricted reciprocity—a scheme which, if it is not entirely analogous, is, at least, very nearly akin to the scheme which is now under consideration—as wholly impracticable. In some manner or by some process, which is unknown to us on this side of the House, these hon. gentlemen, apparently, since this session commenced, have harmonised their views upon this subject. It is a mystery to those of us who are on this side of the House how this has been accomplished; and I assume that it will remain a mystery unless one hon. gentleman who is in the secrets of the party shall hereafter enlighten the country, and make himself famous by writing the history of the rise, and progress, and collapse of this extraordinary movement.

An hon. MEMBER. Especially the collapse.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). Especially the collapse. To give honor to whom honor is due, I assume we may fairly attribute the origin of this movement to Mr. Erastus Wiman, the advocate of commercial union. Mr. Wiman, as we all know, is a gentleman of very distinguished abilities. If I am correctly informed, he was a native of Canada, but for some years back has taken up his residence in the United States. He has evidently formed the opinions he now entertains in regard to the conditions and wants of his native country as the result of the ideas which he has imbibed and the influences by which he has been surrounded in the land of his adoption. Mr. Wiman has more advanced views on this question than hon. gentlemen opposite. He advocates a scheme of commercial union. He not only desires free trade, but he desires that all Customs restrictions should be removed, and that a uniform tariff should be adopted and the gross Customs receipts should be divided between the two countries on the basis of population or on some other basis that may be agreed upon. Hon. gentlemen opposite are not prepared to go that far. They draw the line at unrestricted reciprocity; and, while they desire free trade, they desire that each country shall have the privilege of regulating its own tariff as it chooses. It is not difficult, of course, to account for this difference in the opinions of Mr. Wiman and hon. gentlemen opposite, for these gentlemen have not enjoyed the same advantages as Mr. Wiman has; they have not lived in New York, they have not been surrounded by the influences by which he has been surrounded, and they have not had the same opportunity of having their minds enlightened and their views enlarged that he has had. I had some expectation, and I think the country would have expected, that these gentlemen would have pointed out some reason why we should prefer unrestricted reciprocity to commercial union. For my own part, I have been unable to discover what advantages we, as Canadians, would have under unrestricted reciprocity that we would not have under commercial union. I can see many disadvantages to Canada under either system. In the first place, as has been pointed out already, the effect upon our revenue would be very serious indeed. The direct loss, as has been stated, would amount to upwards of seven millions of dollars. The direct loss would be even greater than this, and it is impossible accurately to estimate it, because we cannot form a correct estimate of the extent to which our foreign imports would be reduced if this policy were adopted. One thing, however, I think, must be evident to any person who takes even a superficial view of this question, and that is that Canada would be in a better position under commercial union than she would be under unrestricted reciprocity, at all events as far as revenue is concerned; for we must all admit that, if a fair tariff were maintained and we had a fair division of the revenues of the two countries, we would have a larger amount of money to provide for carrying on the government of the country and to provide for our governmental expenses than we would have under any scheme of unrestricted reciprocity. Then, there is the disastrous effect of this policy upon our manufacturing industries, which has been already referred to. I shall not dwell at any length upon that branch of the subject. Hon. gentlemen opposite admit that it will injure our manufacturing industries, but they make this admission in the mildest manner possible. They tell us that it may be expected that some of the manufacturing industries of this country may be injuriously affected if this policy is adopted. Why, Mr. Speaker, our manufactures would not simply be injured; they would be practically annihilated; for everyone knows that the manufacturers of the United States, with their enormous wealth, with the capital they have at their command, with their long experience, with the skill they have acquired, with the great influence—almost amounting to control—which they are enabled to exercise, not only in the markets at home but in the markets abroad, and even, to some extent, over the means of transportation, places them to-day in such a position that they can bid defiance to any competition that the manufacturers of this country could possibly offer them. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), in the course of his remarks, used a most extraordinary argument in connection with this branch of the subject. The argument was very ingenious, but it was equally fallacious. That hon. gentleman referred to the growth of manufactures in the United States and he made a comparison between the growth of the manufactures in some of the newer States and in some of the older States. He instanced Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, Illinois, Iowa, Minnesota and California on the one hand, and Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania on the other hand, and as the result of that comparison he says:

"Taking the old manufacturing States which produce more than one-half the goods produced in the whole Union, the States of Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania, I find that the increase during the same period was $315,000,000, or about $50,000,000 less than in the eight new States I have mentioned, and that the ratio of increase was 21.6 per cent, against 64 per cent. in the new States. This is a striking result, and it demonstrates that the ratio of increase in manufacturing is more than as rapid again in those new States, and the newer they are the more rapid the increase; the most rapid increase was in Minnesota, 228 per cent., the increase in Illinois was over 100 per cent., and in California over 74 per cent."

He goes on further and refers to several cities in the western States, Buffalo, Detroit, Cincinnati, Cleveland, and several others, and goes on to say:

"Statistics show that the ratio of increase is many times more rapid in these cities of the west than it is in the older cities of the east. In view of these facts, I think that we are needlessly alarmed, that there is no ground for the alarm that exists in the minds of some men, that the manufacturers of the Dominion are not capable of competing with those old manufacturing centres in the eastern States. The results in the western States give the lie to such assertion. We may disabuse our minds of any fears as to our abilities to compete with those centres and to successfully maintain and sustain our manufacturing interests. The fact of it is, Mr. Speaker, that our manufacturers, as well as our lumbermen, our farmers, our fishermen and mine owners, need the blessings of continental free trade."

Now, Mr. Speaker, if that argument proves anything it proves this, that it is no disadvantage to a new country to have free trade with a country where older manufacturing industries are established, and, if that argument is sound, if there is no disadvantage for the newer cities and States to have free trade with the older manufacturing States of the Union, it would have been no disadvantage to them to have free trade with Great Britain and free trade with the world. If the principle the hon. gentleman lays down there is sound, the United States have not built up their manufacturing interests by the policy of protection which was adopted in that country, because those interests would have grown as rapidly, if not more rapidly, if they had maintained from the first a policy of free trade with Great Britain and the world. That is simply an argument in favor of free trade, and I cannot better answer the argument of the hon. gentleman than by using the language which he used in this House in 1876. The hon. gentleman on that occasion said:—

"It may be safely assumed that no country has attained to greatness in manufactures without having in the course of its history imposed exactions and restrictions. This has notably been the case with Great Britain herself, and I think the assertion that the development of various industries is necessary to the cultivation of the self-defensive power of the nation, is incontrovertible. We have had an illustration of this in the United States. * * * The United States have adopted a protective policy under which their industries have been fostered and promoted until in 1870 their products reached 4,253 million dollars, giving employment to 2 million operatives, and disbursing over 775 million dollars."

The opinions which the hon. gentleman held in 1875 were sound. I can congratulate him upon the soundness of those opinions, but I cannot so heartily congratulate him upon his change of opinion since. But since the hon. gentleman has lost confidence in his former opinions, I could refer him to the opinions of another hon. gentleman, the very able leader of the party on that side of the House, in whose opinions he should, at all events, have a great degree of confidence. I would refer him to the celebrated Malvern speech, which has already been referred to in this debate. The leader of the Opposition, on that occasion, acknowledged that the protective policy which had been adopted in Canada, had resulted in bringing into existence new manufacturing industries. He admitted that these industries owed their continued existence to the continuance of that policy, and, as the leader of the party, he gave his pledge, and that pledge was not only for himself but for the party which he led, that the manufacturers, at all events, had nothing to fear from that party, that if they were entrusted with the control of the government of this country, no radical change would take place in our fiscal policy; in any reductions which they made in the tariff, they would have a due regard for the manufacturing interests of this country. It appears that the hon. gentleman has not only lost confidence in his opinions, but both he and all the gentlemen with whom he is associated on that side of the House, have lost all respect for the solemn pledges of their leader made a little more than a year ago; for every person knows that if this policy were adopted, the manufacturers which owe their very existence, in this country, to the adoption of a protective policy, would be utterly destroyed, for they can only be continued in existence by maintaining a protective policy against the United States as well as against the world. Now, Sir, this policy of unrestricted reciprocity with the United States will not only be disastrous to our manufacturing industries, it will be equally disastrous to the trade of this country. This has already been referred to—indeed, every branch of this subject has been discussed at so great length that it is needless to dwell much upon it now. I wish to confine my remarks, on this branch of the subject, almost exclusively to the foreign trade of this country. One of the objects of the National Policy has been to extend and develop our foreign trade, and that has been done to a large extent. It is specially exemplified in the sugar trade. In 1878, as we all know, we imported but 6 per cent. of the sugar consumed in this country from the country of growth and production. In 1887 this condition of things was entirely changed, for we now import upwards of 90 per cent. of the sugar consumed in this country, direct from the country of growth and production. And when we recollect that the consumption of sugar in this country last year amounted upwards of 230 million pounds, the importance of this trade will be apparent to every one. Then take another leading article of commerce, the article of tea. Before the introduction of the National Policy, we purchased our tea largely in the United States, and last year we imported into Canada direct from China and Japan, and other tea producing countries, upwards of eleven million pounds, and from the United States only half a million pounds. Now, I cannot conceive it possible that under any system of unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union that discriminating duty of 10 per cent. could be maintained; and if it is not maintained, we hand back the tea trade of this country largely to the wholesale importing houses of New York and Boston. Then, in 1837, we imported of woollen manufactured goods from Great Britain upwards of eleven million dollars worth, and of cotton manufactured goods, upwards of four and a half millions. If unrestricted reciprocity were adopted, this trade would nearly all, if not entirely, be transferred to the United States. Indeed, Sir, without enumerating further, we may say that our entire foreign trade would be gone. When we consider the value of this trade, when we consider the important influence it has in building up our maritime cities, in furnishing traffic for our railways, in furnishing employment for both capital and labor in this country, we can form some conception of the enormous losses which would be incurred if this policy were adopted. For my own part, I can see no advantages sufficient to compensate us for this enormous loss. Hon. gentlemen have endeavored to support their position in various ways. They have referred to our geographical position, to the proximity of the United States, to the large population of 60,000,000, and to their enormous trade. But this point does not really touch the question. The real question under consideration now is whether these 60,000,000 of people are our customers, or our competitors. With regard to our geographical position, that branch of the subject has been so ably dealt with, and the arguments so fully and so successfully met by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, that it is not necessary to refer to it further. It has been said that we need the United States as a market for our agricultural products, that the United States is the natural market for the products of this country. Now, Mr. Speaker, that is a position which hon. gentlemen cannot successfully maintain. Why, the United States are, and have been for years, the competitors of the Canadian farmer in very many leading classes of agricultural products in our own Canadian market. In beef, pork, in wheat, rye, peas and beans, in live stock, butter, lard and cheese, they are the competitors of the Canadian farmers to-day in the markets of Great Britain and in every other foreign market to which these exports are shipped. With regard to other classes of agricultural products to which reference has been made, horses, barley, hay, sheep and wool, the imports at the present time are utterly insignificant, and, as the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) stated, the imports are so small that they do not affect, to any appreciable extent, the value of these articles in the markets of the United States. That reciprocal trade with the United States in farm products would be an advantage, no one can deny; but this is due to this cause, that agricultural products especially are affected by local and exceptional causes. A drought in any particular year may enhance the value of particular classes of agricultural produce; the failure of a crop may have the same effect; the movement of population, the growth of cities, the establishment of new mining or manufacturing industries may, for any particular period of time and in certain localities, give enhanced value to agricultural produce; and to that extent, and to that extent alone, it would be advantageous to the farmers of Canada to have free access to the markets of the United States. But it is contrary to every principle that governs trade and commerce, to assume that while the United States are exporting every year, and exporting every year in larger quantities, almost every class of agricultural produce, they can offer to the farmers of Canada a certain permanent or profitable market, while everything we sell must simply go to swell the volume of their exports to foreign countries. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has referred to our mineral wealth. He told us that if the barriers of trade were thrown down American capitalists would come into this country, that our iron and copper mines would be developed, that new lines of railway would be built, and in a short time we would become large exporters of iron and copper ore to the United States. I doubt very much the conclusions at which the hon. gentleman has arrived. I do not for one believe that the results he anticipates would follow if his policy were adopted. But, even supposing for the sake of argument, that the hon. gentleman is right in this anticipation, if he pretends to assert that it is in that way that the mineral wealth of this country can be developed to the greatest advantage of the people, I take direct issue with him on that point. I claim that the mineral wealth of this country should be used for the benefit of the people of this country, that by a moderate protectionate tariff we should offer every inducement to foreign capitalists to come here and establish new manufacturing industries, to furnish employment for our own people and enlarge the home market for our farmers, and we all know the home market is the most profitable market they can have. This, Sir, is the policy which the present Government have adopted in the past. It has been successful so far, and it promises to be far more successful in the future than it has been in the past. The hon. gentleman has also referred to the growth of trade during the existence of the old Reciprocity Treaty, which extended from 1854 to 1866. Now, it must be apparent to every one that that can in no way be taken as an index of the probable results of reciprocity at the present time. It must be remembered that that was an exceptional period in the history of the country. It must be remembered that during the existence of that treaty the people of the United States were for five years engaged in civil war, that during that time upwards of two millions of their people were taken away from agricultural and industrial processes and forced to do duty on the field of battle, that the ordinary business of the country was neglected and the regular growth and development of the country was arrested. It must be remembered, too, that the values of all commodities were unduly inflated, that especially the prices of the exports from Canada to the United States were enormously enhanced, and the large profits which the people of this country gained by having free trade with the United States during that period could not be realised again except under similar circumstances. To-day, the condition of things is entirely changed. During that period the United States were importers of coal. In 1865 they purchased from Nova Scotia some half-million tons of coal. Last year, such has been the development of the coal mining interests of the United States, that they not only supplied their own wants, but exported to the Province of Ontario alone 1,130,000 tons of coal, and that in the face of the duty of 50 cents per ton. If that duty were removed to-day, if we had free trade in full with the United States to-day, it would be a disadvantage instead of being an advantage to the people of Canada, for the coal mine owners of Nova Scotia would find that coal from Pennsylvania, and Ohio, and Illinois not only had full possession of the eastern markets of the United States, but they would find, I fear, that they, the Nova Scotians, would be kept out of the markets of Ontario and Quebec. Then the development of the agricultural resources of the United States has been wonderful since the close of the war. Since that time in the United States the people have built long lines of railway connecting the east with the west; they have carried into the rich agricultural districts of the west hundreds and thousands of settlers, they have placed in their hands the best and most improved agricultural implements and machinery, they have furnished them with easy, speedy and rapid communication between the agricultural districts in the west and the centres of population in the east and the seaports on the Atlantic coast. The development of their agricultural resources has been far more rapid than the demand of the home market warrants, and the exports of the country are every year increasing. In Canada, too, the condition of things has entirely changed. We, too, have built long lines of railway. We have deepened our canals, improved our water communication and to-day we have communication between the different sections of this Dominion which is not excelled, even if it can be equalled in any country in the world. We have, too, opened for ourselves new markets, we have established new means of communication with those markets, and if we continue to go on in the direction in which we are going, the time is not far distant when the people of Canada will have easy access to all the markets of the world where our products can be sold, or where any demand for them exists. Under these circumstances, while we are not as dependent upon the United States for the sale of our products as we formerly were, while reciprocal trade with the United States may be very desirable, it is no longer necessary to our progress and prosperity. I am not opposed to reciprocal trade. I should be very glad if our commercial relations with the United States were very much extended, I should be very glad if many of the restrictions which now exist were removed, I should be very glad if we could have free access to their markets for the products of our farms, of our fisheries, of our mines and of our forests, I should be very glad too if we could have the advantage of the coasting trade, and I believe, the Government of the country would be fully justified in making any reasonable concessions to obtain those advantages. But while I am in favor of a reciprocal treaty or a treaty for reciprocal trade, which is fair in its terms, which can be honorably obtained, which is mutually advantageous to both countries interested, I for one can never give my consent to a proposition such as that now before the House. It involves the loss of our foreign trade, the destruction of our manufactures, it would practically compel us to purchase almost everything we require in the markets of the United States, and finally it would make us dependent upon them for a market for our products. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) in the course of his remarks referred to the present position of the finances of the United States. He told us that the Secretary of the Treasury if he had the authority of Congress might provide for the required expenses in three different modes. Each of the modes which the hon. gentleman proposed involved a very large reduction of the tariff and very large additions to the free trade list. Now, I am very much inclined to agree with the hon. gentleman's opinions and I believe that there are good grounds for entertaining those opinions. A measure has been introduced into Congress during its present session, which, together with the remarks of the President of the United States, would indicate that legislation in that direction may be looked for at no distant date. But, Sir, there is no reasonable man who can contend that if the free trade list is enlarged in the United States it will be enlarged in the direction of the admission of all the natural products of Canada and of everything which under any circumstances we could sell to the people of the United States. If that opinion is well founded no government can be justified in purchasing those advantages at so great a cost as is proposed in this resolution; when the United States will be compelled by force of circumstances and with no concessions on our part to open their markets in the no distant future not only to Canada but to the whole world. Then, Sir, there is another view of this question and a very important one to which I wish to refer, and that is the practicability of the proposition now before the House. Sir, I believe that the hon. gentleman would be obliged to demonstrate far more clearly than he has done in the course of this debate that this proposition is practicable before it will receive a very serious consideration from this House or from the country. I do not believe, Sir, that it can be shown to be practicable, and the history of our trade negotiations with the United States fully justifies this opinion. The treaty which existed from 1854 to 1866 was terminated not by the desire of the Canadian people but as a result of the action of the American Congress, and that action has since apparently met with the full approval of the people of that country. When the Hon. George Brown, in 1874, went to Washington to negotiate a treaty for reciprocal trade, he was prepared to make large concessions, he was prepared to offer much more advantageous terms than they had under the former treaty, and yet his proposal did not receive even respectful consideration. There has been an Act upon our Statute-book since 1879 providing for, and giving the government of this country authority to remove the duties from imports to the United States on the natural products of this country, if reciprocal privileges were granted to Canada. To that invitation for reciprocal trade we have had no response. If we need any further proof to establish this point we have it, Sir, in what took place in the course of the recent negotiations at Washington, when the representatives of Canada and the representatives of Great Britain were given to understand in plain and unmistakable terms that no such treaty could be entertained, and that the representatives of the United States would not even ask for authority to negotiate for a treaty which involved any change in the existing tariff of the United States or which interfered with the power of the Congress of the United States to regulate and alter their tariff at any time they chose. Now, Sir, if we are going to Washington to-morrow to propose a treaty for reciprocal trade with the United States the proposition which is now under consideration is the one of all others which would be least likely to find acceptance. This is a proposal to establish free trade between the two countries, not only in products and manufactured goods, but at the same time it proposes that each country should be free to regulate its own tariff as it may choose. Look for one moment at the effect of such an arrangement upon the trade of the United States. Take for instance the effect upon the sugar trade. If under such an arrangement as that, the Parliament of Canada chose to reduce the duties on raw sugar or remove them altogether our refiners could import raw sugar into this country, they could refine it in Canada and they could sell it in the markets of the United States. The only way the people or the Government of the United States could prevent that result would be to reduce the duties on raw sugar until they corresponded with the duties that prevailed in this Dominion. The same principle applies to every class of imports used in our manufacturing industries which can be brought from foreign countries either in their raw or partially manufactured state. But, Sir, to suppose that the people of the United States would place themselves in the position that they might be at any time required to alter or reduce their tariff in consequence of any action which might be taken by the Parliament of this Dominion is to my mind simply preposterous. It is utterly inconsistent with the dignity, and independence, and self respect, of an intelligent, and proud, and prosperous people. The hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) expressed sound opinions I believe when he addressed his electors in Charlottetown last fall. The same principle precisely applies to the proposition which is now before the House that apply to the proposition of unrestricted reciprocity which he was then considering, even after the explanation which he has already given to us. I do not know, Sir, of any better way to express my view upon this question than to refer again to the language which he admits he used with regard to the proposition there. He then said: "Unrestricted reciprocity is something the people of the United States are not such arrant fools as to accept; it is impracticable." Unrestricted reciprocity, Mr. Speaker, can mean but one of two things. It means either free trade with the world or political annexation with the United States. If adopted it must lead either to one or the other of those two results. It is utter folly to assume that while we remain a portion of the British Empire, we can maintain against Great Britain a discriminating tariff. There would be no advantage whatever in closing our market against British manufacturers if we opened them free to the manufacturers of the United States. There would be no addition to our revenue and there would be no commercial advantage. It would be simply maintaining a discriminating tariff for which we could give no excuse or justification. If we grant this privilege to one, we must in common justice grant it to the other. Free trade with the United States means free trade with Great Britain, and free trade with these two countries means free trade with the world, and free trade with the world means direct taxation. We must, Sir, accept that as the inevitable result of unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, or we must accept the other alternative—political union; for it is equally against common reason and common sense to assert that we can maintain an unjust and unnecessary discriminating tariff against Great Britain, and that the people and Government of that country will at the same time entertain the same friendly relations and feelings towards us which exist at the present time. While, Sir, all our interests are closely identified and allied with those of the United States, annexation must follow as an inevitable result; and if the results which were predicted by the hon. member for South Oxford should be realised—if the effect of this policy should be, as he said it would be, to open up Canada as a field for American enterprise—if we are to bring American citizens here, people with American sympathies and with a strong preference for American institutions and the American form of government, it must be evident to any reasonable man that political union with that country can be but for a very short time delayed. Now, Sir, when this scheme comes to be studied and to be thoroughly understood by the people of this country, it will be seen to be not only subversive of the best interests of the people of Canada, but repugnant to their feelings. The people of Canada, Sir, are loyal British subjects. We belong to different races and different creeds, for we have sprung from different nationalities; but whether it is Norman or Anglo-Saxon blood that flows in our veins—whether we are of those who have crossed the Atlantic to find a home in this western world, or whether we are the descendants of those who more than a hundred years ago crossed the border line and laid the foundations of St. John, Toronto and other cities along the American frontier, we have chosen Canada for our home largely because we have a preference for British institutions, because we desire to enjoy the protection of the British flag, and because we are willing for our part at any rate to maintain a united British Empire. This feeling, I believe, is universal in this country, with but few exceptions. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Ellis) not long ago declared himself to be in favor of annexation; but when he made that declaration, he found no sympathy from either political party in the city he represents. Those who supported him, as well as those who opposed him, censured and rebuked him for his conduct. He was even called upon by those who had elected him to resign his seat in this House, because he was told that he did not represent the feelings or the sentiments of his constituency. But, Sir, I have this to say for the hon. gentleman, that his advocacy of annexation is frank, candid, and consistent; and I believe that if a man does believe in annexation, and desires to see it accomplished, it is better for him to go about it in that way than to advocate it under the guise of commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity. Now, Mr. Speaker, this has been said to be mere sentiment. It has been referred to by several hon. gentlemen in the course of this debate, and some of the leading members of this House have told us that we should regard this question simply from a business standpoint. I for one do not concur in that opinion. It is true, Sir, this sentiment of loyalty is a mere sentiment, but it is a sentiment which has a firm and strong hold on the people of this country, and it is one which will largely influence their decision in the present instance. It is a sentiment, Sir, which has been fully recognised by both political parties in this country, and it is a sentiment to which I believe we have in this case not merely a right, but to which it is our duty to appeal. The National Policy had for one of its objects the fostering and strengthening of a loyal sentiment in this country. That policy has been successful in establishing new industries, in developing our resources, and in extending our trade; but it has done more than this. The National Policy has made the people of this country self-reliant. It has given them a confidence in their own country and in its future growth and greatness. It has led us to appreciate at their true value the vast resources which this country possesses, and it has given us a true appreciation of the powers we possess to provide for their development. This policy, Sir, has been the means of creating a national sentiment in this country, a feeling of national pride; and while it has brought prosperity, it has at the same time attached us more strongly to the land in which we live, and also strengthened the bonds that unite us to the mother country. I am, Sir, but expressing my own personal convictions; but I desire to say that I for one, at least, believe that the veteran leader of the Conservative party in this House owes in a very large degree the popularity which he enjoys and the success which has attended his political career to the fact that in all his acts and utterances and in all his public policy, he has shown himself to be thoroughly and honestly in sympathy with this sentiment which so strongly predominates among all classes in this country. I believe, too, that while those who oppose him in this House have no better policy to offer, while they have no better claim to power, while they have no better proposition to submit for the consideration of this Parliament or this country, than a commercial treaty with a foreign power, which would involve the loss of all we have gained in the last ten years—aye, which asks that we shall yield up that full freedom of self-government, which is our pride and boast as a portion of the British Empire, which asks us to terminate our national existence, which, though young, is full of vigor and vitality, which has been happy and prosperous in the past, and is full of hope and promise in the future—when their policy is one that involves the loss of our very identity as a Canadian people, and our ultimate absorption into the American Republic, in my opinion at least they can have no hope whatever of gaining the confidence or support of the people of this country.

Mr. BARRON moved the adjournment of the debate.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I hope the hon. gentleman will not move the adjournment of the debate. We have been adjourning rather early the last few nights, and if we really want to bring this debate to an end some day or another, I think we must sit longer. The hon. gentleman, I have no doubt, will have time to make his speech now, and I hope he will not make his motion.

Mr. JONES. I understood that there was an understanding arrived at between the hon. gentleman who is leading the House and the leader of Opposition that the question was not to go on after half past eleven or the neighborhood of 12 o'clock.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Not this evening.

Mr. JONES. The hon. leader of the Opposition has left the House under that impression.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman is mistaken about that. There was no such understanding this evening. There was an understanding last night, which was kept, but this evening there is time for another speech, and I hope the hon. gentleman will go on.

Mr. BARRON. I did not intend to speak to-night, when I rose to my feet, but simply to move the adjournment, in consequence of what I understood to be the understanding between the leader of the Opposition and the Government. The leader of the Opposition certainly gave me to understand that the hon. gentleman who is now acting as leader on the opposite side of the House agreed that after 11.30, the debate would be adjourned, but if the hon. gentleman insists on my going on, of course I must accede to his wishes. But I hope, however, the hour being very late indeed, that the House will be as indulgent with me as possible, because I know how tedious it is to have to listen to speeches on a subject which has been pretty well threshed out. Hitherto the all-important question before the House has been dealt with almost completely from a Dominion or Federal standpoint, except in one or two notable instances: I refer to the singular speech of my hon. friend for Pictou (Mr. Tupper), the other night, in answer to the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones). I did expect that hon. gentleman would have delivered a speech from which we could learn something, but it did seem to me that the hon. gentleman was actuated throughout his speech more by some personal political motive than by any other. I will make another singular exception, and that is the speech of the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Brown), who charged against the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. MacDonald) that he was pretty well mixed. But I will leave it to this House to judge as to which of the two was most mixed. I do not propose to deal with the subject before us altogether from a Dominion or Federal standpoint, because I think it is better, from this time forward, at all events on the part of junior members, that they should deal with this all-important question from a local or provincial standpoint as it affects local interests. When I remember that my constituency has, probably more than many constituencies represented in this House, a deep interest in the motion under discussion, I feel it is my bounden duty to rise on this occasion and give my reasons for supporting the motion of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). There is also another reason why I think it is my duty on this occasion to speak to this motion, even at this late hour, and that is this: Since the last session of this Parliament, I have taken great pains to ascertain the views and wishes of my own people on this great trade question, and I was gratified to find that by giving my vote as I intend to give it, when the time comes,

I shall be thoroughly in accord with the great majority of the people in my own riding. I was not only pleased, but I confess, I was a little alarmed, to find the extent to which the farmers were willing to go, in my riding, to gain access to the American markets. Another reason why I consider it my bounden duty to address the House on this subject is that my own constituency is very much interested in this subject. The people there belong almost exclusively to the great leading interests of farming and lumbering. I want first to draw the attention of this House for a little while to the importance of this subject, so far as the farmers are concerned. I understand the issue before the House to be this, as embodied in the motion of the hon. member for South Oxford, the greatest good to the greatest number; while that presented by the amendment moved by the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is, the greatest good to the fewer number. Now, if we start out with that proposition, and I think it is a true proposition, we should try to ascertain who compose the greater number in this country. I think we can come to no other conclusion, at all events so far as Ontario is concerned, than that the farming population is the greatest in number and in wealth. The hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Macdonald), I think, stated this afternoon, in his very able speech, that there were some 600,000 farmers in the Dominion. Will the House spare me a little time while I make a comparison between the farmers and all other classes, as regards number and wealth, in the Province of Ontario. In that Province more people are engaged in the farming industry than are engaged in all the other industries put together. The exact figures are these: In 1886, the number of farmers in Ontario was 1,144,520, and the number of people in all other lines of life, 674,506, leaving a majority of near half a million engaged in the farming industries over other industries. I have found on several occasions that the argument has been used, that while it is quite true the farming population in Ontario is numerically very much greater than all the other people put together, yet the wealth of the manufacturing industry has to be considered. Before dealing with that, however, let me say that in the county I have the honor to represent, there are 21,563 farmers or 12,717 more than the entire population engaged in other industries. Now, as to the question of value, I find that in Ontario the value of farm lands, buildings, implements and live stock, foot up to the enormous sum of $959,499,911, or ten times greater value than the manufacturing industry in that Province. It is only fair that I should say here, because I desire to be accurate, that I have no accurate statistics as to the real value of the manufacturing industries in Ontario, but I find that, in 1881, the values of manufactures throughout the entire Dominion are about $60,000,000. Taking $60,000,000 from that, and allowing $100,000,000 as the value of the manufacturing industries in Ontario, I find that the value of the farming industry is a little more than ten times as great as that of the manufacturing industry, and yet we find hon. gentlemen opposite bowing down and worshipping their Mammon and forgetting the interests of the most valuable industry in the Dominion, the farming industry. I will refer to another industry in which I am not interested personally, but as a representative of the people, and that is the lumber interest. I have no accurate statistics as to the value of the lumber interests, but I find that we exported up to the 15th June, 1887, for the year prior to that, the immense value of $9,165,987, upon which, as I will explain in a moment, Sir, my constituents, at all events, pay the enormous amount of over $500,000. It must be admitted therefore that the removal of the American duty would give an impetus to that trade. When we consider the two great industries, farming and lumbering, I do not see how it is possible for any hon. gentleman to vote against the motion of the hon. member for South Oxford, which is calculated to promote these interests, and to vote instead for the amendment which is calculated to help a similar industry—that of the manufacturers. Let me say here, and I will be as rapid as I possibly can, that I intended to speak on this motion, because I do think the interest of the farmer is served by the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford. Take the case of barley. As has been stated to-night already, we exported last year 9,437,717 bushels, the value of which was $5,245,000; but I ask hon. gentlemen, did the farmers get that 5½ millions? They did not, because they had to pay in duty, $943,000.

Mr. RYKERT. Who paid the duty?

Mr. BARRON. That was answered this afternoon out of the mouth of the leader of the hon. gentleman who interrupts me. If the hon. gentleman had been in his seat this afternoon, I think he would not have interrupted me now, because it was shown that the leader of the Government stated in Cobourg, in 1878, when he was trying to deceive the people with his National Policy, that it was the farmer in this country who paid the duty.

Mr. RYKERT. What do you say?

Mr. BARRON. I say he does, and for this reason—

Mr. JONES (Halifax). What do you say, Rykert?

Mr. RYKERT. I will tell you by-and-bye.

Mr. BARRON. So I find that the farmer loses on that item $943,000. Then, take beans. We exported an amount valued at $206,000 to the United States. The farmer had to pay in duty no less than $19,000. The value of the export of peas was $331,349, but the farmer did not get that. He received that less the sum of $40,000, which he paid in duties. Rye was the same, and wheat the same, and hay the same.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). He got the rye in drinks.

Mr. BARRON. No, the farmer is not so fond of taking drinks as my hon. friend who has just interrupted me. Take the case of horses, and I refer to that, because it shows how foolish it is to attempt to force a trade in any particular direction. Last year we exported to the United States the enormous number of 18,225 horses, of which the value was $2,214,338, but the farmer had to pay in duties $442,000, and the comparatively small balance of a million and a half was all he got. From Ontario alone, last year, we exported 8,454 horses, the value of which was $1,136,039, but the duty which the Ontario farmers paid was $227,207, so that all they got for their horses was $908,831. But hon. gentlemen opposite say that we should endeavor to cultivate the trade in horses with Great Britain. Any one who takes an interest in horseflesh knows that Great Britain never wants for cavalry purposes more than 4,000 horses in any one year. If that is so, what is to become of the balance of the horses which we want to export? Are these hon. gentlemen aware that the whole number of horses that we sent to Great Britain last year was 329, with a value of $38,000? In other words, the Ontario farmers paid in duty on the horses they exported to the United States eleven and a half times more into the American treasury than they received for all the horses they sold to Great Britain. I think that is a serious matter, and, when hon. gentleman opposite wish to make the farmer sell to the wrong party, I think that is an unanswerable argument to prevent their doing so. I shall not waste the time of the House by going into the question of horned cattle, but I may say that I find that Ontario last year sent to the United States, 45,765 horned cattle, the value of which was $887,000, the duty on which was $177,000. Again the farmers did not get the value because they lost the amount of the duty.

Mr. BOWELL. Does the hon. gentleman say that that quantity of cattle was sent to the United States for consumption?

Mr. BARRON. I say those cattle were sent to the United States. If they went in bond, they would not pay duty, and the cattle I speak of did pay duty. I say again, in regard to sheep, of which 363,000 were exported last year, the value of which was $974,000, but the farmer only received $779,000, because he had to pay the enormous sum of $194,000 in duties. I will summarise and will not go into detail, and I am sorry that I was asked to speak at this late hour, because I feel that I cannot do myself justice or do the House justice, but, in fine, we find that, in lumber, barley, beans, peas, hay, horses, horned cattle, and sheep and so on, that we pay $3,672,845 in duties, or a little over $2 a head for every man, woman and child in the Province of Ontario. I say this is a very serious thing indeed.

Mr. SPROULE. I would ask if the hon. gentleman takes the amount of duty off the price of the article exported, because he seems to have done it all along.

Mr. BARRON. I listened to the Minister of Marine with a great deal of attention—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Answer the question.

Mr. BARRON. I admit that I did not listen with very much attention to the interruption of my hon. friend, but I did listen to my hon. friend the Minister of Marine. I listen to speakers on both sides of the House in order to learn all I can, and the hon. Minister said, if I understood him, that it was perfect nonsense for the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) to advocate such a motion as he did, because he did not follow it up by proving that it would be advantageous if his motion was introduced and carried out in this country. I ask if experience does not prove something, and I ask the hon. gentleman how he can say that unrestricted reciprocity, such as you made it on the motion of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) will not bring about the good results he says it will when he thinks of the item of eggs. I find, Mr. Speaker, that Canada exported of eggs last year nearly 13,000,000 dozen, valued at $1,821,364. Now, I want again to point out, from an Ontario standpoint, the vast importance, at all events, to the farmer, of unrestricted reciprocity. I find that Ontario exported to the United States, of that nearly 13,000,000 dozen eggs, the enormous amount of 9,228,096 dozen, the value of which was $1,305,642. There was no duty on eggs, and that accounts for it. Why, the value was more than the export value, to the United States, of beans, peas, rye, wheat and hay altogether, by over $300,000. The export value in eggs was more than the export value of horned cattle; it was more than the export value of sheep to the United States; it was nearly as much as the export value of horses. Now, I said a moment ago that experience teaches, and it would be unfair for me to put forward this argument unless I drew a comparison. It will be in the recollection of hon. gentlemen in this House that on the 1st January, 1870, the duty of 10 per cent. on eggs, on the other side, was removed. Well, Sir, I find that for the last six months of the existence of that duty upon eggs, the export value from Canada to the United States was the small sum of $5,403; but the very moment that duty was removed, the export of eggs increased with such enormous rapidity that during the first six months after the 1st January, 1870, the value reached $290,820, and since the removal of that duty the export value of eggs was, in 1887, 337 times greater than it was in 1870 under the 10 per cent. duty. Now, I do think that this small item of eggs, the little article generally given as pin money by the farmers to their wives, affords a complete answer to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and is sufficient to show, to my mind, at all events, that if we adopted the policy of the hon.

member for South Oxford and secured unrestricted trade with the United States, a very great increase will be brought about in the export of all our agricultural products. Remove the duty on barley. In 1896, if the export value of barley increased in the same ratio that the export value of eggs has increased, the value will amount to the enormous sum of $13,114,920, in place of the five million odd dollars in 1886-87. Remove the duty on horses, and the export value in 1896, at the same ratio of increase as took place in the case of eggs, will reach the sum of $5,530,840, in place of the two million odd dollars in 1886. Remove the duty on horned cattle going into the States, and in 1896, at the same ratio, the value will be two million odd dollars in place of $387,000. Remove the duty on sheep, and in 1896, at the same ratio, the export value will be nearly two million dollars in place of $974,482 in 1887. Now, what does this mean? Why, the very moment we get unrestricted trade, I undertake to say that the value of our exports will immediately increase by 30, or 40, or 50 per cent. Now, Sir, remove the duty on lumber. I see hon. gentlemen in this House who are engaged in that business, and though I only know of it professionally, I defy them to deny that the removal of the duty on lumber would be a great benefit to the lumber trade in this country.

Mr. SPROULE. They propose to remove it now.

Mr. BARRON. The hon. gentleman used to think it would be a bad thing, but now when he sees the other side are going to do it he says it would be a good thing.

Mr. SPROULE. No, I did not. I said that they proposed to remove the duty.

Mr. BARRON. Well, if he does not say it would be a good thing I am astonished at his ignorance. Remove the duty on lumber and the export value thereof would be, in 1896, twenty million odd dollars, in place of the nine million odd dollars in 1887. Now, have I any justification for this prophecy?

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. BARRON. Some hon. gentleman says "no." All I can tell him is that he had better read the history of Canada under the Reciprocity Treaty. Does he not know that the volume of trade between Canada and the United States, from 1854 to 1866, increased from over $20,000,000 to something like $84,000,000.

Mr. SPROULE. During the American war.

Mr. BARRON. There he is again. The American war broke out in 1860. But to satisfy the hon. gentleman, I will make a comparison prior to the time the American war broke out. I suppose the hon. gentleman will not say that the war broke out before the Reciprocity Treaty. Well, comparing the five years before reciprocity with the five years after, I find that our export trade to the United States increased after that date by 124 per cent., and the import trade increased by 85 per cent., the increase in the average volume of trade being 100 per cent. Now, I want to draw the attention of the Ontario members to this fact, that of the entire exports to the United States of over $32,000,000, Ontario exported $20,000,000 of that amount, showing, I think, that by reason of her contiguity to the United States we are deeply interested in cultivating trade with that country. I was going to touch upon some other items, but by reason of the lateness of the hour I shall have to forbear; but I shall ask the House to bear with me while I endeavor to answer one or two of the arguments made by the Minister of the Interior. First of all, let me say that I believe the farmer is not as prosperous in Ontario as he was a short time ago. I find that the prices he has been getting have been from year to year becoming less. I find that in 1883 fall wheat was $1.05; it has been gradually decreasing until 1886 when the price had fallen to 73 06 cents. I find the spring wheat in 1883 was $107, It too has been falling, until in 1886 it had reached the small sum of 72.5 cents. I find in the case of barley the price in 1882 was 57 cents per bushel, it had fallen in 1886 to 5.13 cents. In the same year, 1883, oats were 38 cents, in 1886 they had fallen to 32 cents. Rye in 1883 was 62 cents, in 1886, 52 cents.

Mr. SPROULE. I have been paying 40 cents a bushel for oats all winter.

Mr. BARRON. Then the hon. gentleman knows better than the books. Peas in 1883 were 71 cents, in 1886 they had dropped to 52 cents. Since 1883 there has been a falling off in fall wheat of 30 per cent., in spring wheat of 32½ per cent., and in barley of 10 per cent. Let me make a comparison. Let me state what the total value of those crops was in 1886 and what the total value was in 1882. I find in the last year, 1882, the total value of those crops, fall wheat, spring wheat, barley, oats, rye and peas, was $89,682,065, whereas in 1886 it had fallen to $58,000,000 odd. I take my own county because that is what I am interested in.

Some HON. MEMBERS. Oh, oh!

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) I think hon. gentlemen should keep order, as I do not think it is very courteous to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. BARRON. I do not think it is very courteous on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite. They forget the fact that I am, practically speaking, a young member, and the further fact that I was forced to continue this debate when I did not wish to speak - when I desired to speak on another occasion when I would not be so hurried; and when the House would be more inclined to listen to me that it is at present, on account of the lateness of the hour. I find that the value of all field crops in my county in 1886 was $2,585,647, but the average for the five years between 1882 and 1886, was $2,710,144. So far as my own county is concerned, I am sorry to say the value of the various crops has declined under the National Policy. I will take the case of farm land. In my own county in 1886 the value of farm lands was $12,464,395. That was less than it was in 1885, when it was $12,5-2,876; whereas, in 1885, the value was $22.27 per acre. In the year following 1886 it had fallen to $22.11 per acre, the average for the five years from 1882 to 1886, being $23.15, and so on, with regard to farm buildings. I will not enlarge on the figures for the reason I have mentioned. The total value of land, buildings, implements, live stock, &c., in my county as compared with the different periods was as follows: 1886, $18,428,136; 1885, $18,642,995, or $32.99 in 1885 as compared with $32.69 in 1886. Next, take the assessed value, in regard to which I desire to make a comparison, because the Minister of the Interior the other night tried to make a point, and he did apparently make a point, although he received the Roland for his Oliver from the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), when he stated that Mr. Blue's book showed the value of the farm lands had increased in Ontario by twenty million dollars in 1886 over 1885. I have no doubt that so far as he went the hon. gentleman cited those figures correctly, but if he had studied them a little further he would have found that the increased value was altogether made up by the fact that the Ontario Government had opened out new districts, Algoma, Nipissing and Parry Sound, and the fact that settlers had taken up farms there would explain the large apparent increase. Let me take the case of the assessed value of rural property. In 1873 it was $195,387,274; 1878, $368,910,409, or an increase during the Mackenzie régime of $73,523,135. Now, what has been the increase during the time hon. gentlemen opposite have held the reigns of power? Take from 1880 to 1885, and I take this period because I have taken five years under the Mackenzie régime. In 1880 the assessed value of rural property was $374,774,517; 1885, $416,515,457, or an increase of $41,740,940, while under the Mackenzie régime the increase was $73,000,000; or in other words under the régime of Mr. Mackenzie the rural property increased by $31,000,000 odd more than it increased from 1880 to 1885 under the régime of hon. gentlemen opposite. But hon. gentlemen opposite are in the habit of saying, I think the Minister of Interior did paint it in very glowing colors, that Toronto had increased its assessed value and Montreal also, and the hon. gentleman asked, what did that mean? He said, increased population. Let me take the two together, rural and urban, and make a comparison. I find that between 1873 and 1878, under the Mackenzie administration, the increase was the enormous sum of $224,560,925; but under hon. gentlemen opposite between 1880 and 1885 it only increased $77,271,994. In other words, under the Mackenzie régime the increase in the assessed property in Ontario, taking city, town, village and farm altogether, was $147,288,931 more than it was between 1880 and 1885 under the régime of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. BARRON,

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Will the hon gentleman repeat the first figures respecting the value of real property. I understood him to say that the increase under the Conservative régime was only $42,000,000.

Mr. BARRON. $41,000,000 odd.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). What was the urban and rural increase, was it $73,000,000?

Mr. BARRON. $77,271,000.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell) The remarkable fact is that Toronto alone increased during that period about $46,000,000.

Mr. BARRON. In other places there were decreases, and Toronto, as the hon. gentleman well knows, has taken in suburban places. I propose now to take up the question of population. I find, Sir, that the number of ratepayers between 1873 and 1878 under Mr. Mackenzie increased by 36,864 in the Province of Ontario. Between the years 1880 and 1885 they increased only by 12,666. The ratepayers therefore in our Province increased three times as many under Mr. Mackenzie as they did under hon. gentlemen opposite from the years 1880 to 1885. They may say that the ratepayers of the cities and so forth increased faster under their Administration than under that of Mr. Mackenzie. If they will allow me, I will give a few figures from the book quoted by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance himself. In 1873, under Mr. Mackenzie, the urban rate-paying population was 112,065, and in 1878 it was 147,164, or an increase of 35,099. I find, Sir, that under hon. gentlemen opposite, from 1880 to 1885, in 1880 the rate-paying population was 151,680, and in 1885, 182,191, or an increase only of 30,511, whereas under Mr. Mackenzie, it increased by 35,099. Now, Sir, I will show, I think, from statistics, and allow me to say in this connection that I found the Statistical Record a most useful book. The population of Ontario, according to that book, in 1881, was 1,925,228. I have no means of finding out from the Dominion returns, at all events, what the population was in 1886, but I do find, from looking at Mr. Blue's book, quoted by my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior, that in 1886 the population was 1,819,026, or a decrease, taking the figures of the hon. gentleman opposite for the year 1881, and comparing them with Mr. Blue's figures in 1886, of 104,202.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Do you believe that?

Mr. BARRON. Do I believe it? Mr. Speaker, I admit that I have not the opportunity of knowing, and if I had I would take means the hon. gentleman opposite do not take to stop that exodus. I can tell you that judging from my own county that I can believe it, because I do know as was said here by some hon. gentleman in this House that young men have left my riding and gone to the United States where they earned money and sent it home to pay for their farms. The Tory organ in Lindsay last week told us that a gentleman who went to the North-West and distinguished himself, a gentleman who wears the Queen's uniform, and a young man, has left the town of Lindsay to take up his residence in St. Paul. I can tell hon. gentleman though they may not believe it, but at all events I conscientiously believe it, that the population in the Province of Ontario is not keeping up to its proper amount and that it is not keeping up to the natural increase of the population. I see my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior laughing. I hope he will be good enough to bear with me a little while as I will finish soon and I do not like to very much longer detain the House unnecessarily. Referring, Sir, to the iron industry I must say that it lies undeveloped in my own riding. We can remember the speech of the hon. the Minister of Finance last year when he spoke of the large iron deposits in the township of Sawdon which is in my riding. We recollect that on that occasion, that by reason of the increased duty which he then proposed that the iron industry would become progressive and would be a valuable industry in our country. Has this been the case? No. How is it possible that an import duty can increase the output from our mines in this Canada of ours? The hon. the Minister of Finance said last session that the total consumption of iron in Canada was not more than 350,000 tons which he said would require about 750,000 tons of iron ore. Now, Sir, suppose one of our mine turns out the same quantity as one mine does in Michigan which would be about 2,300 tons of ore, if one mine turned out that and no more it would supply as hon. gentlemen can see the whole demand for the Dominion of Canada. And if one mine did supply the whole demand then I would ask how are other mines to be worked in other portions of the Dominion of Canada? How are the iron mines of my riding to be worked if the Londonderry mines down in Nova Scotia can supply the whole demand for the Dominion of Canada? I am not alone, Mr. Speaker, in my want of faith in the prophecy of the hon. the Minister of Finance. The hon. gentlemen opposite must be aware that the rank and file of their own friends have not emphatic belief in the policy of that hon. gentleman. Why, Sir, we see them going now to Mr. Mowat and asking him to initiate a policy which the hon. gentleman here has failed to do. They have gone to Mr. Mowat and asked him to bonus the mines in order to establish an iron industry. Let me read a resolution of the Board of Trade in Lindsay the other day. The President of the Board of Trade, a most worthy man, who is the President also of the Conservative Association for South Victoria, is a Conservative, the Vice-President I find also is a Conservative, the mover of the resolution is a Conservative, the seconder of the resolution is a Conservative also, and having no confidence in the hon. gentlemen opposite they go to Mr. Mowat and say to him in so many words: "We have tried the hon. the Minister of Finance in his policy, and we find that policy wanting and now we come to you." The resolution I refer to as passed by the Lindsay Board of Trade is as follows:

"Resolved, that the Board of Trade of the town of Lindsay hereby petition the government of the province of Ontario to give such assistance by way of grants of hardwood lands to any parties who will undertake to erect and operate smelting works for the reduction of the ores of iron or other metals as will aid in the permanent development of mining and reduction of ores in the Province, with such restrictions as may be deemed necessary in the public interests. And resolved further that a copy of this resolution be sent by the secretary to the honorable the Minister of Crown Lands.

Not only do we find the rank and file going to Mr. Mowat in this respect but we find the first lieutenant in Ontario of the hon. the Premier, asking Mr. Mowat across the floor of the Ontario Legislature to bonus those industries in order to bring iron to the surface and to work that industry. Now I shall hurry on and very soon finish.

An hon. MEMBER. Oh, oh.

Mr. BARRON. I find my hon. friend crows over there, but I will not detain the House long. I want to refer to one matter. We have again and again been told that hon. gentlemen opposite are all the time willing and anxious for reciprocal trade. We see it stated in the public press, and especially in the commercial papers, that there is a statute on our books inviting the Americans to give us reciprocity. Now, Sir, if there is one thing which is a monument more lasting than brass to the legislative insincerity of hon. gentlemen opposite, it must be this statute. What does it say? That any or all of the following things, that is to say, animals of all kinds, grains, fruit, hay, straw, bran, seeds of all kinds, vegetables, plants, trees and shrubs, &c.—I shall not waste the time of the House in reading the whole section—may be admitted free. Although they put that on the Statute-book in 1879, and although these articles have been going into the United States free, hon. gentlemen opposite have maintained a tariff whereby the people of this country pay on trees valued at $41,921, a duty of $10,779, and on seeds valued at $52,759, a duty of $5,411. The total value of all these articles enumerated in this statute which are imported into this country is $744,181, on which the people have paid in duties the enormous sum of $133,471—articles which hon. gentlemen by statute declared should be admitted free into this country when the Americans removed the duties from them.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the people of this country pay that duty?

Mr. BARRON. Yes.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Then how does the producer on the other side pay the duty as well?

Mr. BARRON. There is no duty on the other side on these things; they are allowed in free. I did not say that they paid the duty on the other side. The point I desired to make was this, that hon. gentlemen are imposing a duty on articles coming into this country which are admitted free into the United States, contrary to what they agreed to in their own statute.

Mr. BOWELL. Would the hon. gentleman kindly inform me whether in quoting the figures in reference to our exportation of cattle, he took them from our returns of from the American returns.

Mr. BARRON. From our returns.

Mr. BOWELL. Then I would like to know how he could know that they paid the duty.

Mr. BARRON. Now, a great deal has been said to-night about the effect this policy would have on our relations with Great Britain. I do not believe Great Britain would object to it at all. Will you let me read a letter which was written by Mr. John Bright to Mr. Aspinall in reponse to an invitation from the latter gentleman to attend a reciprocity convention at Detroit in 1885. Mr. Bright said:

"The project of your convention gives me great pleasure. I hope it will lead to a renewal of commercial intercourse with the British North American Provinces, for it will be a miserable thing if, because the yare in connection with the British Crown, and you acknowledge as your Chief Magistrate, your President at Washington, there should not be a commercial intercourse between them and you as free, as if you were one people living under one government."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have very dear and affectionate ties with the old land, and I should be sorry indeed if the day should ever come when the interests of the two countries would conflict; but I do not think I would be doing duty to the people whom I have the honor to represent here if I regarded my own private feelings and convictions, and forgot my duty to them. Though I should be sorry indeed if such a day should ever come, at the same time if it should come, when the interest of the two countries should conflict the interest that I should vote for would be the interest of Canada. We have heard a great deal about loyalty—yes, lip loyalty. I confess I have no sympathy with the loyalty of some hon. gentlemen opposite, such, for instance, as was displayed the other night by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). I must say that I have no sympathy with that kind of loyalty which is always considering the interests of the few and forgetting the interest of the many—that kind of loyalty which is always looking after the interests of the manufacturers, as in the amendment which has been moved by the hon. minister of Marine, and forgetting the interests of the vast mass of the people. I confess I have no sympathy with that kind of loyalty which is always affecting a zeal for the prerogatives of the Crown and forgetting the liberty of the subject. Before closing, I wish to say a few words regarding the reply of the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Brown) to the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald). I am sorry to have to charge that hon. gentleman with not dealing fairly with the hon. member for East Huron. I do not know what hon. gentlemen opposite say of a person who is found only to tell half the story. It will be remembered that the hon. member for East Huron, referring to the exports of fish from British Columbia to the United States, cited the value as given in the Trade and Navigation Returns, at $186,774. The hon. member for Hamilton got up and cited what? He cited the Commerce and Navigation returns of the United States. I do not know, Sir, whether that was a very loyal thing for him to do, to refuse to take the Trade and Navigation Returns of our own country, made up by hon. gentlemen opposite, and to prefer to take those of the United States. But even in doing that, it would have been fair and proper in that hon. gentleman to have read all and not a portion only. Did he not say in answer to what the hon. member for East Huron said that the export of fish from British Columbia to the United States was only one barrel?

Mr. BOWELL. He did not say so.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes, worth $1.

Mr. BOWELL. Salmon.

Mr. BARRON. Well, I take salmon, does not the hon. member for Montreal East think it would have been fair in him to have said, also $20,458 worth of other kinds of fish. I do think that the hon. gentleman, when he quoted at all, should, in justice to the hon. member for East Huron have gone a little further and given us exactly what the book he was reading from did really contain.

An hon. MEMBER. Suppressio vero.

Mr. BARRON. My hon. friend says suppressio vero. I suppose hon. gentlemen opposite know what that is.

Some hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. BARRON. If the hon. gentleman does not know I will tell him. It is suppression of the truth.

Mr. CURRAN. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow me to tell him that it is suppressio veri.

Mr. BARRON. I told the hon. gentleman what the meaning of the phrase is.

Mr. HICKEY. It was Prince [Edward Island led him astray again.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Prince Edward Island did not lead him astray. He understands a little more classics than you do.

Mr. HICKEY. He did not quote it correctly.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I made the quotation correctly. You did not know if it was correct or not.

Mr. BARRON. I will close my remarks because I know you are all tired. I desire to say that we should take the example in England in more respects than one! It will be in the recollection of some hon. gentlemen, especially the hon. Minister of Customs, as a matter of history, that in the year 1843 England imposed a discriminating duty in favor of the British Colonies, and that in the year 1848 that discriminating duty was removed, and all imports into that country, foreign or colonial, were placed on the same footing. It will be in the knowledge of hon. gentlemen that complaints were then made in Canada from all sources—from the Governors in Council, and from the different Boards of Trade, and what was the answer made by Mr. Gladstone? I refer to his answer, because I think it expresses the sentiment we should recognise to-day, of Canada for the Canadians. He said:

"The interests of Canada have occupied the place to which they are justly entitled in the deliberations of Her Majesty's Government upon this important subject and upon others which are akin to it. At the same time I need hardly point out to your Lordship that there are matters in which considerations immediately connected with the supply of food for the people of this country and with the employment of its population must be paramount."

Just as Mr. Gladstone said then, in answer to the protest of Canada, so say I now that no matter what the effect may be—though I should be sorry indeed that it should have any prejudicial effect on Great Britain—still, no matter what the effect may be, if it is in the interest of Canada that we should have unrestricted reciprocity such as is pointed out by the motion of the hon. member for South Oxford, I believe, in all earnestness and sincerity, that we should legislate solely for the interests of Canada, no matter whether these conflict with the interests of Great Britain or not.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. BARRON. I say yes, and I say that I believe our axiom should be that which the right hon. the first Minister gave to us in 1878, of "Canada for the Canadians." I say that, while we must always remember the rose, the shamrock, the thistle, and the fleur de lis, we must not forget that upon our land there grows a noble forest tree, and upon the branches of that tree there grows a maple leaf, emblematic of a true people who believe in the truest sentiment of loyalty, that is loyalty to the true interests of the people.

Mr. CURRAN moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 1 o'clock a.m., Wednesday.

SECOND SESSION, SIXTH PARLIAMENT.—51 VIC.

Vol. XX.

Ottawa, Wednesday, March 21, 1888.

No. 20.

NOTICE TO MEMBERS.

Necessary corrections to Members' Speeches, for the bound edition, must be forwarded to the Debates Office within twenty-four hours after the printed copies of the speeches have been circulated, as after that time the contractors may print the copies for the bound edition without further delay.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 21st March, 1888.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honor to inform the House that I have received from the Registrar of the Supreme Court of Canada, certified copies of the judgments of the court in the following cases:—

County of Quebec, wherein O'Brien and others were appellants, and the Hon. Sir Adolphe Caron was respondent, the appeal being quashed for want of jurisdiction.

Quebec West, wherein M. A. Hearn was appellant, and the Hon. Thos. McCreavy was respondent, the appeal being dismissed.

Montmagny, wherein P. A. Choquette was appellant, and Laberge et al respondents. In this case the appeal allowed, the judgment of the lower court was reversed, the preliminary objections being allowed and the election petition dismissed.

I have received from the judges selected for the trial of election petitions, pursuant to the Dominion Controverted Elections Act, certificates relating to the elections in the Electoral Districts of Brome, Missisquoi, Shefford, and the East Riding of Elgin, respectively, in all of which the petitions were dismissed, or the sitting members declared duly elected.

I beg to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery a certificate of the election and return of William Frederick Roome, Esq., to represent the Electoral District of the West Riding of the County of Middlesex.

KENT ELECTION.

Mr. GIROUARD. In answer to the enquiry made by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) yesterday, as to when the papers in the County of Kent election case would be printed, every effort has been made to have them printed, and it is only this moment they have been given to us. They will be distributed at once, and the committee will be called for Friday.

REPRESENTATION ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. BAKER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 55) to amend "The Representation Act," as respects certain constituencies in British Columbia.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. BAKER. This is the same Bill that I introduced last year and in the Session before last, and, as there is supposed to be luck in odd numbers, I thought I would introduce it the third time in the hope of carrying it. The object of the Bill is to place certain islands, which I conceive to be in the constituency of Victoria, in that constituency, for at present a doubt exists, though the Minister of Justice has given a decision that the islands belong to the district of Vancouver. The object of this Bill is to remove any doubt as to the constituency in which these islands are actually situated.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

ELECTIONS ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. BAKER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 56) to amend the Dominion Elections Act. He said: The only reason for the introduction of this Bill is that the necessity for any particular distinction being made between the electoral districts in British Columbia and those in any other part of the Dominion, has passed. There is no longer any necessity for any extended period of time between the date of issuing the proclamation and the date of nomination, or between the date of nomination and the date of election, and there are simply three clauses to expunge anything which makes an exception in favor of British Columbia. The Bill does not in any way affect Gaspé, Chicoutimi or Saguenay. I leave those districts to take care of themselves.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SUPREME AND EXCHEQUER COURTS ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. BAKER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 57) further to amend "The Supreme and Exchequer Courts Act," chapter 135 of the Revised Statutes.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will explain the purport of the Bill.

Mr. BAKER. This is simply to extend to the Province of British Columbia the same right or privilege which has been extended to the Maritime Provinces, so that, in cases arising either in the County Court or Supreme Court, where the amount exceeds $250, whether it arises in the County Court or in the Supreme Court of the Province, the parties may have the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PURSE SEINE FISHING.

Mr. KIRK moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 58) to make further provision respecting Fisheries and Fishing.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. KIRK. The intention of the Bill is simply to prohibit the use of purse seines in fishing. It is not necessary to give the reasons just now. I will do that when the Bill comes up for the second reading.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to ask the Government when we may expect the Election Bills. They are not yet down, though a whole month has elapsed, and it is most desirable that they should be before the House and that an opportunity should be given to consult the country in regard to them before the Easter holidays.

Mr. THOMPSON. I think I may say that they will be down early next week.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. For the sake of convenience, I would ask if the Government have decided yet on what particular day they propose to adjourn for the Easter vacation?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will be kind enough to renew this question when the First Minister is here, and I think he will then be able to give him an answer.

RECIPROCITY WITH THE UNITED STATES.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Richard Cartwright:

That it is highly desirable that the largest possible freedom of commercial intercourse should obtain between the Dominion of Canada and the United States, and that it is expedient that all articles manufactured in, or the natural products of either of the said countries should be admitted free of duty into the ports of the other (articles subject to duties of excise or of internal revenue alone excepted). That it is further expedient that the Government of the Dominion should take steps at an early date to ascertain on what terms and conditions arrangements can be effected with the United States for the purpose of securing full and unrestricted reciprocity of trade therewith.

And the motion of Mr. Foster in amendment:

That Canada in the future, as in the past, is desirous of cultivating and extending Trade relations with the United States in so far as they may not conflict with the policy of fostering the various interests and industries of the Dominion which was adopted in 1879 and has since received in so marked a manner the sanction and approval of its people.

And the motion of Mr. Jones (Halifax) in amendment to the amendment:

That in any arrangement between Canada and the United States providing for the free importation into each country of the natural and manufactured productions of the other, it is highly desirable that it should be provided that during the continuance of any such arrangement the coasting trade of Canada and of the United States should be thrown open to vessels of both countries on a footing of complete reciprocal equality, and that vessels of all kinds built in the United States or Canada may be owned and sailed by the citizens of the other and be entitled to registry in either country and to all the benefits thereto appertaining.

Mr. CURRAN. I trust that hon. gentlemen will consider the apology I owe to them for intruding upon them at this late period of the debate as having been expressed, and I shall at once proceed to discharge the duty that now devolves upon me, in the first place, by alluding briefly to the speech delivered by the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Barron) before the House adjourned last night, and then dealing with the question in a general way as briefly as the importance of this debate will allow. Yesterday, this House had the pleasure of listening to a speech from my hon. friend the member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood), which, for pith and point and power, has seldom been equalled in the halls of the Dominion Parliament of Canada, and the hon. gentleman who followed him, and whom I am now following, I think, by the speech which he delivered last night, made the most ample confession that the speech of my hon. friend from Westmoreland was absolutely unanswerable, and that the arguments he adduced could not be met by him in any way whatsoever. From the beginning to the end of the speech delivered by my hon. friend from North Victoria, he carefully avoided any single argument adduced by my hon. friend from Westmoreland. He made no attempt to refute his speech, and he did not even mention the hon. gentleman's name from the beginning to the end of the address which he delivered. On the other hand, the hon. gentleman told us that it was not his intention to address this House upon the question in a general way, that he was going to confine himself not merely to a Provincial view of this question, but was going to confine himself in a very great measure to the view, as I understood it, which would concern his own constituency. Now, I consider that, in discussing a question of this kind, any such line is entirely at variance with the interests of the country at large, is entirely unworthy of the position occupied by a representative of the people in this House, and should be looked upon by the people of this country as utterly untenable when the question before the House has for its object, as has been stated by the mover of this resolution, a complete economic revolution in our country. But the hon. gentleman certainly made a few statements that, to my mind, and the minds of those who surrounded him, must have appeared simply astounding. He told us that the National Policy was a policy for the benefit of the few to the detriment of the majority; and to prove that the farmers were oppressed by it, he said that the number of farmers in Ontario, according to his computation, were 1,144,520. Now, that is an astounding figure, one which I think it will be difficult for the hon. gentleman to carry out by statistics; because, after all, it is not merely in the Province of Quebec that the farming community like to sing

"Vive la Canadienne, et ses jolis yeux doux."

The fact is that the farmers of Ontario have a weakness for the fair sex also; they are not all bachelors, and if we make a computation of five in a family, according to his statement it would give 5,722,600 persons as belonging to the farming community in Ontario, or more than the whole population of the Dominion of Canada. The hon. gentleman also told us that the trade of Ontario and the Dominion, in horned cattle, would be vastly benefitted by unrestricted reciprocity. He did not tell us, however, what the effect would be to-day under unrestricted reciprocity; he did not tell us that when United States cattle are scheduled in the British market as Canadian cattle, they are not kept in quarantine, or in any way detained, and not slaughtered; but he led this House and the country to suppose that he, who was speaking, as he said, not for the country at large, but simply for one agricultural constituency, was not aware of the importance and vital interest at which he was striking, a vital interest to every cattle raiser in the vast Province from which he comes. There are other things which he stated in reference to barley, lumber, and so on, to which, he said, he would invite gentlemen on this side of the House, engaged in trade in those particular articles, to reply; but I shall leave it to some hon. gentlemen who will follow me to deal more particularly with that branch of the subject. He told us, however, that experience was good for something, and I agree with him there, and before I resume my seat, Mr. Speaker, I shall endeavor to establish what experience teaches in connection with this question, not with reference to the constituency that I represent only, nor with reference to the constituency that the hon. gentleman represents, but how this scheme will affect the people of the Dominion, from the Atlantic to the Pacific; and I believe that the experience that I shall bring to bear on this subject will be satisfactory to the overwhelming majority in this House. We have also had allusion made, in the course of this debate, to the terrible state of things in this country at the present time, by the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones), and that hon. gentleman's sympathies went out so far, almost, as to cause him to shed tears over my native city of Montreal. He quoted from the speech of Mr. Drummond, at the Board of Trade the other day, concerning the assumption by the Government of the Lake St. Peter debt. He did not tell us that that was the occasion of the speech, but he sought to make it appear to the people of this country, not that that section of the country which is supplied from Montreal as a great distributing centre, would be improved by the assumption of that debt, but that by unrestricted reciprocity the great end which those people are now clamoring for, would be attained. He did not tell us that he was one of the persons who stood up in this House only last Session and denounced the idea that the Government should assume the debt of Lake St. Peter. He did not, for one moment, refer to figures to show that inter-provincial trade has done a great deal for the St. Lawrence route, and he never, for one second, pointed out that he was bound during the present Session, as a patriot, to relieve the suffering city of Montreal, and to change his attitude from that which he occupied during the last Session of this Parliament. We have had the same story repeated over and over again with reference to the want of statistics, we have had statements made that the country was going back, was going to the dogs, that the children were not attending school, that the country was far from being in a prosperous condition. I do not intend at this moment to enter, at any length, into the discussion of that branch of the question; it has been already amply dealt with. I will merely give some statistics from the Roman Catholic institutions of Lower Canada, since these are considered of such immense value by hon. gentlemen opposite. I have a statement from one of the school commissioners, who act jointly with the clergy, because there are both clergy and laymen on the Catholic School Board of Montreal. He sends this statement:

"I send this statement to show the progressive increase in the school attendance. From 6,405 in 1877, it increased to 7,005 in 1881. From 7,316, in 1882, it increased to 9,932 in 1884. This is the attendance at the Commissioners' Schools. There are, of course a great many other schools independent of the Commissioners', but the report of the Commissioners shows an increase in school attendance from 6,405 in 1877, to 9,332 in 1884, or 55 per cent. in seven years."

Now, we have also had from my hon. friend the member for Rouville (Mr. Rigault) a complete answer to the charges that were made by the hon. member over this resolution. I can supply figures, with reference to the City and District Savings Bank, perhaps the best institution to judge by in this country, as the deposits there do not average more than $200 each. At the time the National Policy was inaugurated, there were but $3,000,000 deposited in that institution, by about 20,000 depositors. To-day, the deposits in that bank have swollen to $8,600,000, by about 40,000 depositors. Those facts and others to which I might point, the fact that when the National Policy was inaugurated we had 15,000 dwellings, shops, and other buildings vacant in Montreal and to-day we have not one single house fit to live in or one tenement unoccupied—show that all the lamentations on the other side of the House are entirely unfounded and gratuitous. Leaving that branch of the subject, and proceeding as rapidly as I can to the general consideration of what is now before us, I cannot do so without referring to one or two speeches that have been made here, and which I think were calculated to do great harm in this community. It was sought by the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Dessaint) a few days ago, and by the hon. member for Monmagy (Mr. Choquette) last night, to impress upon a large section of the people of this country, upon the whole French Canadian people, that there were members on this side of the House who were their enemies and who had launched forth against them on the floor of Parliament observations to the effect that the French Canadian people who have emigrated to the United States were hewers of wood and drawers of water. Mr. Speaker, I feel that every hon. member who heard the observation made by the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) is aware of the fact that his interruption was as regards the speech of the hon. gentleman, the introducer of this resolution, where he said that if we were to carry out the policy of unrestricted reciprocity not a French Canadian but the whole Canadian people would become hewers of wood and drawers of water to the people of the neighboring Republic. But whilst we deprecate the introduction of such subjects into a discussion of this kind, whilst we deprecate appeals to national sentiment and national prejudice, it is fair, it is right perhaps that we should show, if there be any such thing as fanaticism in this matter, where that fanaticism lies, that we should point out to those interested in knowing what is the object and design of the great apostles, and of the leading apostle perhaps of this great movement now said to be on foot. I refer you, Mr. Speaker, and the House to the statement made in the public press by Mr. Goldwin Smith, only a few months ago, when urging the people of Canada to adopt a policy of commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity. He said:

"It is said Quebec is against commercial union. If she is it is not on any commercial grounds. It is because the dominant and tithelevying priesthood of Quebec want to keep its domain in a state of isolation and shrinks from any increase of intercourse with the religious equality and free opinion of the American Republic."

That was the statement published and sent broadcast through the country, and yet we find hon. gentlemen opposite trying to fight an imaginary foe, while they have a real and genuine one right before them if they wish to attack him. Perhaps it may be said that this was a slip of the pen, that Mr. Goldwin Smith, the apostle of this new political gospel that is going to regenerate the Dominion of Canada, did not really hold such sentiments. Let me read to the House what he said on September 6th, 1887, only a few months ago:

"While I have watched the action of the unifying forces which draw us toward our kinsmen in the United States, I have also watched the growth both in bulk and in intensity within our own political border of a French nationality as alien to us as anything can well be, which seems fatal to our hope of a really united Canada."

That is the statement made by this apostle of commercial union and unrestricted reciprocity. There is an opponent whom hon. gentlemen opposite can fight if they feel disposed to fight with some one, and lest there should be any mistake as to the position of this great statesman, who has come here to do so much for Canada, whose words and whose writings and publications have never once been repudiated, either by the smallest or the largest man on the other side of the House, I will read a further quotation to show exactly what his sentiments are respecting one and a half millions of the inhabitants of Canada. He said:

"In truth our one chance of modifying the French element and arresting its growth into an alien nationality, appears to be to open it to the full influence of the English-speaking continent, which may be strong enough for the work of assimilation, while that of British Canada alone has proved to be too weak. The very reason which makes the ecclesiastics of Quebec recoil from commercial union with the Republic ought to make us the more ready to embrace it."

This statement was also published broadcast throughout the country; and yet we have hon. gentlemen opposite rising and working themselves into a terrible rage in regard to an imaginary insult, but not one of them has a word to say in condemnation of the utterances of this great commercial unionist and unrestricted reciprocity advocate, nor have his words, as I have already said, ever been repudiated or condemned by a single leading man on the other side of politics. Having thus dealt with that episode of this debate, it now becomes my duty to examine as to what is the position occupied by hon. gentlemen opposite. In my opinion they must feel very much in the position of the pagan priests of old. If they never speak when they meet, they must smile on one another when they consider exactly the kind of notions with which they are trying to bamboozle the people of Canada; how they must wink at one another when they take into consideration the various trans-mogrifications through which they have passed in only one short year. Now, it strikes me that the hon. gentleman who has charge of this resolution must have been studying the works of the late lamented Artemus Ward. We know that Artemus tells us in his book that among the greatest objects of interest he possessed was one wax figure which did very good service indeed. In the morning he exhibited it in the character of George Washington, in the afternoon it was made to do duty as Louis Napoleon, and in the evening it was exhibited to an admiring audience as Judas Iscariot. We have had a similar process going on on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite. We have had the policy of hon. gentlemen exhibited to the people as quite a harmless little object, it had no harm in it, there was nothing connected with it that would for one moment disturb the great industries that had been inaugurated in Canada and that had grown up under the National Policy. By their policy that other policy which has become fixed was not for one moment to be disturbed. That was proclaimed throughout the length and breadth of the Province of Ontario, and during the last election, lest there should be any mistake upon the minds of those who were engaged in manufactures, the then leader of the Opposition was brought all the way down to Montreal to make his profession of faith there, face to face with those engaged in the great manufacturing industries of the country. And the then leader went there lest there should be any mistake about it, lest there should be any misinterpretation, and he said in effect: "I am not going to have any mistake or misinterpretation, and I will just read you my Malvern speech over again." That was the first phase, and the next one, a little while after, is, that we find Mr. Goldwin Smith, we find Mr. Wiman, we find the hon. gentleman who moved this resolution, we find the hon. gentleman who sits beside him, and we find a whole host of gentlemen on the other side of the House in a new transformation scene with their policy of commercial union. Commercial union was the only thing that would save the land they said, commercial union was their policy and they were going to stand or fall by it. In fact I heard the hon. gentleman who has proposed this unrestricted reciprocity resolution declare at Hastings, in the County of East Northumberland, in the month of January last, that as a Privy Councillor he was prepared to advise Her Majesty the Queen to sanction the introduction of commercial union as the policy of this country.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I said no such thing.

Mr. CURRAN. That will not do.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It will do.

Mr. CURRAN. That will not do.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And I call upon the hon. member to withdraw the statement. The hon. gentleman wholly misunderstood and misinterpreted me if he says I said anything of the kind. I said nothing of the kind. What I stated in my address and what I said was the same as I said here the other night, that I would most undoubtedly advise Her Majesty, if she called on me for advice, to adopt the policy laid down in this resolution—in the words of this resolution.

Mr. CURRAN. There was no unrestricted reciprocity then. Nobody was talking of unrestricted reciprocity at that time.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Oh, oh.

Mr. CURRAN. Very good: I accept the hon. gentleman's statement, but I am going to make my own statement too.

Mr. CURRAN.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We accept your statement.

Mr. CURRAN. Exactly. At that time the Toronto Globe, that gave inspiration to my hon. friend the member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), and on the strength of which article the hon. gentleman no doubt made his great speech—on the 14th of September, the Toronto Globe had declared in the most emphatic language that nobody but a fool would think of unrestricted reciprocity. It could not be carried out. It would not be accepted by the Americans. And that article is there in black and white to refer to. The official organ of those gentlemen on the other side has declared that, and any one can see it who wishes to take the trouble to read it. That, then, was the position of affairs only a short time ago. But still later what was the condition of affairs? Surely gentlemen on the other side will not deny that which has taken place here in the presence of several members of Parliament. The hon. member for South Middlesex (Mr. Armstrong) put upon the Table of Parliament a resolution to be proposed by him embodying commercial union as the policy that ought to prevail for this country. But, gentlemen, was he not sat upon? Did he not have to clear out of this resolution? Had he not to allow this policy to fall in order that gentlemen opposite might come before the country with the policy which only a few months ago was declared to be utterly unworthy of the consideration of sensible men? Now we are told that there is a very marked difference,—a very, very marked difference indeed—between commercial union and unrestricted reciprocity. What that difference is in the results I would like somebody to show, because we have not seen it pointed out yet. One thing is certain, that unrestricted reciprocity between Canada and the United States means, so far as those two countries are concerned, commercial union; that is, free trade between them. Nobody can deny this. Unless they should I will again quote the gentleman for whom I have a great weakness, Mr. Goldwin Smith. Speaking on the 27th September last:

"He made a speech," says the Globe, "of an hour's duration in which he clearly showed the general advantages that would ensue to Canada by the adoption of commercial union, which practically meant unrestricted reciprocity or absolute free trade between Canada and the United States."

This is Mr. Goldwin Smith's definition of the thing, and the other day, in a letter written for the purpose of fortifying the hon. gentleman who has proposed this resolution and written for the purpose of giving them nerve to go on and carry out their views, he said—on Saturday last only:

"There seems to be a nervous disposition to drop the name 'Commercial Union'—"

Mind you, those gentlemen never had that name before, they never had that policy; but he says here he must avoid it because there seems to be a nervous disposition to drop the name "Commercial Union." Mr. Smith continues:

"—and to adopt unrestricted reciprocity in its place. I should myself have preferred continental free trade, had we not been told that the phrase 'Free Trade' would raise theoretic questions which were not involved and which it was our policy to avoid. Commercial union, as I understand it, differs from unrestricted reciprocity only in more clearly including mutual participation in the fisheries and coasting trade. It was adopted, I believe, in direct contradistinction to political union and made for the special purpose of guarding against any such idea."

You see they want to throw dust in the peoples' eyes.

"However, the name has now become thoroughly current in England, in the United States and in Canada, and is imbedded in all the literature of the question. An attempt to change it will look like the hauling down of a flag, and would not propitiate opponents who are already crying out that unrestricted reciprocity, like commercial union, is annexation in disguise."

That is a statement of their own apostle. It is the statement of their own adviser, the man who does all the writing for them, and tries to get up the sentiment in the country. They may try to shuffle out of it as they like, but there they stand, convicted by their own best witness. Now, up to the present time, they have had in this House a very strange discussion on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite. We have been told that they are now proposing to introduce an absolute economical revolution in the country, a revolution, which it is admitted, is going to ruin a great many people, and which, the hon. gentlemen opposite say, cannot be helped, because there is no great revolution of this kind can be carried out without hurting some one. We are to risk all the invested wealth in manufactures in this country, which have been fostered under the National Policy—wealth that was put there under the solemn promise of Parliament that that would be its policy. We are to do away with all that for a prospective benefit; and what argument have we had on the other side to bring us to that frame of mind? We have had statistics, we have had gentlemen of great skill and ability taking a number of figures and tossing them about, endeavouring to make it appear from their standpoint that such and such results must flow from their speculations. But strange to say, Sir, on a question of this kind which involves such mighty interests, we have not had one appeal to history. Not one parallel has been cited from the history of the past, at least not on the floor of this House, although it was done in some parts of the country. Now, I think that state of things is not to be found anywhere else. When any great movement of this kind is proposed in any deliberative assembly in the world, something has been done to show what have been the results of like movements in the past. Not to weary this House with examples, I shall merely draw your attention to the great speech delivered by the Hon. Mr. Gladstone, in 1846, when he introduced his Government of Ireland Bill. On that occasion he went over the whole history of Europe. He took every country and showed how such a measure of his had been carried under such and such circumstances, going from Norway and Sweden down to Austria and Hungary, and showing by historical parallels what they might expect to realise from the measure he had laid before the House. We have nothing of that kind here, Mr. Speaker; but throughout the country, when these gentlemen were talking commercial union, although they deny it now, there was a parallel sought to be drawn between the position of Canada and the United States, and the position of Scotland and England at the time of the Scottish union. Is there a gentleman in this House who has not read their speeches, and who does not remember this argument having been advanced, not only by Mr. Goldwin Smith, but also by the hon. gentleman who has proposed this resolution? Now, I do not think it necessary to detain the House very long in discussing a question which must be familiar to all; but I will take this opportunity of showing that there is no parallel whatever between the two cases. Whatever hon. gentlemen opposite may say, Canada is not a beggarly country; Canada is not a country that is reduced in any way to great straits. The people of Canada to-day are in a fairly good condition at any rate. We have no mendicancy here to speak about; we have no people in the throes of despair. Every honest man who wishes to earn an honest day's pay by an honest day's labor can earn that honest day's pay.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. CURRAN. Well, if you have any in your constituency, I have none in mine; and throughout the length and breadth of this country, there is no honest, sober, industrious man, who wishes to work for his living, who cannot make a good living.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How do a million native born Canadians leave Canada, then?

Mr. CURRAN. I am going to tell the hon. gentleman in a few moments if he will allow me. I am going to point out to him that a million native Canadians would never have left Canada if Canada had the good fortune to adopt the National Policy ten years before we did. There are three French Canadians in the United States to every one of any other origin, and the great majority of those went there, many of them taking their wives and families with them to work in the factories, and they have remained there and form a very large portion of the industrial population of the United States. That is the reason those people have gone there, and if they have gone there, and if they have gone since the adoption of the National Policy, it has been because that policy has not enabled this country even to the present day, although it is making great strides, to recover from the soup-kitchen policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. But, to continue my argument, although hon. gentlemen do not evidently like the reference to Scotland.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We object to calling Scotland a beggarly country, and I think the Premier would do the same.

Mr. CURRAN. I am quoting from Lecky's history:

"The commercial clauses of the union laid the foundation of the material prosperity of Scotland, and they alone reconciled the most intelligent Scotchmen to the partial sacrifice of their nationality. The country was, indeed, reduced to a condition of chronic famine, and the emancipation of Scotch trade had become a cardinal object of every patriot. * * * The Treaty of Union, however, as it was finally carried, was drawn with great skill and with much consideration for the weaker nation. It provided that the land tax should be so arranged that when England contributed £48,000, or rather less than a fortieth part, that in consideration of the heavy English debt by which the taxation of the whole island would be increased, an equivalent of about £400,000 should be granted to Scotland."

Which was equal to six years of the annual revenue of Scotland, both from excise and customs. Now, I contend that there is no parallel whatever between the case of Canada and the case of Scotland at the time of union; but I think I can establish a parallel which cannot be denied. I think I shall be able to show that these hon. gentlemen who have been going about the country asserting that Canada is in the position of Scotland, and that this country would be benefitted to an enormous extent by the influx of American capital, and by the opening of their market to us, are merely repeating here the arguments that were adduced by Castlereagh in the Irish Parliament in order to induce the people to give up their national parliament, and become commercially as well as politically united with England, and enjoy the great benefits of unrestricted reciprocity. If anybody will take up Barrington's historical sketch of the Irish nation at the time of the union, he will find the ipsissima verba of those gentlemen falling from the lips of Castlereagh himself; and I think the spirit of that unfortunate statesman, which must be in a very tropical region just now, must be still more disturbed by the fact that these gentlemen are plundering and plagiarising his ideas, and not giving him credit for them. "The rise and fall of the Irish nation," by Barrington, sets forth, in a very concise form, the arguments used at that time. He says:

"At present, it must suffice to state the abstract points on which the arguments of Government for annexation were founded, and those by which they were so ably and unanswerably refuted: First, the distracted state of the Irish nation; secondly, the great commercial advantages of the union, which must eventually enrich Ireland by an extension of its commerce, the influx of British capital, and the confidence of England in the stability of its institutions, when guaranteed by the union. Thirdly, the Government presses with great zeal the example of Scotland, which had so improved, and became so rich and prosperous after its annexation; a precedent which must convince the Irish of the incalculable advantages which must ensue from a similar incorporation.

Those are the very advantages which are set forth by hon. gentlemen opposite, to be derived by us from unrestricted reciprocity:

"The enormous commercial advantages that would arise if we had access to the great markets on the other side, and the enormous amount of capital that would flow into the country from the more wealthy people with whom we are asked to have that unrestricted reciprocity. What does Mr. Barrington say about this? The second ground of argument used by the supporters of the union, great commercial advantages, appeared still more fallacious. Its deception was too palpable to deceive the most ignorant of the people."

In the same way, the argument used here in favor of unrestricted reciprocity, based on the same supposition, is too palpably deceptive to hoodwink even the most ignorant man in the Dominion of Canada. Mr. Barrington goes on to say:

"The crafty prediction that English capital would flow into Ireland when a union was effected, was a visionary deception. The third and most deceptive argument of the supporters of the union, because the most plausible, was the precedent of which, at that period, flowed in full tide upon the public of Scotland, and the great advantages derived by her in consequence of her union. Of all the false reasons, misstated facts, fallacious promises and unfounded conclusions that any position ever was attempted to be supported on, the arguments founded on the Scottish precedent were the most erroneous, and no deception was ever more completely and fully detected than by the speeches made in the Irish Parliament in 1799 and 1800, and on several able pamphlets. First, as to the matter of fact, Scotland and Ireland in their relation with England, stood on grounds diametrically opposite to each other on every point that could warrant a union on the one side, or reject it on the other."

And the writer goes on to point out that, in point of fact, never had Scotland, up to that time, representative institutions such as existed in Ireland and such as exist in Canada to-day. Therefore, there is no parallel whatsoever in that case. But we have, I say, in the first place, with regard to the comparison and the parallel I am about to draw, the contiguity of Ireland to England and that of Canada to the United States. We have, in the second place, a similarity as regards population. They were then something over 4,000,000 in Ireland, and we have 4,000,000 to 5,000,000 people in Canada to-day. In the third place, the Irish Parliament had adopted the protective tariff, just as we have adopted the protective tariff of the National Policy; and we have the other point, that the people of England desired to make Ireland a slaughter market for their goods, just as the people of the United States desire to make Canada a slaughter market to-day. I contend that we have more ground for a parallel. We have in the history that preceded the union of England and Ireland, exactly a parallel case in the conduct of England towards that country as compared with the conduct of the United States towards us. For years the people of Ireland were anxious to have free commercial relations with the people of England, just as for years the people of Canada were knocking at the doors of our neighbors and asking them for free commercial intercourse. That commercial intercourse was refused by England. Laws were passed by the British Parliament striking at the woollen industries of Ireland; and England refused to have commercial intercourse with Ireland until 1782, when by the aid of the volunteers and the political exigencies of the period, Ireland obtained her own independence, and her industries began to prosper by the adoption of a national policy for the protection of her home industries. These industries were thus brought to the highest state of perfection. On the other hand, while the United States could not pass laws which would have operation in this country, they did pass legislation which was intended to affect us in a most detrimental manner. They abolished our first Reciprocity Treaty, the Elgin treaty. Our hon. friends opposite sent the late Hon. George Brown down to Washington to ask not merely reciprocity in natural products, but to a large extent in our manufactures as well. But the Americans refused to have anything to do with him. They later on refused to renew the Washington Treaty and last, but not least, as an evidence of the spirit that actuates them in their dealings with this country, they passed a law of non-communication, thus showing that a large section of that people were disposed, if possible, to crush Canada and make of her a slaughter market for their surplus productions. Therefore

Mr. CURRAN.

I claim that the parallel is established on all those points so completely as to defy contradiction. Now, we have in Canada to-day certainly as large a number of manufactures and as varied a series of industries as any country could expect to have in the short time during which the National Policy has been in force. Now, I would ask what was the effect in the past of the national policy upon the Irish people during the existence of the Grattan Parliament. I will take my quotations from the Loyal Repeal Association's report, which Daniel O'Connell presented to the people of Ireland in these words:

"Fellow countrymen, I dedicate these reports to you. They were written by one of yourselves for the benefit of all. They have met the approbation of the National Repeal Association, and therefore I have no hesitation in recommending them to your perusal."

Later on, he proceeds to state in a general way that which I shall endeavor to prove from the statistics I hold in my hand—that from the year 1782 until the breach of the union, Ireland increased in prosperity, her commerce largely extended, her agriculture augmented, her manufactures improved and increased, her people daily became more prosperous and her gentry and nobility became enriched by the prosperity engendered on every side. What were the particular branches of trade and commerce that were specially benefited by this national policy in Ireland. I shall begin by making some quotations from section 1st, entitled the woollen manufactures. It goes on to speak of the early woollen manufactures of Ireland, and to show, what I have already pointed out, that the jealousy of the neighboring country was aroused by the great progress that Ireland was making, and it gives here an extract from the address of the Lords, stating that the growth and increase of woollen manufactures in Ireland had been and would be ever looked upon with great jealousy. And they asked that this may be the occasion of very strict laws "totally to prohibit and suppress the same." These laws having had their effect, the National Parliament was called upon to re-establish those industries, and what did they do? The report goes on to say:

"After the glorious era of 1782, when, by an unparalleled effort of national energy, Ireland had shaken off the shackles from her trade, and achieved her legislative independence, the rapid advances she made in commercial and manufacturing prosperity are undeniably recorded. In ten years after, there was found to be in the city of Dublin sixty master clothiers, having 400 looms engaged in the making of broadcloths, 100 in the making of cassimeres, and employing 5,000 persons on these fabrics. A stronger proof of the prosperity of these times, and of the deep interest which England has or ought to have in Irish prosperity, cannot be adduced, than the fact that, although home manufacture was thus extensively promoted, the market of England had to be resorted to for supplying the demand arising from the better condition of the people. In 1782, the quantity of broadcloths imported into Ireland was 352,830 yards, and in 1790 the quantity of broadcloths imported was 653,899 yards. Meantime, the fostering guardianship of the Irish Parliament was constantly devoted to the encouragement and protection of the native manufactures. In 1785 they granted a sum of £5,000 to be expended in distributing looms, carding machines and other implements, and the establishment of woollen markets, and a further grant of £4,000 was made to pay apprentice fees with children to manufacturers. Other extensive grants were periodically made for the encouragement of cotton and silk manufactures."

And so on down to the end of the chapter. When we come to the particular places in which these industries sprung up, and where thousands upon thousands of people, under the national policy which was then inaugurated, found employment, and found plenty and prosperity for the country at large, we find that in Dublin:

"It is ascertained from authentic documents that in 1800 there were in Dublin 91 master manufacturers in the woollen trade, and these 91 master employers kept 1,122 looms busy in the making of broadcloths, druggets and cassimeres; and the total number of hands employed in all branches were 4,938."

What was the result, only a few years afterwards, of that unrestricted reciprocity between the two countries, with all the barriers removed? They had gone in, as we are now asked to go in, with the neighboring nation. There was a protective policy in England at that time, as there is one on the other side of the line now. They were invited to go in, to have all the wealth of England poured into their lap, and to have their manufactures increased, to see them raise their tall chimneys to the skies, and to obtain prosperity throughout the length and the breadth of the land. What was the result?

"There are not more," he says, "than 250 woollen weavers employed in Dublin and its vicinity, and their average earnings for the last three years amount from 8s. to 10s. per week, making allowance for periods of idleness. At present—that is in 1840—there are not more than 12 master manufacturers, and the aggregate number of persons employed by them 682, in all branches.

Then the wool combing business employed a host of men in a separate manufacture altogether. The carpet manufacture was a most prosperous industry.

"At the period of the Union there were in Dublin 13 master manufacturers, having 109 looms, which gave employment, between weavers, spinners, dyers, helpers, &c., to 720 individuals."

They go on to say that the result of this unrestricted reciprocity with England, this commercial union with England, had effected the trade so much that it could hardly be said to exist at all. That was many years ago, and to-day it does not exist at all. In regard to the stuff and serge manufacture, they say:

"We find that at the period of the Union there were in Dublin 25 master manufacturers, having 1,120 looms, which gave employment to an equal number of weavers, and about 370 additional operatives, being 1,491 persons. At present there is but one master manufacturer of this article in Dublin."

That is, at the time these reports were printed. Then they say:

"Another branch of the woollen trade was the flannel manufacture, the principal seat of which lay in the county of Wicklow; and it flourished to such an extent as to induce the Earl of Fitzwilliam to erect at a cost of £3,500, an extensive market place in the town of Rathdrum, which he called Flannel Hall, solely for the exhibition and sale of this article. There were 12 fairs held annually at Rathdrum, and the average number of pieces exhibited at each fair was from 1,000 to 1,100 pieces. This manufacture gave employment to at least 1,000 looms, and, allowing for preparatory processes, many thousand persons. In some years after the Union, the manufacture began rapidly to decline. It was ascertained that in 1823 there were only 400 looms at work, 300 in 1833, 200 in 1827, 150 in 1823, and 100 in 1830. In this latter year (1830) The Flannel Hall was closed, and in 1832 only 30 looms could be counted, and in two years afterwards there was not a vestige of this formerly important and remunerative branch of industry. The flannel manufacture also gave employment to a class called 'finishers.'"

And they were wiped out as well as the rest. I may quote to you from Cork and its vicinity to show that there were 41 employers in the year 1800, engaging 457 looms, and, allowing for operatives of various classes, the number of persons deriving wages was at least 2,500 in the city of Cork. "In 1834, there were only two master manufacturers left who were employing 256 persons. The trade is now completely gone. The extensive factory of Mr. Lyons is converted into a bleaching green," as the result of this commercial union.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is what Nova Scotia says.

Mr. CURRAN. We will see what this book says as to unrestricted reciprocity, and we may hope that Canada will guard against the same thing. To go on to Limerick, it says:

"About 40 years ago there were in Limerick more than 1,000 woollen weavers, who were in constant employment, and in the enjoyment of comfort and independence. At present there are not 70 weavers in the city, and even these are scarcely able to provide a scanty subsistence."

In regard to Bandon, it says:

"This town was famed for its manufacture of camlets, cord and stuffs. The camlet trade was originally the staple of the town and neighborhood, and flourished about 50 years ago. The manufactured article was almost entirely exported to Lisbon, from whence the most remunerative returns were always made, producing over £ 00,000 a year. In 1835 a small mill for spinning woollen yarn, used in the manufacture of a fabric called Welbore, had been erected in Bandon, but the number of hands employed in it is inconsiderable, and the demand not sufficient to enable the proprietor to keep the concern regularly at work. The village of Enniskean, about 7 miles west of Bandon, gave employment at one time to several combers; at present there is not one in the place. In fact the only branch of the woollen trade in existence in this district is that of freize for the country people."

The whole of the great industry, the finer work which gave employment to the skilled hands, had entirely disappeared at the time of these reports. In Kilkenny:

"At the period of the Union, there were no less than 16 manufacturers, principally engaged in the manufacture of blankets, for which fabric Kilkenny gained an unrivalled character. These employed among them all 333 looms, and in the various processes of the woollen manufacture there could not have been less than 3,000 altogether employed. At present there are not more than 100 employed. In 1800 there were 40 of the looms engaged in making superfine blankets, then technically called 'twelve-quarter blankets.' But such was the effect of the Union that in three years afterwards everyone was thrown idle, and has since remained so. According to the returns appended to the Revenue Commissioners' report above referred to, there was in Kilkenny in 1822 twelve master manufacturers, employing among them 925 persons. The merino factory produced superfine cloths, which sold so high as from 26s. to 34s. per yard. The value of cloths made at this factory has reached £40,000 in one year."

These were the industries which were to be more progressive and more prosperous under the Union with England.

"Carrick-on-Suir was famous from an early period for its ratteens and freizes, having largely experienced the bounty of Parliament up to 1793 or 1797, in nurturing these manufactures. Even the finer descriptions of cloth were made here with a success."

He goes on to give the same tale of woe with regard to that industry as with regard to all the others. He says:

"However, immediately after the Union, advantage was taken of a want of a domestic legislature, and influence was put to work whereby the standing order for obliging the military on the Irish establishments to be clothed here, was not only evaded, but in a short time totally rescinded, and supply thrown open to the competition of overpowering British capital and machinery. Mr. Moore retired; his successor followed his example, and from 400 to 600 persons were by that step immediately thrown out of bread. Henceforth the manufactures of Carrick presented but a sickly and faded existence. The amount of capital then invested exceeded £50,000; at present there are but 100 persons partially employed, and the wool-combing business has already altogether disappeared."

In Roscrea, they were exactly in the same condition:

"About 1800 the manufacturers became centred in the hands of a few master manufacturers, and one of them employed beyond 600 persons, about three or four hundred more may have been engaged by others. This trade continued to flourish till the period of the peace, and soon after 1815 began to decline."

And so it goes on. Mr. Crotty, was examined before the Assistant Inquiry Commissioners in 1834, and he gave the following testimony:

"Six years ago 1,000 persons, of whom 600 or 700 were females, were employed by me in Roscrea or its immediate neighborhood. The females spun the worsted, and the men combed and wove the wool; the latter earned 1s. 8d. a day at combing and about 1s. 1d. a day at weaving; the women could not make more than 1s. d. a day; but even this small sum being well applied, and for the most part to their own clothing, had a marked effect upon their appearance in general; all are completely destitute and the husbands are wandering about looking for work."

That has been the effect of unrestricted reciprocity with a great market and a rich country, in so far as the woollen industries are concerned. The cotton manufacture in Dublin is exactly in the same condition. We find that the same results have happened with regard to this great industry in Ireland, from the effects of unrestricted reciprocity. The condition of the cotton manufactures in Dublin at the time of the Union was as follows:—

"There were fifty-five master manufacturers engaged in the fabrics of cords, calicoes, checks, shawls, fastians, muslins, dimities, &c., and several of them also combined the business of spinning."

"There were from 40 to 50 minor manufacturers, keeping from five to ten looms going, as undertakers for the larger manufacturers. The total number of looms kept in work by the foregoing are computed upon the most accurate account, to have been 8,000, and the number of operatives to whom they gave bread in the various processes, was upwards of 14,000."

Now, these people were all wiped out. In calico printing the same result took place, and I want to point out particularly to hon. gentlemen here what the direct result of it was, and what the direct result would be here with regard to certain manufactures. What happened with regard to calico printing? The calico printing was an important industry. They tell us:

"This particular branch has been carried on to a great perfection, so much so that the Irish prints have often commanded a preference in the London market."

And yet he says:

"It is a humiliating reflection that these very choice prints must be represented as London prints to secure a sale with the better classes, nay more. Within the last four or five years our printed calicos have been extensively exported to the American market, and put up in boxes, and labelled in imitation French packages, and then sold as French goods."

That was the effect of unrestricted reciprocity with this great and prosperous country, that was overflowing with capital; the effect was that these people actually had to put false labels upon their goods; they could not label their goods as their own, and in order to get rid of the little remnants that were left, they had to sell them almost under false pretences. In Bandon, the same thing took place in regards to cotton prints. There were 2,800 cotton weavers engaged in the manufacture of the various branches. In Belfast the cotton trade is entirely wiped out. In 1799:

"There were 2,000 calico looms at Balbriggan at full work, making calicos for printing. There were also from 400 to 500 cord looms in that town, and the adjoining parishes of Ardeath, Clonaboy, and Garristown. There were several eminent manufacturers here. Now there are only 226 looms employed in Balbriggan, and the average earnings for each does not exceed 6 shillings per week."

That was the result at the time this book was published. They had been reduced down to that extremity, and now I am told they have disappeared. Now what took place in the silk manufacture, an industry that was carried to the highest perfection? The tales given here with regard to that industry are appalling, and ought to cause serious reflections to those hon. gentlemen who are advocating unrestricted reciprocity with Canada. By a report made at the time it appears that in 1775 the artisans of the various classes employed numbered 5,840.

"In some years afterwards, the trade suffered a very considerable depression, which arose chiefly from the general use of muslins; but it was afterwards revived and the imports of raw silk nearly doubled. At the time of the Union, after various fluctuations, we find its condition to have been as follows:—

"There are 72 master manufacturers, engaged in various fabrics of broad silk, tabbinets, velvets, silk waistcoatings, handkerchiefs, crapes, persians, lining silks, modes, sarsenets, &c., and ribbons. The custom was to give out the materials to the weavers, who wove it in their own residences, the members of their family assisting in the preparatory operations. Besides the foregoing employers, there were innumerable minor undertakers, then termed "Chamber Masters," having from two to six or eight looms, and among the entire there could not have been less than 2,500 broad looms. In the ribbon line there were from 800 to 900 single hand looms, and 200 engine looms. In the ribbon branch there were at least 1,500 people employed; in the broad silk line, at least 5,000. In both not less than 6,500 persons were employed. The fourth report of the Irish Revenue Commissioners, state the number of looms in 1833 at 1,500, and the number employed from 3,000 to 4,000. In 1834, by an accurate account taken, the numbers were found to have fallen to 537. In 1838, by the report on hand-loom weavers, they are stated at 400, viz., 310 on broad silk, 280 on tabbinets and tabbereas, 30 on velvets and 32 on ribbons. At the present day the whole number of broad looms in actual work is 250, viz., about 170 on tabbinets, and the residue on velvet, waistcoatings and serges, together with ten or a dozen ribbon looms. There were besides, within the year subsequent to the Union, seven proprietors who carried on the business of silk throwing, and who gave employment to 230 females, earning from 2s. to 7s. per week. Some years ago, large capital was expended in establishing silk throwing mills in the Liberty, with improved machinery. Within the last six years, they employed upwards of 200 females. The mills are now silent."

In the hosiery the same result took place, and we have now at the end of this report the remarks made by the great statesman to whom these reports were dedicated. He says:

"Political economists have been much puzzled to fix upon tangible reasons for the wide-spread miseries of Ireland. At one time they will have it that Ireland is not suited for manufactures and can prosper only as an agricultural country; at another, that her miseries and failures are owing to her turbulent spirit, and the insecurity for life and property consequent thereon; at another, all mischiefs must be owing to excessive population. Then, again the religion of the people is arraigned as the sole cause of their poverty—with a thousand other equally wild and fallacious theories; while almost universal Ireland proclaims that all her woes and miseries are owing to the hateful union which took away her resident nobility and gentry, deprived her of the countenance and care of a Domestic Legislature, and subjected her to every species of impoverishment and neglect. One of the most fatal effects of that measure upon our trade and manufactures has been the premature withdrawal of the protecting duties; whereby Ireland, emaciated by the drain of her resources for four-and-twenty years, was suddenly left open to a fruitless competition against the overwhelming capital and influence of England."

That is the conclusion of this report which, I think, must have produced an effect upon the minds of every hon. gentleman here. But let us find what was the effect upon the people? How did the people fare when the bloated manufacturers were disposed of? The people had, no doubt, been told that the farming interests of the country were suffering, that there was a lot of bloated manufacturers and monopolists living upon the vitals of the people of Ireland, and, if these were swept away, the people would prosper, that their misfortunes would disappear, that great wealth would tumble into their lap, and that the agriculturists of Ireland, and all those who were not interested in those protected industries, would be benefited by the change. We have a report stating the result of this change of policy. In the report of the Sick and Indigent Roomkeepers for that year, we find the following appalling statements:

"The mass of human misery which fell under the province of this charity to relieve, has been unparalleled. In the year 1826, 6,497 families, containing 24,262 persons, have been relieved; hundreds were on the eve of perishing from actual starvation, and the dreadful weight of fever and other malignant disorders, the consequence of the poverty and want which arose principally from a general stagnation of trade and want of employment in various branches of manufacture, particularly the woollen, cotton and silk, in that part of the city called the Liberty. It is impossible to describe the appalling state of privation in which these poor artificers were found by the inspectors.

"The committee were reluctantly obliged to lay aside innumerable cases of distress, which were entirely out of their power to relieve, and early in the spring vast numbers of the artificers in the branches of trade above alluded to, were seen in the streets in the deepest state of despondency. Their appearance exhibited evident proofs of poverty and starvation."

Another report says:

"Even the employers themselves felt the depression; and many were involved in the common ruin—they could hold out no longer. The Roomkeepers' Charity was at last obliged to be resorted to, and applications were numerous from persons who had heretofore been in very comfortable circumstances."

Another report says:

"There have been local causes of distress which operated to increase our numbers considerably, pressing with peculiar severity in 1825 and the immediately following years. About this time a very serious, and in its progress at least, a very distressing change was taking place in many important manufactures in the city. These manufactures had given employment to multitudes in Dublin, and although many families have emigrated to England to obtain work, yet they have left behind them multitudes, more particularly females, deprived of their usual mode of employment."

"It is not for this committee to follow these manufactures through their different gradations, as they fluctuated, or as they declined; this committee has simply to put forward facts and it does so when it states, that of forty-five establishments that had been engaged in the woollen manufacture (in 1821), all, with the exception of twelve houses, and their dependencies of human labor, had ceased to exist; and that in the summer of 1829, of what little that remained of those who derived their maintenance from these manufactures—3,289 persons in the silk trade, 1,969 of the cotton trade, and 1,193 of the woollen trade, making altogether 6,451 persons,—were all out of employment, and in the extreme state of destitution."

We have it upon the authority of these reports that there were employed in those various manufactures at the time when the people were sought to be induced to change their fiscal policy along with their political status, not less than 150,000 people who were directly making their living and acquiring a competency out of the manufactures of the country. But, as I said a moment ago, the people of the country at large have been told that if the present state of things were changed the people would have the wealth distributed among them, and the agricultural classes would benefit largely by the change. Now, what was the result in Ireland? I find it was described as follows:

"The number of agricultural laborers in Ireland is computed by the Poor Law Commissioners, at 1,170,000, and they assumed that one half of these, being 585,000, are out of employment for thirty weeks in the year; and as these have 1,800,000 dependent on them, the two numbers make 2,385,000 persons to be provided for thirty weeks in the year.

I do not wish to read at greater length the reports upon this point; but we have in this volume evidence that must convince every man who has the slightest regard for the experience of history, and when we hear the tale of woe it should be one of warning to the people of Canada when they are told that the only thing they have to do is to go into commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity with our great neighbor alongside of us. The industries of Ireland and everything connected with Irish prosperity was engulfed in the prosperity of the larger nations; and are we to be told after the experience of the past, after what we have seen in this country, when Canada was made a slaughter market for surplus stocks of manufactured goods on the other side of the line—are we to be told, does it require any one to tell the people what would again be the result if our markets were thrown open? Why, the result would be what it was formerly only in a more acute degree. It may be said that that misery which came upon the people of Ireland could never prevail in this Canada of ours. But such a statement cannot be made in my presence; I have seen what can result. I have seen in Montreal with my own eyes strong men and willing men, with good stout hearts, who were willing and desirous of earning their living, obliged to go to the soup kitchen and there ask for that charity which they were obliged to accept to their humiliation. We have seen men who have been earning previous to the advent into power of hon. gentlemen opposite, as has been stated on public platforms by workingmen in Montreal, over and over again, men earning $2 and $2.50 a day, and what was left open to them? To earn 60 cents or 70 cents a day, digging in public works around the canal basin, endeavoring to earn a miserable subsistence. Some of these were workingmen who had organised before that time and had held mass meetings to establish hours of labor, men who previous to the downfall of the Government led by the present Premier had stated that workingmen must work only eight or nine hours a day, and yet afterwards when hon. gentlemen opposite had assumed the reins of power and the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) directed the fiscal policy of the country, these workingmen were going about saying: "For God's sake give us work for any number of hours either day or night in order to save our wives, children and ourselves from starvation." That was the result. It is all very well for the hon. gentlemen opposite to tell us that the question of unrestricted reciprocity has sunk down deep in the hearts of the people. But I can tell the hon. gentlemen opposite that so long as the mover of this resolution is in public life never again will the people accept from him the fiscal gospel that is to lead them to salvation. And now that we have heard from one hon. gentleman opposite and from another, what has been the burden of the song? Has it been one of hope, of aspiration? Why, no. It has been a wail, and that wail has been echoed and re-echoed from one mouth to another all along their line until finally the people of this country, listening to their wail, have grown weary. We have been told, and told with a great deal of force, all that our country offers to us in the future. We have been told by the hon. gentlemen opposite, in the course of the most elaborate speeches, that great benefits would accrue to us from the union with our neighbors; but their preaching is entirely at variance with what they say their practice will be. We know that we have a great country. We know that the advantages of this country have not been by any means overdrawn by the beautiful pictures that have been presented to us by the various speakers during this debate. We know very well the hon. gentlemen opposite cannot take from the hearts of the Canadian people the hope that is in them that this country is going to be great and prosperous. We know that we have to-day as good a country to live in, as fair a country to live in, as any people on the face of the earth. We feel that to-day we are in the golden age. Whatever changes may come, whatever changes time may bring, there is one thing perfectly certain: it is that we can never be freer, never be happier, never be better off than we are to-day. It is needless to enter into any lengthy observations with respect to this country. We admit its wealth not only above the soil in its great fertility, not only on the soil in its magnificent returns as to husbandry, and not only beneath the soil in mines and minerals. We have hope for our country, and we have great aspirations for its future. We do not mind what may be the political grievances of those who have various political views; our desire is to remain as long as we can as we are. The position that we now occupy may be too beautiful to last, but at all events as long as we can make it last we shall make it last. It is not our desire to destroy the good feeling which exists between us and the people on the other side of the line. We feel that we have a destiny of our own; we feel that when we shall have passed from our present position that we shall pass under other conditions to a position among nations and as a part of a great Empire. We feel that Canada is our home and that all our interests are centred here. We do not desire to have the arguments prevail which have been set before us by the other side, but we mean this and simply this, that we shall not sell our birthright for a mess of pottage. We are not, Mr. Speaker, to be lured away by the fact that we are to sacrifice all our hopes and aspirations for a change in the tariff of wheat. No, gentlemen, we have a higher and a nobler prospect for this country and for ourselves. We feel in this country that we have:

"Here in Canadian heart and home and name
This name which yet shall grow
Till all the nations know
Us for a patriot people,
Loyal to our native earth,
Our own Canadian land,"

Mr. WELSH. Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the very able speeches which have been made on this question from the opposite side of the House and from this side of the House too, and I begin to feel very nervous in rising to make a speech. We have had a great deal of professional talent and we have a great deal of professorial talent as well, so that you will hardly expect me to occupy the time of the House for a very long time. I wish just to touch on a few points and leave the remainder of the argument for somebody else. Reciprocity has been a part of my political faith for the last 40 years and as I grow older my opinions grow stronger in favor of reciprocity, in favor of free trade, if possible; but if free trade is out of the question I will go for reciprocity. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think this reciprocity treaty might have been carried eight years ago, but I think there have been obstacles thrown in the way as has been shown by the gentlemen on the other side of the House to obtaining reciprocity. That is to say we have a large national debt. Eight years ago we had a revenue of some $18,000,000 and an expenditure of about the same amount. In Canada to-day we have an expenditure of $36,000,000 and a revenue of about the same. I want to say that this National Policy was introduced in this House not fairly and squarely as protection, but it was introduced as a readjustment tariff. Hon. gentlemen who are supporters of the present Government stated positively before the country that there was no idea of placing protection on the country, but that it was simply a readjustment of the tariff and that it was done for the purpose of obtaining reciprocity. I remember well when the hon. the Finance Minister speaking at Charlottetown, P.E.I., declared to the people: "Gentlemen of Charlottetown, if you want reciprocity support us in the National Policy for two years and I will guarantee you reciprocity then." Eight years have passed over our heads since that time and what is the prospect now? There is no more prospect; indeed not as much of obtaining reciprocity now than there was then. I would rather this discussion on reciprocity had been cut off altogether at present or that it had taken place after the discussion on the fishery negotiations. The hon. the Minister of Finance has been at Washington, and perhaps, he has opened the door to our obtaining our wants. It appears that the commissioners have removed certain irritable matters connected with the fishery negotiations and in my belief it is a very opportune time for the people of Canada to let the people of the United States know what our views are. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will just read a letter here to show that what I say is true. Here is a correspondence between the right hon. the leader of the Government and Mr. Boyd:

"Right Hon. Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

"The Government press here state that you propose to raise the tariff generally to 35 per cent. Can I contradict this?"

"JOHN BOYD."

This reply came promptly this morning as follows:—

"TORONTO, 19th July.

"To JOHN BOYD, St. John.

"It is an absurd falsehood; neither at London nor elsewhere have I gone beyond my motion in Parliament, and have never proposed an increase, but only a readjustment of tariff."

"JOHN A. MACDONALD."

Now, I am in favor of the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and I believe we can obtain reciprocity now. The only objection to reciprocity appears from the other side. They say: "We are willing to have reciprocity, only do not touch the National Policy." I have listened to every speech delivered from the other side of the House, and the whole cry is: "Don't touch the National Policy." That National Policy was put on the country not for the purpose of raising money for revenue, but merely for the purpose of readjusting the tariff and of compelling the Americans to give us reciprocity. Well, I do not think the other side of the House have carried through their policy. Now, I will make some remarks on the speeches I have heard from the other side of the House and let me say that I think my friend the Minister of the Interior made a very moderate speech from his standpoint. He said in one place that the prices assimilate very much between the United States and Canada, quoting I think as proof of this from the Toronto and Buffalo markets. I do not suppose he was far out of the way in the statement he made there and I am not going to object to it. I am going to come to that by-and-bye when I allude to the speech made by the hon. the Minister of Marine. It is said there is only one step between the sublime and the ridiculous, and when I listened to my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) yesterday I found that he pitched a tune here and that tune was "God save the Queen." If there is any gentleman in this House who can pitch the tune any better than he has done, we should all join in on both sides of the House and sing it well. But is that the question? It calls to my mind a thing that happened in my experience. I was once Commodore of a Regatta Club. We had a regatta in the harbor and the first day was for sailing boats and the second day for rowing boats. The band on the cutter struck up the music before we started on the regatta. I had an eight-oar gig and I had to get up a crew for hard practice in order to win the race. I knew a Bostonian who had been for many years the stroke oar of the crew, and when the band on board one of the yachts struck up "Rule Britannia," I was quite surprised that this man fainted. I said: "What is the matter, Peter?" And he said: "I am very faint." I said:

Mr. WELSH.

"What made you faint?" "Well, sir," says he, "the last time I heard that tune of 'Rule Britannia' I will tell you where it was. It was out in Van Dieman's Land and I went on shore in a boat to the convict's settlement. I saw six convicts chained to a wheelbarrow wheeling dirt up a plank and singing 'Rule Britannia.'" I claim to be just as loyal as any man in this House, but if you bring the farmers and fishermen of this Dominion to wheel dirt up a plank, you cannot expect them to whistle "Rule Britannia." I am not going to be very positive in any of my statements, and if any of them are not correct I hope hon. gentlemen opposite will correct me at once. Now, I say that 75 per cent. of our population are engaged in agriculture and fishing. How many are engaged in manufactures,—in those home industries hon. gentlemen talk so much about? Are there more, on the average, than ten in every hundred? Well, if we have to bear the heavy burdens of protection for those ten men, the ninety have to pay the cost. More than that, if we could get the proposed reciprocity arrangement with the United States, those ten men engaged in industrial pursuits would profit more than they have ever profited yet, because now they must manufacture only goods enough to supply the home demand, but under reciprocity they would have larger markets and larger scope for their energies; and I for one feel that the manufacturers of this Dominion are of that Anglo-Saxon race who are able to compete with the world, if you only give them a chance. But while you are protecting them, as you say, I believe you are doing them an injury. My hon. friend from Halifax said the other day that the principal cotton manufacturer in New Brunswick is anxious to have this resolution carried through, so that he may be able to extend his business. Now, the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Brown) last night, gave us one of the strongest proofs of our need of freer commercial intercourse with the United States, that have been given on the floor of this House. I have always understood that our blue books were intended to be quoted from, and were accepted as authorities by hon. gentlemen opposite. But what did we see last night? We saw the hon. member for Hamilton get up and ridicule the use of these blue-books on the floor of this House, and where did he go to get the information to contradict one of our own blue-books? He had to go to the United States. I compliment my hon. friend on proving our case. As to the hon. member for Montreal East (Mr. Curran), I tell you I was astonished. God bless my soul, if you want any man in the world to advocate our cause in this House, he is the very man who has done it. He says the union of Ireland with England has ruined the country, and the union of Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia and New Brunswick with Canada has ruined us all. Allow me to warn the Government that if they want to bring Newfoundland into Confederation, they should keep the hon. member for Montreal Centre out of the way. If you do not, they will be sold; and if there is a warning for the people of Newfoundland on the face of the earth, they got it to-day in my hon. friend's speech. Gentlemen, these are facts, and it is for you to say whether they are true or not. I state to hon. gentlemen on that side of the House that if I say anything they do not agree with, let them say no, because if they do not say no, I will say they all agree with me, everyone of them. Now, some time ago my hon. friend for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) spoke in this House about these duties, and here is the statement he made:

"You have upwards of 40,000 carpenters upon whose tools, food and clothing, you propose to lay a duty of at least 20 per cent.; what compensation have you given them? Their wives and children, for whom they must provide, number 160,000; how are you helping them? It is not in your power to give them any help. To them your policy is worse than the policy of the 'fly on the wheel.' You can do nothing for them. You are doing much that is to their detriment. Let us see, Sir, what the Finance Minister does for the blacksmiths of Canada. In 1871 there were 15,694. Now there cannot be less than 20,000. They represent a population of 100,000 souls. What have you done for these people? You have taxed their tools 30 per cent.; you have taxed their steel 10 per cent.; you have taxed their iron 17½ per cent.; you have taxed their horse-shoe nails 30 per cent.; you have taxed their coal 50 cents per ton; you have taxed their bread and meat; everything they wear; you have taxed all they use to make their houses decent and their families comfortable. There is not one of them whose burdens will not be increased by at least fifty dollars a year." And this is his closing argument:

"This is a tariff to make a very few rich and a great many poor."

Now, I was always opposed to the National Policy, and I oppose it still. We hear a great deal on that side of the House about the difficulties of getting commercial reciprocity, and the injury it will do to the National Policy. The amendment proposed by my hon. friend the Minister of Marine, just says: "Anything you like, only don't touch the National Policy."

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. WELSH. I think so. Now, the hon. Minister of Marine speaks with mathematical precision; and I do not think the hon. gentleman had any trouble in crossing the pons asinorum. But let me tell that hon. gentleman that there are a good many asses' bridges that he has not crossed—bridges in marine's strategy, if not in farm strategy. What does the hon. gentleman say? He said that he visited Prince Edward Island last summer; he paid it a night visit, as I understand—and if I am not correct in what I state, I hope the hon. gentleman will contradict me. He visited the Island about seven o'clock in the evening and left in the morning. I do not know why he went to Prince Edward Island, but he seemed to have found out something during his visit, for he referred, in his speech, several times to Prince Edward Island. He found out that we had a savings bank, and that we had $2,000,000 deposited in it. I do not know why he came to the Island, and why he should have visited it at night. I wonder if he had any design on that money. I do not know what else he came for, but the hon. gentleman will explain in due course, I have no doubt. As a sign of the prosperity of the Island, he quoted the amount we had in the savings bank. Did he tell you, Sir, who the depositors were? No, he did not; but, at all events, I will say this, that any one who points to money lying idle in a savings bank as a sign of the commercial prosperity and activity of the country, does not know what he is talking about. It is not a sign of commercial prosperity that a large amount of money should be lying idle, but it is a sign of commercial activity and progress when money is in active circulation and bearing a fair interest. Let us take up some of the statements of the hon. gentleman and see whether they will hold water; let us see whether they will bear out the mathematical precision with which the hon. gentleman sought to invest them. He found out something else during his short visit to our Island. And what do you think it was? Oh! he said, the Canadians are still marrying and giving in marriage; we hope for better times, there is some chance for them yet. "Coming events cast their shadows before."

Mr. FOSTER. In your case they have not cast any shadow yet.

Mr. WELSH. When the hon. gentleman has consummated that alliance, of which he has given us a hint, it will take some of the mathematical precision out of him. He also spoke about the farmers, and the rapid rise of values in land, and he contended that if we had commercial reciprocity the value of land in the Island would not improve. Were the hon. gentleman a school-master, and were he to tell that to a lot of school boys, they would chase him out of school. The idea that reciprocity would not improve the value of our lands is too absurd to be seriously entertained for a moment. It would improve them, I say, probably 300 per cent. And my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior also gave us his views on this question, and I will deal with both those hon. gentleman together. They told us that the farmers in this country were well off, and that the farmers in Prince Edward Island in particular were making fortunes. I will give my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior 100 acres of the choicest land in the Island, and I will call it the Interior farm. I will give the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries 100 acres of the best land alongside it, and call it the Marine farm. And a little way off, with a wall between, I will take 100 acres myself and call it the Reciprocity farm. Now, I am going to state what is the truth, and I am sorry to have to say it; but if those hon. gentlemen, who talk so glibly about the prosperity of our farmers, had to work their lands and support their families, even if they had the finest crops, and obtained the highest prices that were paid last year in the island, when for their potatoes, after hauling them six or seven miles through a foot deep of mud, they could only get 18 cents, and for their oats 26 cents, they would find the reality considerably different from the picture they draw here. The hon. the Minister of Marine spoke of some statement made in this House as "atrocious blunders." Will that hon. gentleman tell me he could support a family on the produce of his farm, when he could only get 18 cents for his potatoes and 26 cents for his oats? Would he call that prosperity? While I, on my Reciprocity farm, would be getting 27 cents for my potatoes and 45 to 50 cents for my oats. This is what reciprocity means in the Island. The hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries may have crossed the pons asinorum in college, but he certainly has not crossed it in farming. He has a good deal to learn in that line yet. I speak a little warmly on this subject, but I am a farmer myself, representing a population of 55,000 people, most of whom are engaged in agriculture, and I must say that those 55,000 will compare favorably with any 55,000 people on the face of God's earth. I would be negligent to my duty, I would be ashamed to hold up my head in this House, if I were to sit silent here and not give utterance to my sentiment. What is the reason that six members from Prince Edward Island are sent to this House opposed to the Government? What argument can be stronger than is afforded by their presence here? I tell hon. gentlemen opposite that, so far as Prince Edward Island is concerned, we must have reciprocity, or the people will become impoverished. The hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) made the statement, that while previous to 1878 the people of the Dominion could not get employment, now every man in the Dominion is employed. I said "no," and the hon. gentleman hedged himself by referring back to Montreal, his own constituency. He ought to have apologised for the statement he made with reference to Prince Edward Island, but he did not. He hedged himself back, and I am glad he got into his own shell. I am now speaking for the people I represent, and in that respect we are on an equal footing. I do hope that things will come right. My hon. friend took up another important point. The farmers he said went away in the winter to earn money for their families, and came back on their farms in the spring. I pity the farm, when the farmer has to leave it; when he has to leave his wife and children, his cattle, his oxen and his sheep; what is to become of them in his absence? I suppose they are to live during the winter like the bears, by sucking their paws. My hon. friend must know that no man can farm on that system, and if he has found out instances of that kind, he has discovered more marvellous things than I ever could find in Prince Edward Island. I know of no farmers on the Island who leave their farms in the fall to work abroad all winter and come back in the spring, and therefore I can refute that statement as far as my knowledge goes. The Minister of Marine said, in that speech to which I have referred:

"The other section of the people went away because they wished to earn ready money, they went into the industrial centres in order to earn it. They found no industrial centres in Prince Edward Island. If after the farming season had passed, and they wanted to earn something for the crowded family, the quickest way they could find to earn it was to take boat and rail and go down to the manufacturing towns of Maine, to the manufacturing towns of New England, and earn their wages during the winter, coming back in the summer to work upon their farms."

Now I hope the hon. gentleman will look over that and consider it. Now, I am going to come to another little matter, and we will have a little talk about that. Here is something of the marvellous kind. The hon. gentleman goes on and says:

"Sir, in the former time ships went to the country for raw sugar. The raw product was taken to Great Britain, and British ships took the freights upon it. That sugar was carried on British railways to British refineries, and British railways had their profits. British workmen worked up the sugar, and the wages were paid to British people."

What sympathy was there for England there?

"Then it was put in cars and steamships and sent to St. John, Halifax or Montreal with the maximum of cost; and that, Sir, went into the figures upon which the total imports were based. That was the case with 95 per cent., if I mistake not, of the sugar consumed here. To-day of the whole sugar consumed in this country 96 per cent., if I mistake not, comes raw from the places where it is grown; it is brought into our own country, it is carried upon our own railways, worked up in our own refineries, and all the added cost put upon it goes into the pockets of our own people."

Cheer now. Cheer, boys, cheer. Here is the statement of the Minister of Marine, who says that all this goes into the pockets of our own people. I will show where it goes—

"That, of course, makes a vast difference. So it is with the cotton trade and the woollen trade."

And so he goes on.

"Well, Sir, there is another question that is necessary to be put: If our trade is decreasing, how do you explain this fact? In 1875 the total registered tonnage entering into and out of the ports of this country, excluding coasting vessels always, was 9,537,000 tons, in 1876 it was 9,911,000 tons, in 1887 it was a little more than 14,000,000 tons. Did the vessels come in simply for pleasure; were they simply beating about upon the wild and yeasty waves?"

By-the-bye, that puts me in mind of something. During his visit to the Provinces, I believe the Minister of Marine found the waves very yeasty. I am told that he found the waves so yeasty that he did not stay there very long. I am told that he threw up everything except his pay, he was so disgusted with the yeasty waves. That may be so or it may not be, but at all events he did not stop there long. He says:

"Did the vessels come in simply for pleasure; were they simply beating about upon the wild and yeasty waves, making port now and then for the purpose of getting entered and cleared; or were they here on business and to carry on the commerce of the country? The latter evidently."

I say it is a most extraordinary thing and I apply to every hon. gentleman on that side of the House as well as on this side that we should have more tonnage now than we had five years ago when our imports and exports are decreasing. How does that tonnage become manipulated in this manner? Will the hon. gentleman have the candour to explain that in the right manner? I think I have the right clue to this. A steamer goes from Montreal to New Brunswick, she is entered at the port in New Brunswick, she goes to Nova Scotia and she is entered there, she goes to Prince Edward Island and she is entered there, and so on, so that one ship is made to represent half a dozen. Why does not the hon. gentleman get up in a candid, honest manner and explain these things? Why should he leave these matters open to have them explained in this fashion? I know that I have had to send vessels of my own three different ports within a few miles of each other, and they are entered in each of these ports, and they may be entered in half a dozen ports in a year, and thus this increased tonnage would appear. It is impossible that we can employ increased tonnage when our exports and imports are decreasing. Now, what about this sugar, the price for which goes into the pockets of the people? Before I touch on that, however, I want to refer to a paper, the Prince Edward Island Agriculturist, of Summerside, of the 12th March, which gives a summary of the prices in the markets of Prince Edward Island, as follows: White oats, 28 cents a bushel; black oats, 27 cents a bushel; early rose potatoes and shenangoes, 20 cents a bushel, and so on. Now, there is no man who would dare to challenge that statement in regard to the prices of produce in Prince Edward Island. Now, we will come to the matter of sugar. I find by the returns that there were 200,466,000 lbs. imported into this Dominion last year for home consumption, at a cost of $486,062, which would be equal to about 2½ cents a lb. I find that the duty amounted to $316,752, or nearly 1½ cts. a lb. There is a little over 4 cents a pound on the sugar landed here duty paid. That sugar is sold for about 7 cents, I think, in Canada. Where do the other 3 cents go? Will any hon. gentleman tell me? My hon. friend the Minister of Marine says it goes into the pockets of the people. I tell him that it comes out of their pocket. Can any one deny it? I have bought sugar in England, good brown sugar, not refined, for 2 cents a pound.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. WELSH. Who says "no?"

An hon. MEMBER. Echo.

Mr. WELSH. I would be very sorry to make a statement in this House that would not dare contradiction. I say that you can buy refined sugar in Glasgow for 4 cents a pound. What did they do in Montreal when these combines put up the price last summer? They sent to Scotland and brought out the sugar and paid the high duty on refined sugar and undersold the combines, and yet we find a gentleman of his high position in this House to-day telling the five millions of people in this country that that money goes into the pockets of the people of this Dominion. I say no, it comes out of their pockets, and I hope I have convinced the hon. gentleman that the people of Prince Edward Island are laboring under great disadvantages. They are not in a state of rebellion, it is true, but, if they were treated in the manner in which that hon. gentleman treats them for long, they would give you more trouble than the North-West does. I may compliment some of the members of the Government and especially the Minister of Public Works, with whom I have had a great deal to do since I have been on the floor of this House, and I may say that I have been treated by him in the most courteous, honorable and gentlemanly manner, and I believe he would stretch a point if necessary to benefit the people. If the other members of the Government would do the same, it would be better for them. When a man comes here representing the people, and places their wants before the Government, I like to see the members of the Government treat him with respect and consideration, and look into the wants of the people, and try to redress their grievances. But, Mr. Speaker, these high and mighty men that we have in the departments keep us dancing at their heels, or waiting in the ante-room, and we can get no satisfaction out of them. I must say that I for one, will not give them a chance of doing it again if I can help it. Well, now I come to the Marine Department, and there is a lot I want to say about that.

Mr. MITCHELL. Let him down easily.

Mr. WELSH. My hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Tupper) to-day made a shout about our shipping. Well, there is a most extraordinary thing. The United States have protected their shipping until it was almost nowhere. They were the second flag in the world, and since they adopted a policy of protection their ships are almost wiped off the sea. What is the result of our National Policy to our shipping interests? Our marine interest, I think, is second to none in this country, but since the National Policy has been in operation, our shipping has fallen off to the amount of 6 million dollars. The earning power of 6 million dollars has been lost since that policy was introduced. I believe this to be a fact, and as no hon. gentlemen contradicts me, it must be allowed to be a fact. But the Minister of Marine and Fisheries made no effort to assist us. The Government of this country, while protecting every other industry in the country, are neglecting the marine industry. We are handicapped in various ways. Where do those ships that we have left, find employment? Will the Minister of Marine or any hon. gentleman on that side answer me—where do the ships that we have now get employment? Seven out of ten get employment in the United States.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. WELSH. I say, yes. Who is it that denies it? I will take his name down. Now what do we see on the Intercolonial Railway, that great national highway. That railway has got more work than it can perform, and it appears that the more work it has, the more money it loses. It is a most extraordinary thing. I think there must be some lack in that railway when, although the work is increasing, the loss also is steadily increasing. What is the loss to the taxpayers of this country on the money invested in railways? From a rough calculation that I have made it amounts to over $14,000 a day. That is the amount of money the taxpayers of this country have to pay in interest on the money invested in railway. I think if that Intercolonial Railway was left to its ordinary traffic, a fair, profitable traffic, it would pay, but they undertake to bring coal up for less than it costs, and they are running the railway at the expense of the people of this Dominion in order to ruin the shipping interests of the St. Lawrence, and to injure the laboring population of Montreal and Quebec. We have plenty of ships, and if the Government had let the ships perform this work of bringing up coal, to Quebec and Montreal—

Mr. MITCHELL. It is only the Tories who do that.

Mr. WELSH. Oh, you shut up. Now, I am going to ask my hon. friends opposite, if they lived down in Prince Edward Island how they would like to pay a duty of 15 cents on potatoes, a duty on oats and on most everything else we have to sell? If this duty was taken off don't you think that the poor man would have a little more money in his pocket and be able to support his family better? I tell you, Mr. Speaker, my heart bled last November in Prince Edward Island. I had a ship loading with potatoes for the United States. I have seen poor farmers come hauling twelve bushels of potatoes seven miles through one foot of mud, and getting only 18 cents a bushel. I thought to myself, I don't know how you support your family, I know it must be hard. And yet this glorious protection! Hurrah! We are a happy people, and all that. Rule Britannia! Yes, rule Britannia! How can you expect these people to whistle "Rule Britannia" who have such hard work to make both ends meet? I do not want to go under the flag of the United States. I am proud of being a British subject.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. WELSH. Yes, "hear, hear." But I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I have not heard any hon. gentleman on the other side of the House refute a single statement made by hon. member from South Oxford. His resolution stands there still. Now, the Minister of Marine has moved an amendment. Let me read it:

"That Canada, in the future as in the past, is desirous of cultivating and extending trade relations with the United States in so far as they may not conflict with the policy of fostering the various industries and interests of the Dominion, which was adopted in 1879, and which has since received, in so marked a manner, the sanction and approval of the people."

Now, is that not just the way every hon. gentleman on that side has spoken? National Policy and Protection. If the Americans will give us anything for nothing, we will take it; and if they will not, we won't have it. Now, I know the people I represent expect something different. I would not dare to go back to the county I represent and tell the people I had done nothing towards getting them a better market. I trust that better times will come for this Dominion; I believe better times are coming for this Dominion, and that a change is going to take place. I do not know in what way it will take place, but I believe it will come. I hoped, before this debate came on, that the Minister of Finance would have laid the fishery negotiations before the House. I have considerable faith in that hon. gentleman, and I believe he was the right man in the right place. I trust that before long a brighter era will dawn upon the people of this country. The hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Macdonald) spoke of the farmers of his district, and I think he spoke fairly and well as to the wants of the people. I have not yet heard the hon. members for Manitoba express their opinion as to what that Province requires. I do not know whether New Brunswick sends any farmer as a member of this House; if it does, I should like to hear his ideas in regard to this matter. If there is a farmer here from Nova Scotia I should like to hear from him; if there is a farmer from Cape Breton I should like to hear his ideas. I know very well my ideas on the question, and every hon. member must know that before any of us were born Prince Edward Island was known in history as the garden of British North America. We grow immense crops there, and if we had reciprocity the quantities of our root crops would be more than doubled or trebled. The value of our lands would increase; our farmers' sons would not go away to the United States and to other places but would stay at home, and there is plenty of land in the Island for three times the population we have there. How can you expect young men to stay at home when a farmer cannot give his son sufficient for his labor to provide food and clothing; but give the farmers fair prices for their produce, and their sons would have an opportunity of settling and remaining in the country. Do you think under such conditions they would want to leave? No; there is in every man's breast a feeling that if he can by any possibility make a living and prosper in his native home he will not leave it. I hope the House will give the matter fair consideration, and I hope also that the Government, who have listened to me very attentively, will consider the wants of Prince Edward Island. As I told them last year, we are suffering, we are laboring under great disadvantages, we are shut out from the world during five months of the year, our business has all to be done within a few months, and moreover our harbors, our piers and other works are not attended to in any respect whatever. In fact, we are almost totally neglected. Because Prince Edward Island sends here six members to represent her wants and grievances here is she to be coerced?

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. WELSH. The hon. member for Montreal (Mr. Curran) does not like coercion. What did we see here a short time ago? A Conservative paper in Prince Edward Island denounced the Government in stronger terms than I have denounced them, and there was good reason for it. Do not tread on the worm or it will turn. If the Government had treated that Province fairly I would not have been here, and I doubt if one of the hon. gentlemen who now occupy seats on the floor as Island representatives would have been here. I bring our wants to the notice of Parliament, to the attention of hon. members from every section of the Dominion, from British Columbia to the confines of Great Britain, and I hope they will be attended to as they ought to be. I am satisfied that if this resolution is carried and we have reciprocity, a new era of prosperity will come to the country.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. WELSH. Some hon. gentlemen say "no." How do you know? I say I hope so—I believe it. You may not believe it; I cannot answer for you, and you must answer to your own consciences for your own belief.

It being six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

UPPER OTTAWA IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew) moved second reading of Bill (No. 20) relating to the Upper Ottawa Improvement Company.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I promised an hon. member who desired to oppose this Bill that it would not be taken up this evening, and I therefore hope it will be taken up at another time.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). It must be taken into consideration that if other Bills are read the second time to-night they will take precedence before this Bill in the committee.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do not be alarmed, the Session will not be very short.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. If the hon. gentleman forces us to go on with the Bill we shall have to discuss it for the hour, and it will be better for him not to proceed with it. There might be an understanding arrived at that would prevent any opposition to the second reading, and I would certainly advise my hon. friend not to insist on taking the second reading now.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). Then, Mr. Speaker, I have to say that if the Minister proposes to object to the Bill, there is no use in moving its second reading. Under those circumstances of course I am obliged to submit, and I submit with the best grace I possibly can.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think it is better, perhaps, that the Bill should stand over. I had some little experience in North Renfrew last summer—not a satisfactory experience as far as results are concerned—but, I got my experience in another way as to how public business is done and as to how elections are carried and the influences that are at work there. It has just struck me in connection with this bill, and with what people said, that it would be better let it stand. My hon. friend I had the honor to meet, but did not succeed in beating; yet I discovered that there are ways which are dark which my hon. friend understood, and that certain things were reported to me to have been exercised on certain influential men in that county which this Bill looks to me to be the outcome of. If the hon. gentleman takes up that bill I hope he will give us a little information on it. I do not want to take him by surprise, but I propose to make some little enquiries about the objects of this Bill, and about the promises made to individual members forming part of the chartered names in that Bill. I trust that the hon. member will be able to give us some satisfactory information.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew.) I trust when this Bill comes up for second reading that I shall be able to give such explanation to the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, as will satisfy him and this House that it is a perfectly proper Bill. I desire to resent the insinuation which the hon. gentleman has made regarding my conduct in the election. If there were any ways that are dark and tricks that are vain, the hon. gentleman himself knows more about them than anybody else.

Mr. MITCHELL. It may be all very fine for him to say so.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MITCHELL. You will get order.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move the adjournment.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. You cannot, you have spoken.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will any person move the adjournment.

Mr. McMULLEN. I move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. MITCHELL. I want the right hon. gentleman to understand that he cannot choke me off when he likes, and he will find that out too before the Session is over. I simply want to say in reply to the hon. member for Renfrew, (Mr. White) that I heard some remarks in connection with the intended improvement of the Ottawa River, and about things which had been guaranteed to certain gentlemen in that riding.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). Did you hear them from me?

Mr. MITCHELL. Hear them from you? You are too cunning to tell that. You know your own interest and you know how to go about it. You know the old Pontiac railroad in which you got $11,000 or $12,000 and you did not tell about that. You even denied it. However, I wish merely to give notice of this to the hon. gentleman that I may not take him by surprise.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I do not think, Sir, that the hon. gentleman could ever take me by surprise. I shall always be prepared with every measure I submit to this House to defend it if it requires defence. I certainly am ready for the hon. gentleman either here or in any other place that he chooses.

Motion withdrawn.

MERCHANTS MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Mr. CURRAN. I ask the favor of the House to resume the adjourned debate for the second reading of Bill (No. 11) An Act to empower the Merchants Marine Insurance Company of Canada to relinquish its charter and to provide for the winding up of its affairs. I believe the gentlemen who objected the other night have withdrawn their objection and are satisfied that the Bill should have a second reading.

Mr. MITCHELL. I took exception to the second reading of that Bill on the ground that another director and myself who were in the House never heard anything about it. Since that time the president of the company has written me a letter explaining that it was an oversight he had committed and explaining the nature of his Bill. I therefore withdraw the objection.

Motion agreed to; and Bill read a second time.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 32) to incorporate the Dominion Plate Glass Insurance Company.—(Mr. Holton.)

Bill (No. 42) to incorporate the Pontiac and Renfrew Railway Company.—(Mr. Bryson.)

Bill (No. 44) respecting Bonds or Branch Lines of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.—(Mr. Small.)

Bill (No. 45) respecting the Ontario and Quebec Railway Company.—(Mr. Small.)

RECIPROCITY WITH THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. COCKBURN. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that anyone on whom it devolves to answer the extraordinary speech made by the hon. member who addressed us before recess, is entitled to the fullest sympathy of both parties in this House, for there was no point on which the hon. gentleman did not touch, there was no point which touching he did not adorn, and no point which, having adorned, he had better not have left untouched. It seemed to fall in very much with the fancy of the hon. members on the opposite side of the House; it seemed to be something after their own hearts; they enjoyed it, and I am sure we also enjoyed it to some extent. It was a heterogeneous mass of statements. The hon. gentleman ensconced himself in a coat-of-mail by assuring us that unless we said "no" to every statement he made, it was intended that we should say "yes." He wandered over every point that had been taken up in the exhaustive debate which has been in progress in this House during the last five or six days. He told us—and that makes it difficult to answer any of his points—that we must not think he is always addressing us, because he is often conning the matter over to himself, or he is musing over it, or he is still on the pons asinorum over there, and unable to get off. He was able, in the midst of his lucubrations, to give advice to the hon. Minister of Marine and to forecast his future. He was able to give advice worthy of Mr. Weller with reference to widows and matrimony. He was able to view the whole Dominion from the Garden of Eden, with an adamite or pre-adamite instinct, and he considered that the whole tariff of this Dominion should be managed on the basis of pleasing Prince Edward Island. Last session we have heard a great deal of Prince Edward Island. In fact, I thought of moving a resolution, after hearing so much about Prince Edward Island, that Ontario is still a part of this Confederation, and intended to remain a part of it. He said what do you say of this policy? Why, there are six members from the Garden of Eden who are all here ready to represent it; there is not a single man from that Island sent to oppose it; and how can you men from Ontario and the far west oppose it? He might have added that there were sixteen members from Nova Scotia out of the twenty-one whose views might be heard. But my hon. friend, with a charming innocence, viewed the whole Dominion through the little eyeglass of Prince Edward Island, and seemed to consider that outside of that there was no creation. However, I must give him credit for his honesty of purpose. He stands forth, Sir, as a noble man who will not be tampered with, for when in the Garden of Eden the temptor held forth to him the promise of alliance or office, when the third party stood forth and tried to help him, he scorned the proffered aid, and I have no doubt the third party on this occasion, or the gentleman who represents the third party—for they are one, in a unity that can never be broken—was disappointed. It was a grand compliment to my hon. friend when the leader of the third party made the first advance known in history to take him into his ministry. Perhaps, I am doing my friend injustice, for I remember the other day a distinct offer being made to the gallant member to enter the Cabinet. At least it seemed to me a kind of insinuating serpentine way of doing it, when he suggested that perhaps he was speaking like a future Minister. Well, Sir, I cannot understand how that party could be driven to seek extraneous aid. I am sure his views run so closely on a line with those of the Opposition that the two may be merged in one, so that the Government are placed in the terrible predicament of having to face not only the whole Opposition party, but Jupiter Tonans in addition. I must leave to others who live in the immediate neighborhood to answer those points, because I am unable to deal with them. I have never been in the Garden of Eden; I never saw the serpent; I never saw the act, so that I am unable to deal with those matters. But, I believe, the hon. gentleman who rose up, at the same time as I did, and who so courteously yielded the floor to me, will be able to deal more particularly with the points brought forward by one of the hon. six from Prince Edward Island. I am relieved from replying to the hon. gentleman because his arguments all proceeded from the one ground on which we have slipped in the last day or two in dealing with the question of commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity, and consisted of a steady, continued attack on the National Policy. Now, I am a young member of this House, but I think it is unreasonable, nay, it is positively indecent for them, thirteen months after we have returned from our constituencies where the National Policy was endorsed by the people, to bring up the question again to be discussed. In the name of common sense let us leave something as settled, so that the mercantile community may not be deranged and capitalists may not be deterred from investing their capital in the Dominion of Canada. I had hoped that this question, which is the greatest that has been brought before the Dominion Parliament since Confederation, would have been discussed in a spirit free from party spirit, and that both parties would have entered upon it with a determination really to sift it and see what was good in it for our common country, and if we found anything valuable in it to adopt it. I reciprocate very heartily the declarations made by one or two members on this side of the House that they desire to enter on this discussion in that spirit. But when I heard the hon. member for South Oxford in his opening sentence declare that this was a party question, and that he intended to consider it on that basis, I was more than disappointed. I should have thought that an hon. gentleman accustomed to party warfare, as he is, would try to hedge a little more than he did, and would have tried to see if there was no means which he might be able to open a door for others to join him on a broad basis. But he seems to have no conception, he seems to have no idea of a party acting in a body for the common welfare. He seems, on the contrary, to have ever before him the charm of office and to direct all his actions accordingly. Now the hon. gentleman said that he voiced the opinions of the Liberal party in this Parliament. I question very much whether he did really voice the opinions of the whole Liberal party. I recollect well the time, not very long ago, when the leader of the Liberal party (Mr. Blake), in his celebrated speech at Malvern, told us that he was not speaking as a private person, but that he was, as the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has said of himself, fully impressed with the weight of the words he was about to utter. I can recollect that well; and I can recollect also of his telling us, when he went in for a partial adoption of the National Policy, that he was voicing the opinions of the whole Liberal party, including, as I understood, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). I should like to have had from the gallant knight the first exemplification in his speech of thorough unrestricted reciprocity in this regard; I should like him to have been in the position to tell us that he voiced, not only the opinions of the Liberal party in this Parliament, but that in this Liberal party he included the hon. member for West Durham. Apparently he was not able to say so. The debate had proceeded but a short time when we found a variance in the party. We found that the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) had a very different idea of reciprocity from that which was held by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). They had a lively minute between them. It is not for us to arrange family quarrels, and it is proverbial these things will occur in the best regulated families; but although it may be that in a multiplicity of councillors there may be wisdom and prudence, I have never heard the pretension advanced that there is wisdom in a multiplicity of leaders. It would have been better for the Liberal party, if, before they came to this House and asked us to undo all that has been done in the last eight years—it would have been better for them if, before they came to this House and asked us to uproot this policy which, happily for the country, has its roots too deep to be torn up by them, they had been able to compound their own differences and have presented here a solid and unbroken front. But the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) opened as usual with this prolonged wail of, woe, woe, woe is the day of lamentation; and he told us, do you not know that you have lost $500,000,000? Well, I said to myself, God be thanked that I live in a country that has been able to lose $500,000,000, and is still able to have its banking capital overflowing, its deposits in savings banks overflowing, a railway communication unequalled in the world, and a canal system unsurpassed. I said if my country can afford to lose $500,000,000 in those five years, and still be able to be in that position, what a wonderful country it must be. However, after the hon. gentleman had told us that the country had lost $500,000,000, my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies), actually informed us that the increase in the value of farm lands in Ontario between 1873 and 1878 had been $160,000,000. We were told also that, in 1886, the increase was $30,000,000, and that between 1883 and 1887 the increase in Ontario in the value of farm lands amounted to $106,872,301. Then came the wail about the loan societies, and then the wail about the decrease in the rate of interest; and one hon. gentleman assured us that if the loan societies show they have less money loaned out than in previous years, it is because the people will not have anything to do with them on account of their outrageous charges. Now, I am a director of one of the largest loan companies in this country, and in another that does a very large business. And I boldly deny in toto the charge that respectable loan companies—I know not what kind of loan companies my hon. friend may have been connected with—charge exorbitant rates. The truth is the rates have fallen one and a-half to two per cent. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that the farmers will not go to the loan companies, but that still their mortgages are larger than ever. Where, then, do they get the money? I know how difficult it is for companies now to place their loans, and how they are obliged to give larger and larger percentages, year after year, to those who place the loans; and yet despite all that, despite the fact that rates of interest are going down, the farmers, we are told, are increasing the load of their indebtedness. Well, if they are, my experience tells me that while the farmers may be diminishing their loans which they have made from the various loan companies, they are having them taken up by their own brother farmers, at lower rates, thus saving the commission paid to the companies. We find that the whole mortgages of the loan societies for the whole of the Dominion amount to only $81,798,288, which is only about 8 per cent. of the farm value in Ontario alone, and we have learned also that of the payments in default, including capital and interest, there was in 1886 only four-sevenths of one per cent. in default, or 70 per cent. less than in 1880. I am tired and sick to death of hearing our countrymen maligned; and then I find that, not content with mourning the condition of our own fair and beautiful country, the gallant knight from South Oxford must needs with his lips full of mock loyalty to the grand old mother country depict to us the sad condition in which he says she lies. What were his words. He tells us:

"I know that, in what I now say, I am but expressing the views of some of the ablest and highest of British statesmen, when I say that one great peril that threatens the British Empire in this day is the state of most dangerous isolation into which she has come. What is her position to-day in the view of some of the ablest of her statesmen? It is that she has not a friend of a high class power in the world to-day."

Then he goes on to tell us that she is hated by France on account of her action in dealing with the Egyptian question and with the Suez Canal question. He tells us that she is not favored by Germany, that Austria and Hungary look on her with an unfriendly eye, and that Russia is ready to pounce on her. He represents her as prostrate before us, and he says: There is your mother country lying prostrate; let us put a finishing blow to her; let us see if we cannot ruin her commercially; let us throw in our lot with those who oppose her, and see if we cannot direct a deadly blow at her vitals. Then, when he has depicted England in this miserable depleted condition, he says: Now is the time for Great Britain to form an alliance with the United States. He seems to have the extraordinary idea that the United States are in the business of knight errantry, to hunt up distressed females or nations and form alliances with them. He seems to think that the United States are willing to forego the Munroe doctrine, and that seeing England in this condition, bloodless and almost lifeless, they will make it their business to leap into the rescue and save her from an untimely end. He seems to think that out of a philanthropic sentiment, they will depart from the Munroe doctrine of non-interference in European conflicts and complications with which they have no concern. But, not content with that, he then proceeds to deal with Canada and with reciprocity, and to point out the position which it occupies. Now, I am not going to deal with this question of unrestricted reciprocity, but I simply want to show that, from the figures given by the hon. gentleman himself, the question is really outside of practical politics. I am not going to read any documents or to make any quotations to show what effect it will have on our trade, but I simply wish to take the statements given to us by the hon. gentleman himself, and then to ask you what you consider will be the chances of unrestricted reciprocity? He tells us that it is notorious that:

"Our position in comparison with that of the United States has, in 20 years, been reversed, and reversed enormously to our detriment. Twenty years ago our taxes were one-third of the taxes of the United States; 20 years ago our debt was one-third of the debt of the United States."

Then his eyes glistened with joy as he said:

"To-day, by the last returns I have here, our debt is two and a half times, as nearly as may be, greater per head than the debt of the United States; and the necessary taxes which the United States require to raise for the purpose of carrying on their government are one-third less than the necessary taxes the people of Canada require to pay. Then, Sir, the European market, to which we formerly looked, is dwindling for us, so far as we are concerned."

He tells us also that the United States is in this happy position, that:

"It would be in the power of the United States Secretary of the Treasury, if Congress gave him the authority, to raise either the whole of the customs revenue in either of these three ways: He might maintain the existing tax on sugar and impose a very small income tax indeed, and raise all the revenue he wanted; he might maintain the tax on sugar and impose a very small ad valorem duty and raise all the revenue he wanted; or he might maintain the present taxes on a very few articles and make his trade list free."

So much for the United States. That is the position he says they are in. They are in a heaven-born position; everything perfectly smooth—everything moving nicely—a mere stroke of the pen will free them from duty—in one year they raise enough revenue to cover the whole debt of the Dominion of Canada—and then he turns to Canada, and says that Canada is in a wretched plight. As the member from Prince Edward Island told us, our young men are fleeing from Canada as from a plague. The hon. gentleman tells us that three out of four of our immigrants leave us, that one out of four of our population fly from us, that nothing can save us from a revolution except, perhaps, unrestricted reciprocity. That is the figure he presents to us. There is no hope, he says. He sees none. We may be able to hold on, but, unless we get this unrestricted reciprocity, this commercial union, Canada as a nation will cease to exist. I ask you, putting these two sides of the question, the view he gives of the United States, as successful under every aspect, as a people bounding with joy and with success, is it rational, is it common sense for us to imagine that these people are going to join their fortunes with ours and to be dragged down by us into the gulf of despair? If we were prosperous, if we were, as he says we were twenty years ago, there might be some reason in the proposal, but that we should go to them and say: Gentlemen, have mercy on us, we are on our last legs, we know not what to do, we are poor miserable sinners, look down with mercy on us and lift us from the quagmire into which we are sinking—is it reasonable to ask people to make a bargain, and such a bargain with you, when he tells you that the people of that country are bounding towards free trade, that they are in a position to compete with the motherland, that we are not in a position to compete with the motherland, that we are dragged down by duties; when he tells you all this and asks you to go to the United States and beg them to join with us, he is asking what no American citizen will consent to for a moment. I had the pleasure of being in Washington lately for four or five weeks, and I was so far honored as to have a seat on the floor both of the Senate and the House of Representatives, and there I had an opportunity of conversing more or less intimately with friends of my wife's family, and there we were able to speak freely on various matters, but I assure hon. gentlemen opposite that I have yet to meet the man in the United States who is prepared to discuss this fad of unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union, except on the well understood basis that real political union is to follow.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) What does Mr. Bayard say?

Mr. COCKBURN. You have the letter of Mr. Bayard. Is he so abject in his poverty that, Lazarus-like, he is going to be content with the very crumbs that fall from the table, and to imagine that they are equal to the sweet bread and the piece of solid roast beef which is on the table. You must be hard run when, out of a polite expression from the Secretary of the United States, you imagine that to amount to a solemn invitation. If you imagine that, if you met a friend on the street who said: I should be glad to see you some day at my house to dinner, he would find you there every night. Have we no dignity? Are we so low that we must crawl in the dust to men who are no better than ourselves, men of the same blood and of the same race? When hon. gentlemen opposite tell me, as the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) said, that he considered one Canadian equal to six immigrants, and when we know that we have expended $500,000,000 and scarcely feel it, it is enough to prove that we belong to a country of which we have a right to be proud, and we have no right to go round and take Mr. Bayard's coat tails and say: Do you mean that statement to be an invitation to us? Let us have more pride in our own country. Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to be unhappy unless they are miserable. There is an ecstasy of woe and there is an ecstasy of joy, but for the first time in my life I have seen the two combined in one. The debate has been exhaustive, and it must have been doubly exhausting to them on account of the conflicting emotions which they have experienced in regard to what caused us joy, the bounding up of our revenues, the increase in the wealth of our farmers, the development of our railways, the glorious future which awaits us. We are now in the position which the United States were in twenty-five years ago, but we are always tearing up the plant to see whether it has sprouted yet or not. We must have faith in our country, and it is only when you have faith in your country that you can hope to make a great country. No country is ever proud of its men unless they were first proud of the country; and unless the men in this contest for national life—unless you have in yourselves the spring of national life, unless you are true Canadians, proud of your position, proud of your ancestry, proud of the great country from which you are sprung, on the highway to become an auxiliary kingdom of that great country, you will never rise to the dignity of your position, you can never make the country grander than yourselves. Water can never rise higher than the source from which it came. I say, therefore, that the hon. gentleman opposite has given us no ground to believe that the United States themselves would accept this proposition of unrestricted reciprocity, or reciprocity, rather, restricted to one of the powers, or of commercial union. The thing is impossible, impracticable. The beauty of the thing is that these gentlemen argue all along that the United States, those 60 millions of people, those people who are enjoying a god-like existence, who pay their $2 for their broiler and 80 cents for their butter, and care not a cent what a thing costs, who are wallowing in wealth, when we come before them in rags and tatters, then, forsooth, they will open their arms and clasp us in their embrace. The absurdities! Now, with reference to the point I wish to bring forth that reciprocity is impossible, I shall show that there is, in Great Britain, all the market that we can desire. I find that the British exports for 1887 were $1,800,000,000, or nearly $6,000,000 for every week day. I find that the United States exports were $692,000,000, or 38 per cent. of the British exports. I find that the total exports and imports of the British Empire amounted to $800,000,000, and the total exports and imports between Great Britain and foreign nations amounted to $2,210,000,000, or a total of $3,000,000,000 of trade, or $10,000,000 every week day, against a total of the United States of $1,382,000,000, or $4,450,000 per week day. I find that the United Kingdom imported of wheat and flour, $130,000,000, of which Canada sent $3,000,000; that they imported of butter and butterine, $40,000,000, and we supplied only $600,000, a quantity that is not one week's supply for the British market. I think, therefore, that there is room for us to enlarge our output in that market. Of live animals for food, Great Britain took 35 million dollars worth, and we supplied 20 per cent. Can we not supply more of bacon and ham? We practically supply nothing. That market is exclusively in the hands of the United States. In cheese we do well, because we supply 6 millions out of the 20 millions imported by Great Britain. In new fruit we do wonderfully little, because we send them only $41,000 while they import 17 millions. In eggs—that is the great point. I do not wonder those gentlemen think so much of eggs. I think they have this idea imbedded into them. It seems to be an extraordinary thing that if you only keep eggs long enough at 14½ cents a dozen, they will become broilers of $2, and I am sure the eggs will be no staler than the arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite, certainly they could not be more rotten. Well, then, we have before us the export of eggs into the United States, and, to use the grand words of the gallant knight from Oxford, let me be exact, "$1,820,948 and no cents." Why, gentlemen, the whole of that import is not the import of six weeks for the mother land. Last year they took 15 million dollars worth of eggs; they took for every month a million and a quarter dollars; and if we could only get broilers up in England to the same price that they are at Mr. Wiman's house in New York, you would then be able to make enormous fortunes, and every farmer would be prosperous, and live and die in the bosom of his family and be happy ever afterwards. Now, Sir, for ham. We do very little in ham; but in England they take 10 million dollars' worth. In beef we do little, although they take 10 million dollars' worth. In fresh butter we do nothing. The Yankees do the butter—and the butterine, perhaps; but 10 millions are taken there. In fresh mutton we do nothing, although England takes $7,500,000. In preserved meats we ought to do a great deal, but we do very little indeed, although there is a market there of 5 millions. In fish we do only $1,900,000, about one twenty-fifth of the market, although they take 7½ millions, and we allow ourselves to be beaten in this market by the United States. Now, I say here is a market before you, a market in which we are not brought into competition with the people of Great Britain. We are talking about our market with the United States. It is not a market in the sense of exchange, talk of 60,000,000 of people who will furnish us a market, as if there were sixty millions of imbeciles resident in the United States who do not know how to manage their own business, who, as soon as 5,000,000 stalwart Canadians walk across the border, will clap their heads across their knees and find a refuge in the Atlantic or the Pacific, or in the bosom of the anywhere. We forget that in taking in this market of 60,000,000, we are only making a market of 65,000,000, and that that ground is already occupied by these people, and so far from extending our interests, we would inevitably contract them. Is there any hon. gentleman on the other side of the House—I will give them credit, at any rate, for looking after their own pecuniary interests; I think, in a matter of that kind, they would be singularly patriotic—I ask is there any hon. gentleman on that side of the House, who, supposing a treaty of this kind were made to last 5, 10, or 20 years, would be prepared to invest his entire property in machinery, implements, and all that goes to constitute an active factory in Canada, and depend upon the American market when, by putting this same investment, we will say $1,000,000, in the United States, he could, whatever turned up, be always sure at least of the possession of a market of 60,000,000 of people? Do they expect that the United States, in their career of prosperity, verging, as we are told, towards free trade, will make such a treaty as that for 1, or 5, or 10, or 20 years, I do not care whether with Canada or with any other country? You will find that the United States can enter into no treaty of such a kind. They distinctly refused to enter into such a treaty with the British Commissioners recently. It has been their settled policy, and it will remain their settled policy. They will not tie their country down in this way, especially at a time like this, on the eve of a Presidential election. My hon. friend opposite said this was a nice time to bring forward this question. Why, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) says a child in arms would have known better. Those hon. gentlemen brought three or four months before the general election a much greater question before the people, and if a child in arms should be able to decide the one, a child unborn should be able to decide the other. So much, then, for the British markets and the opportunities which it offers us. We find there a market which, compared with the United States market, furnishes on imports alone an advantage of 62 per cent. There is another aspect of this question which has not been examined in the House, and to which I desire to direct the attention of hon. members. I have prepared tables of the total values of imports of merchandise entered for immediate consumption and withdrawn from warehouses for consumption for the year ending 30th June, 1887. I find that the total value of United States imports free and dutiable was $683,218,980. Now, let us see how this immense volume of trade is distributed and let us compare together the manner of distribution of trade in the United States with the manner of distribution in the Dominion. In regard to the American trade we find that out of $683,000,000 odd no less than $450,070,946 or 65·85 per cent. is entered in the port of New York. Boston follows next with $61,000,000; the two together represent 75 per cent. of the total imports of the United States. Then comes San Francisco with $40,000,000 or 5 per cent., Chicago with $12,000,000, a beggarly percentage of 1·77. We have been told by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) to look at those great and rising towns on our southern border—look at Chicago, Buffalo, Detroit and Cleveland. I have looked at them and this is the result: Chicago imports only 1·77 of the total imports; Buffalo, ·82; Oswego, ·59; Detroit, ·26. Here are the figures:

Here is the summary: That 75 per cent. of the whole United States imports are entered at New York and Boston alone; that the great city of Chicago commands only 1.77 per cent. of that trade, that Buffalo on our border, that is set up for our imitation commands only .82, and Cleveland .10, and Detroit .36; while the Canadian trade is distributed throughout the whole Dominion so that nine of our ports show proportionately a larger amount of imports than are to be found entered at Chicago. At no less than 27 of our ports are the imports larger than at Detroit. Out of those 27 no less than seven import absolutely not relatively, greater values for consumption, while 15 of them show imports relatively of greater value for consumption. I draw attention to Detroit, Buffalo and Cleveland as being great cities on our border, and because we have been taunted with the immense progress that they have made, and as they have been held forth to us as examples for us to follow. We see by this table while the proportion of population in the United States as to Canada is as twelve to one, its import trade is only six and a half times as much as ours; so that under commercial union or reciprocity we would be offering them a market of 5,000,000 of people, each of whom consumes imports to the value of $22 per head in exchange for a market in which the people consume only $11 per head of the population. We can, moreover, hope to displace a very limited portion of the foreign products. We cannot hope to displace more than a limited portion in a country of such vast extent, for it is well known that there are series of circles within which trade has to be done. We do not do trade with St. Louis or New Orleans but with nearer cities, and while we would be giving up our market where the consumption per head is $22 per head for imports we could only hope to displace a very limited amount of their foreign produce, they meanwhile hoping to displace a very large amount of ours to our detriment. We see this conclusion, that we would receive only $1 for every $2 now paid to us. We would in fact suffer an annual loss of $5,000,000. Then look again at another fact. Imports and exports must follow the same lines. A ship that come to discharge her cargo at a certain port does not go to another port to take home her cargo, unless she fails to obtain it there. So that they could discriminate against our shipping—that shipping which has been spoken of so lightly amounts to 210,000 tons for each 1,000,000 of inhabitants. They would discriminate in favor of the shipping of the United States, which amounts to only 70,000 tons for each 1,000,000 of inhabitants. Our market would be New York. We saw the effect of that long ago when the Mackenzie Government took off the differential duties on tea, and at once the great importing houses of Montreal transferred their business to New-York and converted their large establishments in Montreal into mere offices. So soon, however, as the differential duties were restored they dropped their offices in New York and resumed their large establishments in Montreal. I think these are pretty nearly what our Yankee friends are offering us. Hon. gentlemen who are not connected with the south as I am, and who, perhaps, have not had their attention drawn to it, are, perhaps, not aware of the fact that within the last eight months no less than $100,000,000 have been invested in the south for the development of industries there in copper, iron and so forth. Those industries are beginning now to fall behind and the manufacturers are seeking for some means of falling upon some other market and they are living now upon the promises of our friends. Mr. Townsend has brought forward a grander proposal of a Zollverein of the whole American continent which is to take in not only the greenhorns of the Dominion of Canada but of the South American Republic as well. This continent is to be one vast Zollverein, one unrestricted reciprocity, one commercial union, and the whole manufacturing is to be done by our Yankee friends for the benefit of the Americans and the American Republic. That is the way Mr. Wiman and others with their wist interests in America are trying to regulate that the whole trade of this country should go to the Americans. If you can break up this system of united patriotism for our own interests such as we have in Canada, if they can get 75 or even the whole 100 per cent. of our trade in the city of New York the property of Mr. Wiman and others on Staten Island will become of a value greater perhaps than one can imagine. I understand this. I see in those manoeuvres of Mr. Wiman and others a deliberate attempt to entrap us into a scheme which I am sure the farmers of Canada are much too wise to fall into. The last point to which I wish to draw attention is the great difference between our imports since we adopted the National Policy and the time previous. I shall read you—and the mere reading I think is sufficient to prove the statement—the quantity and value of the under-mentioned articles of raw material imported into the country during the fiscal year ended the 30th June, 1879, and the year ending 1887. I bespeak the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to this, because if they consider those figures they will see at once the style of the revolution in our trade and the basis of the foundation upon which our Dominion is resting and which we are determined shall continue:

COMPARATIVE STATEMENT of the quantity and value of the undermentioned articles of raw material imported into Canada during the fiscal years ended 30th June, 1879 and 1887 respectively:—

That is not exactly what I want to draw your attention to, for there is something beyond that. I ask gentlemen who are familiar with manufacturing what value they will place on the crude article and what value is represented by the article when manufactured? They tell me it is as one to three, and when gentlemen on the other side begin telling us and flaunting in our face that the imports in such a year amounted to so and so and this year only amounted to so and so, I say God be thanked for this, because it is to me a direct proof that we have changed our mode of importing goods, and that formerly what we imported as a finished product we now import as the crude material, and in its manufacture we give employment to men and children and enable our own people to enjoy the fruits of honest labor. Those figures which I have read show us the change has taken place for the better in our country, and show us that money is earned and spent in this country, making the homes of our farmers and our artisans comfortable. However little gentlemen opposite may think of our farmers—for they have denounced them before the whole country as bankrupts, and have told us they are in the hands of mortgagors and that they are bankrupt, I say that the hon. gentlemen opposite have insulted the farmers of the Dominion of Canada. To return to this point, I wish again to draw your attention to the difference between the imports of articles in 1879 and 1887, and to point out that this difference represents to our artisans in the labor market a gain of $18,489,234 in solid gold. This money has been earned by our artisans and by our farmers, and it has gone to grease the wheels of industry in the Dominion. It ought, I think, to prevent hon. gentlemen opposite from going down on their knees and from cringing to a foreign, a hostile power I might almost say. We are now, as those returns show, very much in the same position in which America was not very many years ago. I ask you, have you ever found an American who was ready to decry his country the same as some people do in Canada, or who was willing to go back, as he might have gone with some feeling, to the mother country? Look around you and see if ever the Americans sought to ally themselves with a foreign country? Have you ever found, in the Senate of that country, a wail of lamentation on the condition of their country? I say that looking to the United States they should take example from its people who are proud of their country, and they have no more reason to be proud of their country, God knows, than we have to be proud of ours. I think that in morals, in stamina, in intellectuality, in descent, in vigor, in manliness of character, in all that constitutes a man, we can stand up before them and say: "I, also, am a man." But hon. gentlemen opposite cringe and say: "We are not men; we are in a miserable plight; for God's sake come and take us out; we have no saviour ourselves, we cannot save ourselves." Look at the progress we have made since 1879, in eight short years, which are in the history of a people but as a speck in eternity. Do not think you can create a nation and call it into existence by a mere fiat? We have now been confederated five and twenty years, and thanks to Heaven, we have had at our head a man who fully appreciated the greatness of his country's destiny, who never hesitated when the occasion came to stand forth for Canada first, Canada last and Canada forever. I was ashamed to hear a man tell us the other evening that when it pleased God to gather him to his fathers, then we should become disorganised, and they should have a chance of coming into this Garden of Eden, the garden for which they have been longing for so many years, the garden they saw before them but fourteen short months ago, and laid out so pleasantly with Ministers and portfolios that never came into existence. They have my sympathy. I can only hope that as they grow older they will grow wiser; that as they see the country progressing and Canada leading in the van, they will take a more hopeful view of our future. They can see now for the first time the opening up of our great North-West; for let us remember, while there have been exoduses in every country in the world, we have not had a fair chance beside the United States until the last two years of taking our immigrants directly into our land of promise. Hon. gentlemen might have known that in the history of the development of our population there was something else to consider than this mere misgovernment they talk about. They might have thought that this same flight of people to the United States took place at the time that country was groaning under taxes infinitely heavier than ours, and with a debt infinitely heavier than ours, a debt that did not represent public works and works of improvement, but simply the price paid for shedding their brothers' blood. I hope when hon. gentlemen opposite take all these matters into consideration, they will reflect and come to the conclusion to stop seeking madly, in their eager desire to clutch office, to grasp at every straw that presents itself. Otherwise they will do harm to a little party that I consider essential to the welfare of the country; for in every state there must be two parties. But to continue the course they took before the last election and that they are taking now, can only result in destruction to the party and in injury to our own country.

Mr. Mills (Annapolis) and Mr. Ellis rose at the same time.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member for Annapolis rose at the same time as the hon. member for St. John, and I presume he has the floor.

Mr. LANDERKIN. It takes two of them to one.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). The fact is, on this question we are almost two to one in this House, and the hon. gentlemen opposite must expect a double speech from this side once in a while in order to give an opportunity to all who wish to speak. I will not weary the House very long, simply because we have had a large number of speakers, and spent a good deal of time over this question. Members from the Maritime Provinces have been challenged now and again by some hon. members opposite as to what their people think of unrestricted reciprocity. I am happy to state that I am here to-night representing one of the finest constituencies and one of the fairest valleys in the Maritime Provinces; and I also represent some of the finest and most intelligent farmers in those Provinces or in the Dominion of Canada for that matter. One of the members from Prince Edward Island who has lately taken his seat gave the House some idea of what it was to be a married man. If I mistake not, he stated that after a man became married, he would lack some of his mathematical precision. Well, I should say, judging from the speech of that hon. gentleman, that he had been rather too much married, especially when he began to talk about that little Marine farm, that little farm of the Interior, and that little farm of Reciprocity, which he was going to set up in that Garden of Eden, Prince Edward Island. He said they would sell on the Marine farm and on the Interior farm potatoes for 18 cents a bushel, and oats for 26 cents a bushel, "but on my Reciprocity farm," said he, "I will get 70 cents for my potatoes, and 45 cents or 50 cents for my oats." Now, he must have rather taken advantage in some way of the marine and interior farmers, for if he is going to get 70 cents for his potatoes, or 45 or 50 cents for his oats, with a duty of only 15 cents on the one, and 10 cents on the other, taking for granted that the farmer is going to pay the duty, I would like to know how he brings 18 up to 70, and 26 up to 45 or 50. I think that shows that the hon. gentleman, according to the principle he laid down himself, has been rather too much married. He also says that shipping has fallen off since the National Policy was introduced. Well, perhaps it has fallen off. I know that fewer ships have been built in Annapolis and King's and other places along the coast. But the reason simply is that wooden vessels had to give way to iron steamers. We are no longer shipping in wooden bottoms but in iron bottoms, and we cannot account this change as an evidence of lack of progress. I remember the time when we used to build ships in Annapolis and send them out to the different ports of the world, and for years the only thing we would see of those ships would be the drafts sent home. Not much of that business is done now, simply because iron steamers are taking the place of wooden vessels. So, I do not think the hon. gentleman has made much on that point against the National Policy, for it is impossible to pretend that it is owing to the National Policy there has been a falling off in ship-building. Now the National Policy was accepted by the people in 1878. Previous to 1878 the people saw they had a know-nothing Government to deal with. Deficit after deficit was being rolled up, and the laboring classes in the country were without employment. The National Policy was introduced as a means to furnish work to the laborers, and to be an incentive to business and progress in Canada. The people accepted that policy in 1878, and when they were asked again for their verdict in 1882, they again gave their verdict in its favor. Between 1882 and 1887, the Opposition party accepted the National Policy. They tried all kinds of policies for themselves. They tried one policy in Nova Scotia, they tried another in New Brunswick, they tried another in Quebec, they tried different policies in every Province throughout the length and breadth of Canada. They had not a single policy to cover the wants of a large majority of the people, but they had resort to different policies in the different Provinces in order, if possible, to gain an election in each. Notwithstanding that the members of the Opposition, by the mouth of their leader, in his celebrated Malvern speech, accepted the National Policy as their policy, the Canadian people would not trust that policy in the hands of those hon. gentlemen who were taking it up at the last moment, when they saw the policy was being successful, but decided to continue their confidence in those who had inaugurated it. Hon. gentlemen opposite did not catch the people in 1887, and when, on the 22nd February the returns come in, that celebrated majority, which was heralded in the Morning Chronicle and telegraphed all over Canada, especially to the North-West Territories and those constituencies that had to make their elections later, was found to have dwindled down to a feeble minority. Hon. gentlemen opposite, seeing that they had been defeated at every turn, seeing that the people will not trust the National Policy into their hands, have been, with the assistance of some people over the border, framing a policy that would catch the votes of the electors in the far distant future. That policy has become commercial union. One of the exponents of the Opposition in Nova Scotia boldly stated upon the hustings, at one of the bye-elections, that heretofore his party had no policy. They had, he said, no real genuine policy, but they have got one now, and it was commercial union. This was to be the panacea for all our evils; this was to be the remedy for all our hungry looks, and they tried the commercial union fad for all it is worth. They boomed it in Nova Scotia upon every hustings, in every bye-election, and it failed. They have evidently not come to a decision to take up another policy until they met here two or three weeks ago, because it is a notorious fact that an hon. member of the Opposition had upon the Order Paper a notice that he would move a resolution in favor of commercial union. That notice has disappeared from the Order Paper, and this resolution of unrestricted free trade with the United States has come up in its place, evidently showing that the Opposition only combined upon this policy two or three weeks ago. Now, they say it is absolutely necessary that we should adopt this new policy. They say Canada has been ruined, that the majority of Canadians are farmers, and that, therefore, we must take care of the farmers in preference to the other classes engaged in other industries. I go in "hotly," to use a slang phrase, for protecting the farmers in every way possible. I am the son of a farmer, and I believe in protecting every individual when it is necessary he should be protected. But I contend that, so far as the farmers of Annapolis and King's are concerned, they need no protection. I was fairly astounded when I heard the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) state here that the farmers of the Maritime Provinces had no hope, but were in despair. I would like to see him come down to Annapolis and to King's and tell the farmers there that they are in despair. I believe I can prove to this House that this statement of the case is not correct, and I will prove my assertion out of the mouth of the farmers themselves. I will prove by the farmers themselves that they are not hopeless for the future, and that although they are willing, of course, to enter into trade relations with any country that will be of benefit to them, rather than sacrifice their own country, rather than sacrifice the industries of Canada, they will do very well and get along successfully without the United States. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that this policy of theirs is universally accepted by their party, but I rather think there was some disagreement somewhere when we were told by the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) that he would not advocate the abolition of all railway subsidies and public works, and that he would not advocate direct taxation in any measure. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) says that, even if it leads to direct taxation he will prosecute this policy, and he says that direct taxation is not such a bugbear as it is at first supposed to be, that taxes by assessment are a great deal better, that the poor man will be able to pay taxes more equitably under the system by which taxes are imposed now. I take a decided exception to that, and I say, and I think I can prove, that the poor man is not taxed at the present time, but that it is the rich man, that it is those who enjoy the luxuries of life, who are being taxed now and not the poor man. If the taxes were imposed under the assessment laws, and especially under the assessment laws of Nova Scotia, I am quite convinced that it would be the poor man who would bear the burden of the taxes, and not the rich man. I say that it is upon the luxuries of life that the taxes are now levied, and these are some of the items. First, there are jellies and jams, $21,853. Surely the poor man can do without those. Jewellery, $482,043. The poor man can do without those. Musical instruments, $389,699. The poor man can do without those. Optical instruments, $56,783. Well, the poor man does without those, even if he needs them. Paintings and drawings, $73,117. Perfumery, &c., $21,999. Pickles and sauces, $160,282. Silks, $2,305,392. Fancy soaps and powders, $76,579. The poor man will make his soap from lye and soap grease. Spirituous liquors, $1,617,044. There is no need for the poor man to take those. Tobacco, $111,313. There is no necessity for the poor man to indulge in tobacco. If he must have it, let it be upon his own head. Watches, $503,565. Books and printed matter, $1,003,766. Baking powders, $102,517. Printed music, $60,561. Christmas cards, $81,168. Surely the poor man can do without these. Carpets, $13,052. Watch cases, $26,569. Cider, $13,524. Cocoa and chocolate, $50,145. China, $185,498. Embroideries, $134,097. Fancy goods, $1,579,988. Foreign fruits, $1,609,252. Furs, $634,021. Gloves, &c., $363,097. Gold and silver goods, $238,431. All of these show that it is not the poor man who bears the burden of the taxes but the rich, and those are the people who should pay the taxes in this Dominion. If you were to have direct taxation, and that as carried out by the assessment laws of Nova Scotia, it would be the poor man who would pay the bulk of these taxes. In Annapolis county, this is the way in which it works, and I know that it is the same in every other county in Nova Scotia, particularly when you get a Grit revisor on the assessment list, who will put every poor man he wants to vote for his side on the list at $300 personal property, no matter whether what he owns is worth $175 or not; but, if there is a rich man who owns $75,000 worth of property, he is assessed at about $2,000. These are facts, and I defy contradiction, and it is well known in the Province of Nova Scotia that that is the way in which it works. In that case it is the poor man who pays the tax, and not the rich man at all, and, therefore, it would be a great evil for this country to have the taxes levied in that way. As far as the Province of Nova Scotia is concerned, I do not think that that Province, and especially my constituency, and the constituency of the member for Queen's (Mr. Freeman), and the member for Shelburne (Gen. Laurie), would like to see the abolition of the railway subsidies. This is the time when Nova Scotia should be regarded with reference to railways. Railways have been constructed throughout every Province with the exception of the Maritime Provinces, and now is the time when we should have railway subsidies if they are to be given to us at all, and I do not think the hon. members opposite from Nova Scotia would agree to have the railway subsidies abolished. The same thing is true with regard to public works and public buildings. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) said that the time had come for something heroic to be done, that there was a crisis at hand, that Canada was ruined, that the whole earth was becoming sick and famished in Canada while everything was green and beautiful in the United States, and it rested upon the member for South Oxford to do that heroic thing, whatever it was. He says the National Policy is a failure and Canada is ruined. Do you think for a moment that you are going to make the people of Canada believe that? Do you think that you can make them believe that this fair Dominion of ours is ruined? Do the people who have to deal out the funds to us when we want to make a loan on the London markets think that Canada is ruined, and that is the true test of the ruination of any country? If your credit is not good, that is the test of ruin. If a person applies for a loan on real estate, what is the first thing the person to whom he applies does? He enquires into the character of that party, he enquires whether the farm is of sufficient value to warrant the loan, he asks whether that man is able and willing to pay his interest when it is due, he enquires into everything that should be enquired into, and he enquires very particularly because these money lenders are people who have their eyes open to all these matters, and are very determined that their money shall not be lent out on worthless security. What do the lenders of money in London say? We know that Canada is the first of the colonies of Great Britain as far as her credit is concerned. Her credit was never better than it is to-day, and still the hon. member for South Oxford says we must do something heroic because Canada is being ruined. It is the most absurd statement that any man could make. Then they say that there is no inter-provincial trade. I have heard that stated time and time again, and I heard it stated throughout the length and breadth of Annapolis county. The Attorney General and other members of the Local Government said that there. They said: When do you find the ships of the Maritime Provinces turned towards Upper Canada, as they call it, that is Ontario and Quebec? They hardly acknowledge that Nova Scotia is in Canada at all. I tell them that we have inter-provincial trade, and that it is increasing year by year and day by day. To be sure, the member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), crept behind the fact that we had no actual statistics of inter-provincial trade, and he thought he was safe in reference to that and could make almost any assertion he liked in regard to inter-provincial trade. There was a gentleman, however, in St. John, N.B., who looked into this matter very thoroughly. He corresponded with the different establishments throughout the

Maritime Provinces, and he discovered the facts as accurately as could be done without appointing a commission and going to each of these establishments separately to get the figures. His statement does not relate to the Maritime Provinces, but to Nova Scotia alone, and here are the amounts of goods that Nova Scotia sent to Ontario and Quebec in 1885:

|--|-------------|
| Sugar, refined..... | $1,104,354 |
| Iron..... | 474,221 |
| Coal..... | 790,000 |
| Cotton manufactures..... | 288,000 |
| Skates..... | 36,500 |
| Nova Scotia Forge Company..... | 87,000 |
| Canned milk (Truro Co.)..... | 12,000 |
| Hats..... | 14,000 |
| Woodenware, Round Hill Co., Annapolis... | 3,600 |
| Leather..... | 44,000 |
| Fish, over..... | 35,000 |
| Cordage, about..... | 40,000 |
| Woollen goods..... | 6,000 |
| Total..... | $3,144,675 |

These figures are for 1885, and have materially increased for the last few years. When the Attorney General of Nova Scotia saw fit to go down to the county of Digby in a bye-election, he stated upon a platform that there was nothing sent up to Ontario and Quebec from the Maritime Provinces. Very impolitely, I confess, there was a gentleman present from Digby, a merchant. "You lie, Sir," says he, "for I sent $10,000 worth this year, and I expect to send as much more next year." So in the town of Digby alone $10,000 worth of fish was sent to the Upper Provinces. The hon. member for Digby (Mr. Jones) at this moment corrects me, and says there are $18,000 worth sent off from Digby alone to Ontario and Quebec. There is also the item of oysters, which, it seems, is becoming quite a trade between Nova Scotia and the Western Provinces. Thus it will be seen that Nova Scotia sends per capita to its population, $6.66 of goods to Ontario and Quebec, and they, in return only send $2.15 per capita, although Attorney General Longley has often exclaimed against the Montreal and Quebec drummers coming down to Nova Scotia and getting the money out of the people. So I think that demonstrates beyond doubt that the contention of the hon. member for South Oxford about the lack of inter-provincial trade, is incorrect. Then they talk about the exodus. I would like to ask hon. gentlemen where in the world there is not an exodus? When in the history of Nova Scotia, when in the history of New Brunswick, when in the history of Canada, when in the history of New England States themselves, was there not an exodus towards the West, or an exodus toward some other country? Even as far back as 1853, the Hon. Joseph Howe had to meet this question of an exodus. He was leader of the Government at that time, and those who were on the Opposition benches, in order, I presume, to burn up the old gentleman's clothes, politically, on that occasion, thought they would find an exodus somewhere, and they got a committee, and that committee made an investigation, and they did discover an exodus. They went so far as to say that the exodus amounted to this: If the present system is maintained—the policy of the Government at that time—the population will be thinned down to the aged and infirm, and others who, in consequence of poverty, and the peculiarity of their circumstances, have neither the means nor the ability to leave the country. That was the kind of exodus that they kicked up in 1853. It was a far greater exodus than the hon. gentlemen opposite dare to assert takes place from Canada to-day. They admit that there are some people living here to-day who are not aged and infirmed. How did that venerable and eloquent gentleman at that time meet these people? He made a speech from which I will read an extract, and after that speech there was not another word said about the exodus. He entirely snatched them, as I am convinced the hon. gentlemen opposite will be snatched after this question has been fully ventilated:

"I read this report with deep sorrow and regret. I feel humiliated to see a Nova Scotian seeking to put on the journals of the Legislature what I believe to be a piece of systematic misrepresentation and defamation of his country. We may see in the newspapers denunciations of the position, character, commercial resources and advancement of our Province; and I believe these have greatly disheartened our people, setting them at variance with their condition and country, and leading them to believe that there is something abroad and beyond our borders infinitely superior to anything that can be found at home. This, however, does not justify a Legislature in stamping with the seal of official authority these aspersions; in sapping the springs of vitality and energy that alone are left to quicken or animate them; and by a steady, persevering system of self-abasement inducing an utter absence of all hope. Sir, I believe that this Province is as progressive, as forward in the race of civilisation and improvement, as half the countries that may be compared with it on the face of the earth."

Cannot the words of that old man, eloquent, be repeated as at the present time? Can we not also say that Canada is as progressive, that she is as well looked after, that she is as far advanced in the race of civilisation, as any other country in the world, aye, and more than the majority of the countries in the world? I consider that Canada was never in a more progressive state than at the present time. Do these hon. gentlemen think that the people of Canada are going to forsake the substance to grasp at the shadow? Do they think the people of Canada will imitate the dog that was crossing the stream with a bone in his mouth, and grasping at his own shadow that he saw in the water, he lost the bone? No, the people of Canada have more faith in their country. It is the hon. gentlemen in the Opposition that have no faith in their country. They look with hungry eyes upon this country, they are hungry themselves, they are undergoing a famine. All the world to them is sick and famishing. Hungry is the air around them, hungry is the sky above them, and the stars of heaven, like the eyes of wolves, glare at them, so ardent are they to creep over to the Treasury benches. Now, they tell us that there is a depreciation in real estate. I do not believe it. I do not think that the majority of the people of Canada believe it, and I will do the hon. gentlemen opposite the credit of saying that I do not think they believe it themselves. I would like the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) to go down into the counties of Annapolis and King's and attempt to buy a farm. I rather think he would need another fee of $47.50 an hour to buy it. So far as the Annapolis valley is concerned, I know it is not true, and I think what can be said of that valley can be said of the Province of Nova Scotia, that real estate has not depreciated in value. Perhaps in some localities, for local reasons merely, there may be a depreciation. Take, for instance, the rock bound coasts of the Bay of Fundy, in my constituency, or the county of the hon. member for King's. Property over there may have depreciated in value, and why? Simply because we have got the iron horse rushing through the valley and diverting trade from those great waters and consequently there is a depreciation in property there. But where, there is the depression in one section of the country there is a bulging out in another. How can hon. gentlemen opposite say that our farmers are in despair? I have said what I think of this matter, but I will now show what the farmers think about it. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) declared, and he rolled it under his tongue as a sweet morsel, that we have no statistics with regard to these matters and the only information we can get is from the reports of agricultural societies throughout the Provinces. When I heard the assertion of the hon. gentleman in regard to the condition of the farmers I said: Can this be true? If it is true it is beyond all my experience. I decided to examine the reports of the agricultural societies and ascertain what they said in regard of this question. In the Province of Nova Scotia there are about 92 of those societies, and if the hon. gentleman can take those reports from 1881 down to date and find anything in them that is indicative of despair I will relinquish my position in this House. It is just the opposite that is the case. The Nictaux Agricultural Society reports:

"Resolve to expend 10 per cent. of their funds in books on agriculture. They take now a number of books on 'Apple Culture,' 'Farm Drainage,' 'Hain's Talks on Manure,' 'Manual of Agriculture,' 'The Farm and Stock Manual.'"

"A. BECKWITH,
"Secretary."

That does not look as if the farmers of Nova Scotia were going behind, and if farming did not pay they would enter some other business. The farmers of Nova Scotia are not fools. But farming in Nova Scotia does pay, and therefore they are making themselves perfect in farming, and in Annapolis and King's counties they are entering into it as an art. Paradise Agricultural Society reports:

"Everything apparently prosperous. No complaints. A largesum of money expended in bonuses to parties buying thoroughbreds. The directors reported that they and the members of this society dwell with pleasure on the interest manifested, and the advances made in the past, in the improvement of stock and general farm crops. We are pleased to report favorably on the condition of the crops, the autumn being exceptionally favorable in the ripening of the fruit, for which our orchardists are realising fine prices both at home and abroad."

"WALLACE YOUNG.
"ARTHUR MORSE."

"The meeting adopted this report."

"B. R. BALCON.
"E. S. MORSE."

That does not look like despair! The Eastern Annapolis Agricultural Society reports:

"Good crops; good harvest season."

"JOHN CONLON,
"Chairman of Directors.
"A. B. PARKER,
"Secretary."

No despair about these people; they have faith and hope in their country. The Laurie Agricultural Society—headed after the hon. member for Shelburne—reports a gradual improvement in the breeding of shorthorn Durham, and also that they have good reason to believe that it will only be a short time before scrub bulls will be scarce in the eastern end of this county. It adds:

"The members of this society have sold cattle and calves this year which have been reported and as yet have had no equal in the county. Cattle weighing 3,950 lbs., and girth, 8 feet. Calf 5 months old, girth, 4 feet, 6 inches. Cattle here in ten years, since the organisation of this society, have improved 50 per cent."

"A. A. FORD,
"Secretary."

Annapolis Agricultural Society:

"The president, Joseph A. Bancroft, Esq., reported that there had been some progress made in agricultural matters. This society has had the advantage of the valuable services of G. B. McGill, Esq., a graduate of the agricultural department of the Normal School of Truro. A lot of agricultural literature purchased, also thoroughbreds."

In Antigonish county there is the Bayfield Agricultural Society. It reports:

"Thoroughbreds purchased, and agricultural literature."

North Grant Agricultural Society's report is replete with satisfaction and bright hope. Their stock is improving, also their crops, and they are investing largely in agricultural literature. In Cape Breton county, Sydney Agricultural Society reports importations of thoroughbreds, and adds:

"We are satisfied that industry and close application would make this a first class farming and stock-raising county."

"DUNCAN MCKENZIE.
"R. McDONALD."

Then there are reports from Stirley Agricultural Society, Agricola Agricultural Society, Earltown Agricultural Society, Brookfield Agricultural Society. In Digby county, we have a report from the Hillsburgh Agricultural Society. Weymouth Agricultural Society says:

"On the whole, we have abundant reason for thankfulness to the Beneficent Ruler of the universe for the many rich blessings which have crowned the year."

There are also similar reports from Guysborough county, Halifax county, Hants county, Inverness county. In Lunenburg county the Bridgewater Agricultural Society says:

"Are pleased to report a continual growth."

The Centreville Agricultural Society reports:

"Thoroughbreds and works on agriculture."

There is a report from Chester Agricultural Society, also from Lunenburg Agricultural Society, which says:

"Sent crops to Indian and Colonial Exhibition."

Similar reports come from Balmoral Agricultural Society, Lower Stewiacke Agricultural Society, Springside Agricultural Society, Londonderry Agricultural Society. For Cumberland county we have reports from Malagash Agricultural Society, North Shore Agricultural Society, Wentworth Agricultural Society, Maccan and Nappan Agricultural Society, Amherst Agricultural Society. Minudie and Beaconsfield Agricultural Society reports:

"Thoroughbred stock and books."

Wallace Agricultural Society says crops a good yield; prices of cattle and sheep improving, and end with gratefully acknowledging to the Bountiful Giver of all good our peace and prosperity. Among the agricultural societies, Annapolis, 1886, Clements Agricultural Society reports:

"Recognising the kindly providence of another year, we acknowledge our obligations to the Giver of All Good for health, peace and prosperity in our midst."

"C. RENDY,

"President.

"W. V. VROOM,

"Secretary."

Clarence Agricultural Society reports that:

"All their bills, owing to former extravagance, are paid, and they want an exhibition."

"ADALBUT WILKINS.

"Z. W. ELLIOTT."

The Clements Agricultural Society report prosperity and an advance of price in turnips, and close their report with this:

"We are reminded of the general good health which we, as a community, have enjoyed, and for the peace and plenty which surround us, and humbly and gratefully acknowledge our thanks to the Giver of All Our Good."

"C. RENDY,

"President.

"DOWE ROTHE,

"Vice-President.

"W. V. VROOM,

"Secretary."

The Central Agricultural Society, King's county, reports:

"We are thankful we can again report a year of prosperity, with good crops and fair prices."

Take every one of these reports, and I challenge any hon. gentlemen to go over them with me and to find in any one of them during the last three or four years anything contrary in any respect to what I have stated. But I can show even a better report than that. I can show the report of the Agricultural Society of the County of King's, its 97th annual report, for the society has been in existence 97 years. It would well repay hon. gentlemen who remember the base libel that has been telegraphed through Canada and the United States, that the farmers of the Maritime Provinces are in despair and without hope, to read the whole of these reports. The report of the King's County Agricultural Society, speaking of the potato crop, says:

"For years the crop that overshadowed all others in this valley, since the abrogation of the reciprocity treaty, and the imposition of a duty in 1866, have gradually taken the second place—apples now leading. In the political agitation which has recently visited us, there is no doubt that potatoes and reciprocity were greatly mixed up in the minds of our farmers. The old days of a dollar a bushel held a fond place in their memories. Reciprocity for King's means simply a free market in the United States for potatoes. This, it is believed, would be a panacea for all our ills; but we should remember that times are changed, and were potatoes free to-day, it is morally certain that the price could not exceed a-half a dollar unless the potato bug or rot destroyed our neighbor's crop. The product of their own farms in the different States is now sufficient to keep the price down to something like the value of the article, and they are also now brought over to the United States from Europe. Our farmers must make up their minds to raise them for about 30 to 35 cents, and this can be got without going down on our knees to beg reciprocity from the United States Senate. This crop rotted badly last season in some localities, but there was an average crop of sound tubers which are not rotting in the cellars. Returns for last year (1885), show that fully 230,000 bushels were shipped from this county; and, for 1886, 40,000 bushels were shipped in November, and vessels are now loading at different ports. The price is 30 cents. The varieties grown are: Prolifics, Burbanks, Early and Bolton rose; Beauty of Hebron, and Garnet Chili. The last named variety is entirely free from rot."

He tells of the prices of turnips, pears, plums, small fruits, live stock and apples, and it will well repay any one to read that, but I will not weary the House with it. He refers to the prices of all farm products, and says:

"If all farm products were compared with those of other places: Hay, $10 to $12; potatoes, 30 cents; oats, 40 to 50 cents; apples, $1 50 to $3 50; beef, $5 to $7; butter and eggs, 18 to 25 cents. These prices compare favorably with those of any farming State in the Union, and the price of purchased supplies is equally favorable. In the States granulated sugar is quoted at 6½ cents by the barrel. In Halifax it costs 6½ cents; and circle A, equally white, and as good for any purpose, 6 cents. We pay less than half the prices paid in New York for our tea and coffee. Flour was never cheaper; cottons, boots and shoes, nails, everything manufactured, cheaper in proportion than our farm products. On the whole, the year has been a decided success, agriculturally, in King's. We have lived twenty years without reciprocity, and nearly as many years as a Province of the Dominion, and I fail to see 'blue ruin' in this county in the face of the above facts."

Does that look like despair; does that call for any heroic method?

"With buyers from New York and Montreal coming down here to buy our apples in preference to their own; with London, Havana and Bermuda open markets for our farm products, and with the international, intercolonial and interprovincial trade which we now have, and that which will be built up in the future as a happy result of the Indian and Colonial Exhibition, we can live twenty years more without reciprocity, if necessary, and still advance and prosper. I have no patience with those narrow minded pessimists who are continually crying out there is something rotten in the state of Canada; who can see nothing but ruin in the country, and are preaching discontent among the people. Where is this ruin? Who and what is ruined? Look at our churches and school houses, our houses and barns, our improved breeds of cattle, sheep and swine; our farming tools and implements, our fine horses and carriages, our pianos and organs, our tweeds and silks, instead of home-spuns and linsey woolsey; look at the source of wealth which procures and maintains all these things—our broad acres of dyke, fertile uplands, and productive orchards; try to purchase one of these farms, and compare the price with that of even ten years ago. Count the people's money in the savings bank, their life insurance policies, the cash spent for missions and benevolent purposes, for business and pleasure, for rum and tobacco, and then talk about ruin if you can."

This is the report of a farmer, and the report of the King's County Agricultural Society, and the report was adopted and accepted by them.

Mr. KIRK. Who writes that?

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). The directors of the King's County Agricultural Society, and it was reported in the journals of Nova Scotia in 1887, and the Nova Scotia Government is a Grit Government, your own friends. I may just say here that I have had a report from Annapolis that the apples sent to London not to the United States by the last steamship have realised the highest price in the market, 40s. sterling per barrel. Perhaps the hon. gentleman thinks that this is the only report from that county, but I will give him a still later one for 1887 which has just come from the Legislature which is now sitting in Halifax, and from the same Grit Government down there. I will turn again to the same society, the King's County Agricultural Society, and it is the 98th annual meeting this time. I will only take some extracts from it, and I will place it in the hands of any hon. gentleman present who may read the whole of it if he likes:—

"I will reiterate here that there is no place in the whole world where both the climate and the soil are better adapted to agricultural pursuits than in King's county, and indeed throughout this whole valley. The farmer is absolutely certain year by year of a fair return from seed sown and labor expended."

"Our crops as a whole are a good average. The hay crop is fully a third more than last year, and the apple crop a third less, but both are of exceptionally good quality."

"Too much attention cannot be given to the dyke and hay crop in our district. It is really our most important crop, and, indeed, may be said to be the most important crop in our Province. Three thousand acres of dyke, the most valuable land outside of cities on this continent, and a large area of upland, are exclusively devoted to this crop in our district, and upon the product of these acres the wintering of our stock depends, and upon the stock depends the proper fertilisation of our orchards, and the land planted with other crops. And this is largely the case in the whole Province. The last census gives one-fourth of the cleared land in Nova Scotia occupied by the hay crop, and also more than half of the land cropped. Grass grown for hay covers 520,000 acres of the most valuable land, yielding about 600,000 tons, worth nearly $6,000,000. These figures will give you some idea of the value and importance of the hay crop. I would remark just here that our farmers could make a large saving in their fodder if the hay-cutter was more extensively used, and the straw cut with the hay and fed with provender and meal, as is done in the old country. The straw would then become as valuable as hay, the stock would eat less and thrive better. This is no theory, but a fact which is being proved in the experience of some every winter."

"Oats.—This, the only grain crop raised to any extent here, will be ten per cent. below the crop of '86 in quantity and quality. Farmers know that it does not pay to raise wheat when prime flour can be bought for $5 25 per barrel."

"The potato crop is far away our most important 'root crop,' and every precaution should be taken to preserve it from evils, especially as our potatoes, like our apples, are the very best grown in the world—dry, mealy, and excellent in every respect. The principal varieties grown are: Prolifics, Burbanks, Farmers' Pride, Beauty of Hebron, Prince Alberts, and Garnet Chili. The last-named is the soundest growing potato raised here, but does not command quite so high a price as the white varieties."

"Next to potatoes, turnips and mangolds are raised in quantity for feeding to stock in the winter; the drought last year prevented the seed from germinating and threatened to destroy the crop altogether, but a second sowing came on nicely and there is a good crop. Parsnips and carrots are an average crop."

"Small Fruits.—If small fruit growers could plan to irrigate in dry seasons, I believe it would pay. Strawberries must have plenty of moisture after the fruit once forms. Currants, gooseberries, and raspberries yielded fairly well, and they are beginning to occupy an important place with some of our farmers. Mr. Newcomb, at the Landing, sold sixty dollars worth of raspberries of the Red Antwerp variety from a small patch. Mr. Jones marketed 60 bushels of gooseberries, and a quantity of raspberries, and red and black currants, which, with his strawberries, will probably exceed in value all the other products of his farm. There is money in this, there is no doubt, for there seems to be no difficulty in finding a ready market at 8 to 10 cents a quart."

"Tomatoes.—Mr. Patterson, of Acadia Villa, made an experiment of this popular and delicious fruit. Off one-sixth of an acre he sold $60 worth, finding a market in Wolfville and Halifax, and had as many more green and ripe left. He thinks he could double this off the same land by ripening earlier, but at $60 the returns would be $360 from one acre. Here is another chance for our farmers. I have observed that tons of tomatoes have been raised in different parts of the country this year. Mr. Patterson's were very smooth, deliciously-flavored tomatoes, and were preferred in Halifax to the American tomatoes even at double the price."

"Apples.—The apple has become the most valuable and important of all the products of our valley. The farmer, who, fifteen or twenty years ago, planted an orchard in spite of the opinion of many around him that he was doing a very foolish thing, and wasting valuable land, because there would never be a market and remunerative price for his apples, was a wise man in his day and generation, and has to-day a fortune and an independent income. I am told this same Mr. Byrnes who raised the plums, sold his whole orchard at $2.50 a barrel, and will realise $2,000 for this season's crop, and like results are being realised on a smaller scale all through this district and this valley."

"These are a few of the new orchards, and there is scarcely an old one that is not being enlarged; fully double as many trees have been planted this year as were growing the year previous, and if we keep on doubling the area of our orchards yearly, the valley will soon be a magnificent orchard from end to end, and, in another decade, we shall have the 1,000,000 barrels for which there is already room in the English market, and, with ocean steamers loading at Kingsport and at Horton Landing next season, when our wharf will be built, the freight and expenses should be reduced one-half. The yield of our orchards this year will fall short of the immense crop of '86 at least one-third, but the quality is superior and the price one dollar a barrel higher, so that the returns will fully equal those of last year. Gravensteins sold last year for $1 50; this year the price for the Boston market and in Halifax was $2.00—$3.00. Other varieties were sold for $2 and $2.50, and latest quotations from London range from 14—16 shilling for Greenings and Baldwins up to as high as 28 shillings for Ribstons."

"Prices.—The prices of all farm products are good, and everything manufactured much cheaper in proportion than the produce of the farm, and this happy state of affairs must bring prosperity to our farmers, and hence to all classes who are more or less dependent on the farmer. Hay is worth $9 to $12; beef, $5 to $8; oats, 40 to 50 cents; apples, $2 to $3; butter and eggs, 18 to 25 cents; potatoes, Chilis are being shipped at Wolfville for Bermuda (at 40 cents, and I have no doubt 50 cents will be paid for them to go to Montreal and United States."

The next is the report of the Yarmouth County Society, and you know there are a great many men in Yarmouth supporting the opposite side of the House, and surely they would not report anything but that was true. With reference to the exhibition the report says:

"Fruit was very fine, but there were not as many entries as in 1886, there being 199 as against 245 last year. Had all our growers contributed as they might, we would have had such an exhibit as would have surprised our neighbors from Annapolis. We are told by our fruit growers that it is useless to increase the apple crop, as we have no market; our answer to that is to cut out your soft fruit, graft the best kinds of hard and long keepers, and the day is not far distant when steamers will be at our wharves to carry the surplus stock to England or elsewhere."

"We confess that we were disappointed at the show of manufactured articles; while it is encouraging to be told that our mills are being run day and night to fill orders, that Montreal merchants are waiting for the Yarmouth tweeds; that the product of the cotton mill goes to every part of the Dominion; that the organ factory has 24 men at work and, in addition to supplying the local demand, is filling orders for Ontario; that the harness makers are so driven with custom work that they have not time to make a set of harness for exhibition, yet is discouraging to those who have labored to aid in making a reputation for our county and exhibitions not to receive the hearty co-operation of the manufacturers."

"Among the few firms who always aid is 'The Burrell-Johnson Iron Co.;" this company has never allowed any demand upon their time to interfere with their making their annual show, and the large exhibit of new and improved stoves, filling as it did, about 200 feet in length, aided much to make our exhibition complete and attractive. We hope that our next exhibition will be a more complete illustration of our motto, Typical Industries."

"Your committee is of the opinion that fisheries had better be eliminated from the prize list. Under the head special, we find evidence of thought and inventive genius. Mr. Sherman and Mr. Grant both exhibit agricultural implements, which are adapted to the use of farmers, and, if some capitalist would co-operate with such men, there might be another workshop established which would furnish employment, and keep more of our young men at home."

I do not think there is anything very discouraging in those reports that would warrant any gentleman in saying there was a necessity for some heroic measure, if we wish to save Canada from being ruined. Now, perhaps, hon. gentlemen opposite will contend that I have not given sufficient proof to support my contention that there is considerable progress down there. Well, I can give them further proof. I can give them the speeches of the Lieutenant Governors of Nova Scotia, from 1883 to the present, and every speech is redolent of the fact that the people in the Maritime Provinces are progressing in agriculture. In 1883 the Lieutenant Governor of Nova Scotia said:

"I congratulate you on the progress of the Province during the last year. The conditions of trade have steadily improved throughout the world, and the industries of Nova Scotia have enjoyed a fair share of the prosperity thus created."

Some hon. gentlemen are not content when they are in the cold shades of Opposition that a fair share of trade and progressiveness should be enjoyed by the country. They want to go in leaps and bounds to use the language of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), and I will show that hon. gentleman in a few moments in what way the farmers of Prince Edward Island have progressed by leaps and bounds. I will show him that their progress in agriculture has been by leaps and bounds up to the present time, notwithstanding any assertion of his to the contrary. The Lieutenant Governor continues as follows:—

"An abundant harvest, fortunately combined with a brisk and steady market for agricultural produce, has made the year one of more than usual prosperity to that great body of the people which is engaged in agricultural pursuits. During the year a special branch of this industry—for which our western valley is peculiarly fitted—has been placed on a footing which warrants the belief that, in the future, the produce of the orchard will form an important feature in our provincial exports. In this branch of agricultural industry the Province has no reason to fear competition from any quarter."

And it was in 1883 the Americans thought fit to take off their duty on this particular branch of agriculture, but, notwithstanding that, there has not been any greater trade with the United States than there was formerly. In fact, I think the contrary is the case, and that the increase of trade has been with England. Then, speaking of the progress of the fishery business, he says:

"I am glad to be able to inform you that the fishery—another of our leading industries—has, on the whole, been attended with success during the past year."

And this is put in the mouth of the Lieutenant Governor by a Grit Government, of which Attorney General Longley and Premier Fielding are the leading members. The Lieutenant Governor says further:

"It is with much pleasure I am able to inform you of the great development of the mining interests during the year. A brisk demand for the produce of the collieries has swollen the output of coal beyond that of any former year, and, from the preparations that are being made at the various mines, we may anticipate satisfactory results from the operations of the year upon which we have entered. The development of a business which not only affords employment to the large classes employed in mining and in shipping, but at the same time contributes to swell our local revenues, is well worthy of our fostering care and attention."

I wonder what developed that coal trade in Nova Scotia, if it was not the National Policy. Then I have extracts from the speeches of the Lieutenant Governor in 1884, 1885, 1886 and 1887 which I will hand to the reporter, as I do not wish to weary the House with reading them.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman proposes to hand in his extracts to the Hansard reporters. That would be establishing a very vicious practice, one which was objected to the other evening. I am not objecting to the hon. gentleman more than to any other hon. gentleman, but I wish simply to state that an understanding was arrived at long ago not to allow this practice, which would be very mischievous. In a discussion of this kind, we would have no means of knowing what the extracts contained, and no opportunity, when listening to the hon. gentleman, of answering what he has not seen fit to read.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Of course if the objection is taken, it is well taken. Of course it is contrary to the practice of Parliament for hon. gentlemen to hand in extracts of that kind. They should be read if they are to be put in Hansard.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). We did last year, in one or two cases, allow tabulated statements to be handed in to the Hansard reporter by the hon. the Minister of Finance, but on these occasions the statements could not be intelligently followed if read, and it was thought necessary to have them printed. That rule would not apply to extracts generally.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). If the hon. gentleman had been in his seat at the time, he would have heard that it was at the request of an hon. member on the opposite side that I thought of putting the papers in the hands of the Hansard reporters. I will, however, proceed to read them. In 1884 the Lieutenant Governor made the following speech:

"I congratulate you that we meet under circumstances which claim the expression of our gratitude as a people to the Supreme Governor of the Universe."

"The year has been one of gratifying activity in many of the branches of industry in which our population is engaged. If the commercial outlook for the moment is less satisfactory than might be desired, we may reasonably hope that by the exercise of that industry and prudence which so largely characterise our people the prosperity of the Province will be fairly maintained."

I have not the extracts of 1885, but the speech then was of the same congratulatory nature. In 1886, the Grit Government of Nova Scotia put in the mouth of the Lieutenant Governor a speech of which this is an extract:

"A more than usually favorable season enabled our farmers to gather an abundant harvest. The output of our coal mines was but little less than that of the previous year and the product of our gold mines was larger than for many years before."

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis.)

"I notice with pleasure that the important industry of fruit growing is receiving increased attention. Efforts which have been made during the year to establish and extend the reputation of our fruit in the markets of the mother country have met with gratifying success; collections of the products of our orchards were placed in competition with those of other countries and won the highest praise."

In 1886, this was placed in the mouth of the Lieutenant Governor:

"The varied industries of our Province were prosecuted during the past year with considerable vigor, and the results in some departments were highly satisfactory. The agriculturists, who form the largest part of our population, were favored with a good season and an abundant harvest."

"Our fishermen were fairly rewarded. Mining operations have been extensively carried on and the outlook for the present year is encouraging."

"I notice with pleasure increased activity in gold mining operations. Old districts are being extensively worked, new ones are being opened up in several sections of the Province, and there are many indications that practical miners and capitalists have great confidence in the gold mines of Nova Scotia as a field for industry and investment."

Then there is the following extract from the speech of the Lieutenant Governor in 1888:

"In welcoming you to the scene of your legislative duties, I am glad to be able to congratulate you on the fair measure of prosperity enjoyed by your Province during the past year, while in some quarters exceptional conditions have operated unfavorably, as a rule the labors of our people, in the various branches of industry, have been remunerative, and there has been an improvement in business which, it is hoped, will continue."

"I have particular pleasure in calling attention to the activity that prevailed in mining, an industry of great importance not only because of the capital and labor engaged in it, but also because of its value as a contributor to our provincial revenues."

Now then, Mr. Speaker, the same kind of an address was placed in the mouth of the Lieutenant Governor of Prince Edward Island in 1886. He said:

"It is most gratifying to observe the steady progress that is being made by the Province in agriculture, stock raising and other industrial pursuits. This advancement was well evidenced at the exhibition which took place last autumn. A wider field for competition will shortly be afforded at the Colonial Exhibition which opens in London next month and in which I am pleased to know this Province will participate."

And here is an extract from the Monetary Times of February, 1886, which shows the condition of Prince Edward Island:

"The figures for Prince Edward Island are very striking. If statistics can be relied on the trade of the Island it must be in an uncommonly healthy position."

Is not this indirect contradiction to what we have heard from some hon. members from Prince Edward Island and from the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) and from the members of the Opposition generally who have spoken on this. These are not my assertions, though I know them to be true, but I take them from the mouths of their own friends, from the mouths of the Grit Governments, the Grit farmers, the Grit manufacturers of Yarmouth, because that statement was accepted by the Agricultural Society of Yarmouth, and that constituency sent an hon. member here on the other side of the House with a majority of 500 or 600, and it was about the same for the hon. member for King's, Nova Scotia (Mr. Borden). So, out of their own mouths I have convicted them. A great deal has been said about the population of Nova Scotia and of the Maritime Provinces generally. I contend that the population of the Maritime Provinces has increased in a much larger proportion than the population of the New England States, and I have statistics here to show that that is true, and these statistics have not been controverted. From the years 1830-31 to 1881, we will see what the increase was in those fifty years in Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Connecticut and Rhode Island. In 1830-31, those States had a population of 1,953,717, and in 1881 a population of 4,010,026 or an increase in 50 years of 2,056,309. Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island had a population in 1831 of 1,065,215, and in 1881 of 4,141,424, or an increase in 50 years of 3,076,209. The New England States had doubled in that time while the population of Canada had quadrupled. Perhaps some hon. gentleman will say that is not a fair comparison. We will divide the States and compare Maine with the Maritime Provinces. In 1831 Maine had a population of 399,455, and in 1881 of 648,436, or an increase of 248,981 in 50 years. The population of the Maritime Provinces in 1830-31 amounted to 275,379, and in 1881 to 869,495, an increase of 584,116. Maine in 50 years had increased 62 per cent. while the Maritime Provinces had increased 212 per cent. in the same time. Then, if you take Maine and compare it with New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, for 20 years from 1860-61 to 1881, you will find that Maine in 1860-61 had a population of 628,279, and in 1887 a population of 648,436, an increase of 20,157 in 20 years. New Brunswick and Nova Scotia in 1860-61 had a population of 582,940, and in 1881 of 761,714, an increase of 178,774. Maine which 20 years ago had 45,000 more people than New Brunswick and Nova Scotia combined, now has 113,000 less, and in that has increased only 3 per cent. while New Brunswick and Nova Scotia have increased 30 per cent. I could make another comparison between Maine, New Hampshire and Vermont, and Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. The former increased 31 per cent. between 1860 and 1880 while the latter Provinces increased 169 per cent. in the same 20 years. Does that not show that we are increasing fairly in proportion with the rest of the countries of the world? I say that we are, and that, in view of these facts, we can only come to the conclusion that it is a bit of political pettifoggery which brings forward this resolution. I say that my constituency, like the constituency indicated by the report of the Agricultural Society of King's County which I have just read, would like a reciprocity treaty with the United States, but they see that it is utterly impossible to get a reciprocity treaty. They know, and every sensible man knows, that nothing short of annexation will give us a reciprocity treaty with the United States. The United States people, and the United States papers, and the United States politicians all say the same thing, which was conveyed in the coarse language of Senator Frye, "Conquest I know, annexation I know, but what the hell is Commercial Union," or unrestricted reciprocity? They know very well what it would be to come over with sword and bullet and wrest our fair Canada from us, and join us to them body and soul, but they know nothing of Commercial Union or unrestricted reciprocity. Have not hon. gentlemen tried time and again to get a fair system of trade with the United States? Did not the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), when leader of the late Government, assert upon the floor of this House that time and again we have been knocking at the doors of the United States for fair reciprocal trade and have been refused? Has not the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) often asserted that it was not the proper thing for us to go cringing to these people, asking for commercial favors? We all know that it is impossible, in any department of life, to get anything if you go humbly cringing and kissing the feet of the party of whom you want a favor. What would unrestricted reciprocity do? It would ruin Canada's credit, it would have a tendency that way; I do not say it would ruin it, because I think that the parties who control the money market of England understand the true motive of the resolution before the House. It would be a nice thing, I admit, if the amendment of the senior member for Halifax could be realised. The shipping of our Province would be benefited by it, there is not a doubt about that. But how are you going to get it? It puts me in mind of a little boy that had been trying to take charge of his mother's house. He found that he could not take charge, and he received a spanking and was set back in the chair and was told to sit there until the rays of the moon came in through the window. He thinks of nothing else until he sees the rays of the moon. Then he commences to blubber and says: "Mother, give me the moon to play with." The hon. gentleman's resolution, asking the United States for reciprocal trade without annexation, is like the boy asking his mother for the moon to play with. Therefore I shall not vote in favor of that amendment, neither shall I vote in favor of the resolution, but I shall record my vote in favor of the amendment of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. ELLIS. The country the hon. gentleman has described is one of the most beautiful on the face of the globe. It is fertile and productive in every way; but still the hon. gentleman says that a treaty would be desirable. He does not deny that, he cannot deny that. But, Sir, I regret to find that the fertility of the soil and the genialty of the climate do not touch the hon. gentleman himself. In the list of articles that he mentions, which the poor man need not use, he includes a number of things which I think any man might expect to use. Musical instruments, the hon. gentleman says, the poor man may do without. He would not like the poor man to have Christmas cards, and a variety of other things. I take it that anything that a rich man might use in this country a poor man might have too. I do not understand why the poor man should come between the hon. gentleman and his nobility. What is he doing but drawing a line between the rich and the poor, providing that a certain line of articles can be used by the rich from which the poor shall be excluded. I think that is the absolute result of the hon. gentleman's argument. Now I wish to deal with this question without reference to personalities, as it refers to the Province of New Brunswick from which I come. Most of the hon. gentlemen who have discussed this question seem to assume that the Province of Ontario was the whole of this Confederation; they seem to have lost sight entirely of the fact that nearly 900,000 people live east of the confines of Ontario. We have heard a good deal about the Ontario farmer, as if, provided that the Ontario farmer was happy, all the rest of the country must be happy too. Now, I will endeavor to show the House that that is not the case. I shall use official statistics, so far as they may be reliable. I have not consulted the statistics of Canada for 20 years. Last evening, I found out in this House that probably the American statistics were more reliable; however, I have taken Canadian statistics, and I will take my stand upon them. Now, I do not present these figures for the purpose of showing any difference between the National Policy and the policy which preceded it. But this fact does come out, that for 11 years after New Brunswick and Nova Scotia entered the Confederation, the balance of trade, that is to say, the trade of the world in which we were concerned, was in our favor, and we were able to import more goods for consumption than we exported.

In other words, we are able to buy in the markets of the world 61,000,000, representing the surplus of our imports over our exports. Take the case of New Brunswick alone. We exported $64,000,000 worth, and we imported $90,000,000 worth, leaving a balance in our favor of $25,000,000. Take the second period. The figures for Ontario are: Exports $226,815,000, for domestic consumption $339,671,000, imports $346,964,000. Province of Quebec, exports $361,938,000, domestic consumption $364,593,000, imports $425,366,000. The total was exports $628,753,000, consumption $704,264,000, imports $772,530,000. The surplus of goods entered for consumption in that period of nine years, the second period, from 1878 to the close of the last fiscal year, by the Upper Provinces over exports was $76,511,000 and over imports $143,777,000. Look now at the Maritime Provinces and see how we were affected by this condition of affairs. The figures for the Maritime Provinces are as follows: Nova Scotia exported $77,323,000 and was able to buy in foreign markets only $69,284,000. New Brunswick for the same period exported $59,676,000, entered for consumption $53,602,000, imports $52,792,000. Prince Edward Island, the position of which is far worse than that of any of the Provinces, exported $14,195,000 and entered for consumption $7,102,000, importing only $6,926,000. The totals for the Maritime Provinces were: exports, $151,194,000; home consumption, $129,938,000; imports, $134,110,000; less per cent. as against exports, $21,205,000; as against imports, $17,084,000. The effect of this is that, while during eleven years we were able to buy in the markets of the world, in this later period we have not been able to do so, and so far as we are concerned the trade has been entirely lost. I take now the tonnage of ships. I will not say that the extinction of our tonnage is due to the National Policy, but I am entitled to point out that the condition of affairs in the country is such that it should engage the attention of the House, and while it is very well for hon. gentlemen opposite to come here and sing songs of rejoicing, they who do so know nothing about the condition of the Maritime Provinces. They take mere off-hand statements, but if they want to know the facts they must examine matters for themselves. A great deal has been made as to what happened under the Mackenzie Government. In 1873 the tonnage of New Brunswick was 277,000 tons. This amount increased during the term of the Mackenzie Government to 335,000 tons; in 1879 it reached its highest point 340,000 and it has since fallen to 255,000 tons. We built and registered in 1874, 42,000 tons of shipping; 1875, 33,000 tons; in 1886 we built and registered only 4,931 tons. The industry of ship-building was one of the great industries of New Brunswick. Nothing has taken its place. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) the other day, referring to the maritime fishing industry, made a statement to the effect that something like 100,000 tons of shipping were built in the Maritime Provinces. In New Brunswick alone we have built in times past that much shipping. In 1864 the value of the ships we built was $3,900,000, representing over 90,000 tons, and that was in New Brunswick alone. The total decrease in the shipping of the Maritime Provinces last year was 40,000 tons. That is really a complete displacement of property. The value has so much decreased that it is almost impossible to give the property away. I do not, of course, mean to convey the idea that you cannot give property away, but the property has declined in value so that the owners are glad to obtain a very small proportion of its cost. Taking the low rate of $20 a ton for 40,000 tons there appears to be a decrease of $800,000. I recollect that sometime ago an estate, winding up in St. John, placed in the market ship property which cost at the very least $100,000 and they were glad to obtain $20,000 for it and extend the payments over a very long period. I desire to call the attention of the House to a statement made by Mr. Fairweather with respect to losses sustained in the fishing industry. He is probably known to many members, he is a prominent Conservative, a member of the Board of Trade, and a man of undoubted character, and any certificate I could give him would be unnecessary. Mr. Fairweather in enumerating the causes of the difficulties that have come upon the Province of New Brunswick, says:

"Unremunerative shipping property—310,000 tons is about New Brunswick's amount. This at a cost value (low enough) of $30 per ton comes to the sum of $9,300,000. In years past the yield from vessel property was 20 per cent. I place it at 10 per cent. annual return on the investment and find that a sum of $930,000 per annum came to us in St. John from our ships and vessels in prosperous years. At present profits are almost nil, or say not much over a fourth or a fifth of the above sum."

He further says:

"Our ship-building—I pause before the magnitude of the loss we have sustained in the decadence of this industry. Within my recollection I believe there have been times when from 75 to 100 ships of an average of 500 tons (many 1,000 tons and larger) were in course of construction in a radius 50 miles of St. John. You can estimate what the number is to-day and the loss of employment and the non-circulation of money which is involved. What class of the people of this country was not benefited by our ship-building trade? We cannot name a class that was not advantaged directly or indirectly thereby. If I ask you to set down for yourselves what you may think is a sum correctly representing our annual loss through the decline of ship-building it is because I am unable to form an estimate that at all satisfies me of its correctness."

Mr. Fairweather estimated the loss of ship-building to St. John at not less than $1,000,000 a year. It is impossible for an industry to decline to such an extent without having an effect upon the population. I desire to call the attention of the House to the question of population, although I know hon. gentlemen opposite do not like it, and although I may say with respect to this matter of population in this country there has always been a kind of feeling that the country ought to have more people and would have more people than really has had or than it will have within a period which any man can imagine. I remember, Sir, in 1862 when the Intercolonial delegates were in England that they told the Colonial Secretary in the State paper which they laid before the Colonial Office, that in 15 years the population of the old Provinces alone would be somewhere between 12,000,000 and 15,000,000 of people. That was in 1862, and I do not think, Sir, we have more than 4,800,000 to-day. Now, Sir, take the entire population of our Province. In 1851 it was 193,800, and it had increased 25.84 per cent. from 1840. Between 1851 and 1861 it increased 30.05, and in 1871 it reached 295,000. The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that the descent and the decline in our population are to be dated from the time that we entered Confederation. It is impossible to say at this moment whether there is any increase in the Province of New Brunswick in the period since the last census was taken to the present time. We have no Government statistics and the only way you can reach any idea whatever in regard to the population is from the school returns. The total number of children at school in 1880 was 69,000 and in 1887 we find from the returns just submitted to the Provincial Legislature that it was 68,583 or a decline of 1,009. These are the official figures. I do not say you can draw from the man inference either one way or the other, as there may be circumstances which would prevent in one year a larger attendance or as large an attendance of children as in another. They seem to me to show at any rate that there is no increase of population at all. Taking each period for which we have actual census returns by counties the population of the Province increased some 36,000, I think it is, and nearly one-half of the increase is in three counties alone. The county of Carleton (N.B.) represented by my friend on the left, and the county of Victoria, represented by the Minister of Inland Revenue, rich and fertile counties, have increased their population, but that increase of population and the wealth growing in that community, is due, I take it, to the fact that there is an excellent underground system of railways with the States. These counties lie alongside the American border, and they have opportunities there for trading with the States on the principles of unrestricted reciprocity, of which some gentlemen are so much afraid. In no other counties of the Province has there been such a large increase of population. The population of Westmoreland increased 8,000. This is a good agricultural county represented by a gentleman who spoke last night. But Sir, the main reason for the increase in that county is that the Intercolonial Railway works are there. A large amount of public money has been spent there, and the spending of that money in the county has as much influence, I take it, as anything else in increasing the population. In addition to that Sir, there is a large number of Acadians in the population and I think they do not move as much as our own people do; at least I mean the people of English birth, for I do not desire to draw any distinction. The county of Albert, represented by an hon. gentleman who is not now in his seat, has a population of 10,000 and it increased only 1,500. In the city of St. John, which I represent here, the population has fallen off, and it was inevitable that the population of the city of St. John should decrease. It was 28,805 in 1871, and the decrease in the business of the city has reduced the population by 2,700. There is a slight increase in the county, but the whole increase in the city and county of St. John where there were 52,100 people in 1871 amounts only to such an extent as to give a population of 52,900 in the year 1881. That represents the entire increase in one of the first commercial cities on the Atlantic coast of Canada. Now, Sir, what earthly use is it for hon. gentlemen who represent the Province of Ontario, hon. gentlemen who represent the Province of Quebec to get up in this House and tell us that the condition of things is perfectly satisfactory. Have those gentlemen no interest in the Maritime Provinces? Have they not a common feeling with us? Have they no desire to make us feel that we are part of the country? I would ask the hon. gentlemen to take the matter home to themselves and consider the condition of things as it stands with us. In the county of Sunbury one of the finest agricultural counties in the Province, situated on the banks of a noble river, and where there is excellent land, there is no reason in the world why the community should not have increased in population if there was a fair opportunity for the people to dispose of their products. But the farmer has no opportunity. He has to leave his house and home, and I know numbers of houses, Sir, in various parts of the Province of New Brunswick where people have left their houses untenanted and unoccupied. I have myself taken refuge in them when on fishing excursions, and somehow like the old stories in the fable it looked as if we might expect the master of the house to return at any moment. The county of Queen's had a population of 13,847 in 1871, and that, Sir, is a fine county, just as fine as the county of Sunbury, with a large water board, as it is situated on the lake and on the river St. John. Its population is now 14,000, or an increase of about 100 in ten years for one of the finest counties that we can meet with anywhere in Canada. Perhaps it is not as fine as the county represented by my hon. friend who spoke last and which county possesses peculiar excellence, but I do not see where we can get a better county.

Mr. GILLMOR. Have you got the returns for Charlotte there?

Mr. ELLIS. I think Charlotte has increased as the opportunities for smuggling are as great there as in the other counties. In 1871 the population of Charlotte was 25,882, and it has increased only to 26,000 in 1887 or about 200. I do not care to particularise that county, but it, too, has opportunities of very great excellency. It seems to me that there is no reason whatever if there was any opportunity for the people to encourage trade why the population does not increase. But, Sir, the population goes away. They are to be found in all parts of the United States. Hon. gentlemen come here and give disquisitions about people moving westward; but they are to be found in all parts of the United States. You can find many of them in the New England States. In Boston there are more of our people from New Brunswick to-day than there are in Fredericton, the capital of the Province. Now, Sir, that is not a state of things which ought to be satisfactory to hon. gentlemen opposite. Probably someone may get up and explain it away, and may think it is all right, but I tell you it is not all right. This condition of things is producing dissatisfaction in the Province and it will have the effect either of taking the Province out of Confederation altogether or causing the Government to do something to stop the evil. There is nothing more appalling than to take up the census of Canada and see what a large number have left the country. The hon. gentleman read a paper, showing that in 1853 or some other year there was a great exodus, and argued from that fact that the same thing was going on every year; and the next moment he turned around and showed from a speech made by Mr. Howe that there was no exodus at all. The hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) the other evening had to admit that men who had the benefit of the highest education we could give them left us. Well, Sir, if we cannot keep the educated men in the country, what is the use of keeping the country together? What is a country for if not for its people? I do not say that there are not always people moving about over the earth, particularly with the facilities we have to-day; but when such an immense number leave the country as are going now, you are face to face with a fact that should arrest the attention of the Government at once. Taking the United States census of 1880, and looking at the selected occupations, I find that among the Canadians in the United States there are 2,617 engaged in school teaching, 930 clergymen, 559 lawyers—I suppose they can be well spared—and 1,352 official employes of the Government of the United States—I presume of the States Governments—about as many as we have in Ottawa. There are 2,219 iron and steel workers from Canada in the United States. When is the iron policy we adopted the other day going to bring these people back? There are 5,570 Canadians engaged as official employes of the railroads in the United States. Now, I will not pursue that branch of the subject any further; I merely call the attention of the House to the facts, and I leave hon. gentlemen to draw their own inferences. Now, I would like to ask hon. members who have discussed this question if they can suggest any idea as to how the trade we have lost is to be restored to us. Mr. Fairweather undertook to show that there was a Canadian trade—a trade with the Upper Provinces. The figures have been referred to before. I do not know under which king to serve; but the hon. Minister of Marine the other night got up and said that Mr. Longley stated in Halifax that there was a trade of $12,000,000, that the Upper Provinces sent goods to that value to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. My hon. friend from Annapolis stated to-night that Mr. Longley said nothing of the kind, but went through his county and declared that there was no trade at all. I do not know which of these gentlemen is the more truthful; I do not know either very well.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). I rise to an explanation. What I said was that Mr. Longley went through my county and stated that the Maritime Provinces had nothing to send to Quebec and Ontario, but that they were flooded with Montreal and Quebec drummers—

Mr. KIRK. That is true.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis)—and that we were purchasing $12,000,000 of goods from those people.

Mr. ELLIS. The hon. gentleman certainly did not make that explanation in that way before. However, as long as we can get two gentlemen on that side to agree, we have something accomplished. Mr. Fairweather was very anxious to show that for the loss of trade that had occurred a trade had grown up, and I believe that his statement was correct, so far as I can judge from the figures. He claimed that the Maritime Provinces sent $1,270,000 worth of goods to the Upper Provinces, and he gives a statement of how he makes up that amount. He says, for instance, that we sent $1,695,000 worth of sugar. Well, Sir, we do not produce sugar; we do not grow sugar. That is no export from the Maritime Provinces. It is true, the sugar may come in there and be manipulated, or it may be simply carried over the railways for the benefit of the dealer in Montreal; but the amount of profit our people can make on it is exceedingly small; in fact, I think there is no profit at all. I recollect that last year a sugar refinery in Westmoreland got into difficulty with its creditors, and they had to take payment for its debt in the stock of the company. Then, we sent to the upper provinces, $474,000 worth of iron. I do not know whether it was Londonderry iron or not, but it did not go from the Province of New Brunswick. $760,000 worth of coal was sent, which did not go from the Province of New Brunswick, because we do not produce any coal. $750,000 worth of cotton was sent. None of these things are produced in the Province of New Brunswick. Mr. Fairweather goes through a number of items in the same way; but I have gone carefully over the list and I cannot find more than $300,000 worth of goods that have gone from New Brunswick to Ontario and Quebec, and even that, I think, is a large estimate. A portion of that amount represents fish, and that trade has not been a profitable one. Then Mr. Fairweather undertook to show that there were $12,000,000 worth of goods came from the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec to the Maritime Provinces, and he calculated that of this, $3,150,000 was food in various forms—flour and oatmeal I presume. What effect would a reciprocity treaty with the United States have upon this? I presume it would have no effect. I presume it would make no difference to you if we bought the same amount from Ontario and Quebec, whether there was reciprocity or not. But if you argue that reciprocity would take trade away from you, then it is clear that we are being taxed on $3,150,000 worth of food. Now we have a great regard for you, but we do not care to pay a tax on the food you send us. Then there is $2,000,000 worth of clothing sent from Montreal, and a considerable amount in other articles. With regard to the trade in boots and shoes, $2,000,000 worth came to us from Ontario and Quebec. Well, before we had that trade with Ontario and Quebec, we made our own

Mr. ELLIS.

boots and shoes. There were then factories in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick in a most flourishing condition, and whatever the reason may be, I do not pretend to say, but certainly all these factories without exception are closed. That is a position of things which is neither gratifying nor satisfactory. So with regard to clothing. A few years ago, we made all our own clothing, but now the trade has passed into your hands. Is it a profitable trade to you? I think not. Any one who knows anything about the trade knows that almost all who have ever engaged in it have been obliged to close out without meeting their liabilities. The conditions of trade have been such that the trade has not been profitable, and Mr. Fairweather himself does not say it is profitable; he only hopes it will become profitable. There is a long course of carriage, and the fact of it is that within the last five years the failures in the Province of Nova Scotia alone have amounted to $8,750,000, and the assets are not the quarter that amount. That is due to the fact that we have lost a remunerative trade and are not able to keep up a trade which is unremunerative. The hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries called attention to the business done in the sugar trade. Now, I do not know anything of the profits made on sugar, but I know that so far as the great bulk of raw sugar for the Montreal refineries in the Upper Provinces is concerned, it does not pass over our railways, but is landed at the port of Boston and carried thence over railways to Montreal. The hon. gentleman laid great stress on the benefit that arose from the fact that these goods came in the way they do. But I take it, the profits to our shipping on the carriage of the goods if they came from England—and I presume our ships could carry clean sugar as cheaply as raw sugar—would be greater, and, so far as the railways are concerned, it makes not the slightest difference to them whether they carry clean or unwashed sugar. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries in endeavoring to make a statement with regard to the trade of the country, called attention to the registered tonnage. The hon. member for Queen's, P. E. I. (Mr. Davies) also dealt with that subject, but I would like to call your attention, Sir, for one moment to the condition of things in that regard. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries produced a statement of the registered tonnage arriving and departing from our ports, and he said it showed an increase between 1880 and 1887, on an average, of 3,000,000 tons a year. Now, when a Minister of the Crown undertakes to make a comparative statement he ought to be fair in his statement, and I regret the hon. gentleman is not here when I call the attention of the House to his unfairness. He took the short period from 1875 to 1879, in which there were two very poor years, so as to bring his average up to 3,000,000 of an increase. If, however, he had taken instead any corresponding period of years, if he had taken the years from 1870 and made a comparison he would have reduced his average by three-quarters million. But, the hon. gentleman asked in a very of a jaunty manner: "What have these vessels been doing?" Do they come in and go out, he asked, just for the mere fun of the thing. Well, in the year 1875, when the amount of tonnage was comparatively small as contrasted with other years, there were 9,537,000 tons entered inwards and outwards, there was brought into the country $201,000,000, worth of goods. Now, I do not say that all these goods were brought by vessels. Of course the railroad did a part of the work, but last year when the tonnage was 14,000,000 there were only $202,000,000 worth brought in. So that the hon. gentleman's figures really prove nothing, so far as the trade is concerned, because they are made up of vessels entering into and departing from our ports. I find on examination of the figures, which the hon. gentleman gave, that the lake tonnage of 1870 was 5,510,000 tons; in 1871 it was 7,310,000; in 1872, 6,320,000; and in 1887, 5,169,000 tons, or 2,000,000 less in 1887 than in 1881, showing a constant decline since 1871 in the lake tonnage of Ontario. In the Province of Quebec the following is a statement of the vessels entered in and out:—

|-----------------|-----------|
| In 1884 | 3,107,000 |
| 1887 | 2,993,000 |
| 1886 | 1,188,000 |
| Last year | 1,185,000 |

The hon. gentleman partly suggested an explanation of this, but at the port of St. John, and others in the Maritime Provinces there are steamers engaged in carrying people away from all parts of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick to the United States. Undoubtedly these vessels carry freight, but their principal business is in carrying passengers. The tonnage of foreign steamers which entered the port of St. John in 1887 was 270,175. About one-third of the whole shipping that entered the port of St. John was foreign steamers. I do not know that we had any foreign steamers except American steamers, with the exception perhaps of one Spanish vessel. I find also that the totals for the last two years for Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island have increased very much, and the explanation of that is that the vessels we compel to enter inwards and outwards but do not allow to trade, go to swell up these returns; so I think there is nothing whatever in the statement the hon. gentleman made in regard to the increase of trade. In addition to the decline of trade, the taxation of the country has increased. I know that hon. gentlemen do not like to hear anything about the fact of the increase of taxation, but you Sir, can easily understand that, with the increase of population, or rather with a population that does not increase, with a declining trade, taxation becomes more heavy on those who remain. I remember in 1867, when the Hon. Mr. Tilley, who was afterwards Minister of Finance and is now the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick, undertook to persuade us into Confederation, he told us:

"There would be no increase of taxation; the Canadian tariff would not necessarily be introduced into New Brunswick. In a few days he would publish an estimate showing that the expense of the Confederation would not exceed $11,000,000, which was about equal to $2.75 per head of the whole population. He would put it forth to the world and defy successful contradiction."

And again:

"They would fully meet the entire expenses of the Federal Government by a tariff of only $2.75 per head on the population."

Well, the interest on the debt alone now is about $2.70 a head, so that the amount which the hon. gentleman stated would be sufficient for all the purposes of Confederation is now taken up by the payment on the public debt. In 1867, the gross debt of the Province of New Brunswick was $5,923,000, or about $20 a head on the people, taking the assumed population of 1867. From the figures submitted here, the present debt is $48 a head. Making a calculation as near as I can, I think the share of the net debt chargeable to that Province will be about $16,000,000. In addition to that we have the provincial debt, which would bring it to about $17,500,000, the annual charge for which would be about $900,000, against $330,000, when we closed our provincial accounts and entered into Confederation. There is no objection to a debt if you are able to pay, but we are not able to bear the burden the debt imposes upon us, and we are not able to meet the payment to-day of even the smaller burden of the debt with which we went into Confederation. The consequence is that a chronic state of dissatisfaction has grown up in the Province of New Brunswick.

Mr. KIRK. And Nova Scotia.

Mr. ELLIS. My hon. friend says it is the same in Nova Scotia. I know every part of New Brunswick, and I am satisfied as to the feelings of the people in regard to that matter. It is true, when an election is to be run, that a gentleman may be sent to support the Government, because the people take the condition of things existing, and make the best possible bargain they can. There is a constant effort on the part of the government—of any government—I do not desire to refer so much to the form or the individuality of the present Government, as I do to refer to things generally. I remember that last year Mr. Everett, whose seat is now occupied by my hon. friend here (Mr. Skinner) addressed a meeting in Carleton, where I live myself, which forms a part of the city of St. John, last February, and said:

"The people looked forward to the time when this would be the great winter port of Canada. Carleton offered grand facilities for the handling of freight, and in that part of the city necessary grain elevators and warehouses would be erected. In a year or fifteen months elevators would be seen on our harbor front, and steamers would be here taking in cargoes of grain for the mother country."

I live on that side of the harbor, and not far from the harbor front, but there was not a sign of the construction of a grain elevator there when I left. On the day before the election, the Government organ, the Sun, said:

"We want elevators and other terminal facilities. We have asked for an engineer and the engineer has been sent."

The hon. the Minister of Public Works will understand that.

"If the Government is strong enough in the next House to defy Mr. Blake, all may be well."

The Government was strong enough to defy Mr. Blake, but, unfortunately for us, all is not well. But, however humiliating the spectacle may be of seeing the public men of the country going through the constituencies and promising at election times that this and that work shall be undertaken, it is far more humiliating to come to this Parliament and to hear these things thrown up to the Government and to hear them reproached not only with the fact that their pledges are unfulfilled but with the fact that they were made at all. If Mr. Fairweather's statement as to what we buy from the upper Provinces is correct, we have to get money somewhere to pay what we do pay. What is the condition of our foreign trade at the present time? Our foreign trade is principally carried on with Great Britain and the United States. In 1881, we sold to all the countries with which we dealt $6,406,000, and in 1882, $7,474,000. But there has been a decline, and in 1887 the Province of New Brunswick only sold $6,149,000 worth, so that there has been a decline in our foreign trade since 1882 of more than $1,300,000 worth. That is so far as our exports are concerned. Our imports are in the same condition. We imported in 1881, $6,000,000 worth, and from that time to 1887, with the exception of one year, there has been a decline, and in 1887 the amount was $5,653,000. Look at the movement of that trade. In 1881 we sold more than half our exports to England. We sold $3,265,000 out of a total of $6,406,000. In the same year we sold to the United States $2,324,000. Up to 1884, we sold in England a larger proportion of our goods, but there has been a steady decline until the amount has fallen from $3,800,000 to $2,600,000. On the other hand, our trade with the United States has increased until it has gone up to $2,340,000. As we do not sell so much in England, neither do we buy so much from that country, hon. gentlemen who are so very patriotic with regard to buying from the mother country ought to take up this matter and regulate it. They are face to face with the fact that in the important Province of New Brunswick, founded, as the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) said last night, by the United Empire Loyalists, trade has declined with Great Britain and has materially increased with the United States. Now, I would like to call attention for a moment to a peculiarity of our trade. The river St. John flows through American territory as well as through British territory. The dwellers on the upper portion of the river reside in the State of Maine, and they have the right, and it is proper that they should, to navigate the river, as every man should living upon it, who pays his lot and part towards maintaining the works on the river. The people living on the American territory cut their logs—or rather we cut them for them, and they are rolled into the St. John River and floated down stream to the booms, 80 miles from the mouth, where they are collected indiscriminately, and the logs of my hon. friend on my right, if he were a lumbermen, would float alongside of the logs of a man who might be an American. The people who are engaged in cutting, and the horses that are employed, belong to New Brunswick, and but the customs authority, as is probably perfectly right, makes a distinction between goods that are raised in Canada and goods that are produced in the United States. They practically all are produced in the United States, so far as that is concerned, and when these logs reach the mouth of the river they are sawn there. Now, I want to call the attention to this matter of the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Porter) who, I am sorry to see, is not in his place, because he spoke the other night in a rather contemptuous way about the people of Canada being hewers of wood and drawers of water for the Americans; and I know that it would make his patriotic soul feel sad if he were to understand the condition of things in New Brunswick to-day. The principal industry at the mouth of the St. John River now is the manufacture of the American logs into lumber. The rate of duty charged in the United States on all our lumber is $2 a thousand, but on the American log there is no duty, and gentlemen who are wrestling with the question of who pays the duty, may take this in their calculation. These logs, cut on American soil, were cut by our people, and manufactured in the mills at the mouth of the river, and they enter the United States free of duty; but the man who may be fortunate enough, or unfortunate enough, to be a British subject, who owns a British mill, when his logs go into the United States, has to pay $2 a thousand duty. Now, there is one thing sure—the man who puts lumber into the American market pays the duty in the first instance; whether he ever gets it back again I cannot tell. The practical result of this industry at the mouth of the St. John River is that mills that years ago were built by British capital, and were employed in manufacturing lumber for the British market, have passed into the hands of Americans to-day, and the Canadian people are hewers of wood—or sawers of wood—and drawers of water for these Americans who own mills at the mouth of the river. Now, I desire to call attention to the export of lumber from New Brunswick to the United States. As I said before, in the year 1881, the whole quantity amounted to $2,334,000, and in the customs returns $1,583,000 is put down as the products of New Brunswick, and $750,000 as the product of the United States. We are compelled now to depend upon this trade in some way, and the goods not the produce of New Brunswick have grown from $750,000 to $1,334,000 in the period between 1881 and 1887. What would be the effect under reciprocity? The discrimination between these goods would be swept away, and the Canadian lumber on the River St. John, no matter where the lumber went, would have the benefit of the market; he would be put on equal ground with the American. Now, the duty levied upon cut lumber amounts to about 35 per cent.; I think our lumbermen speak of it as about $4 a thousand. We are compelled by the conditions of trade simply to cut the lumber up in the rough and sell it that way. What we want, and what we must have, by some means or other, is the lumber trade of the United States, that is, we will have to get the right in some way to get our lumber to the United States market after we manufacture it at home, not simply to take it away in the rough, and carry it, as you do sugar, with all its dirt and impurity. We want to profit from the product of our own labor upon this lumber before we carry it to the markets of the United States. Moreover, the trade which we do with other countries is declining, for a variety of reasons. At one time we carried on quite a trade in lumber along the Mediterranean ports, but the conditions have changed entirely, and we sell far less lumber in the Mediterranean ports. The lumber now required there is served to the smaller ports of Italy, Spain and France, and is carried there in small steamers from the various forests of Europe, and that lumber is gradually driving our lumber entirely out of those markets. The trade we once did, to a considerable extent, with France, has gradually declined. In 1882 our exports to France were of the value of $494,000—more being sent from New Brunswick than from any other Province; they have fallen to $160,000. Our exports to Italy and Spain were of the value of $98,000 in 1882, they have fallen to $50,000. It is the same with different countries with which we do business. We have lost the trade, and we do not therefore obtain the profits. I desire to call attention to the changes that have taken place in our transatlantic shipments. I have a statement of the lumber trade of New Brunswick, and I may explain that part of this lumber may come from Nova Scotia, but that has been the case year after year and does not make a difference in the proportion. The lumber is brought down in small vessels to St. John. In 1883 the shipments were of the value of $404,000,000, in 1887 they had fallen to the value of $257,000,000, they have in fact fallen steadily; in 1881 there were $404,000,000; 1884, $331,000,000; 1885, $289,000,000; 1886, $272,000,000; 1887, $252,000. Thus it is apparent that the trade has decreased one-third, and it will steadily decrease, as we are not able to place the goods on the English market on as advantageous terms as our rivals, because the competition year by year from the ports in the Baltic, the wood of which is cheaper and more suitable and more rapidly transported. The statement was made by the American consul in St. John that we sent to the United States last year about fifty millions of lumber in the form of laths, shooks, &c., on which there was a duty paid of $100,000. I do not know whether the consumer ever got it back or not, but I state the fact that it was paid; and as the Americans at the mouth of the river do not pay any duty, there is that much duty as against us. Now, with regard to the condition of our home trade. The exports of the country are grouped together under the heads of mining, fishing, agricultural products, and so forth. I have prepared a statement showing each class, and I will summarise it. The total exports of New Brunswick, of the mine, in 1887, amounted to $132,016, of which we sent $118,354 to the United States. Our total fish exports amounted to $729,060, of which $554,538 went to the United States. The products of the forest $4,498,572, of which $1,812,529 went to the United States, and this item is growing constantly. The next item is products of the farm. Whatever may be said in regard to the question as to who pays the duty, we find this in New Brunswick, that we can do better by sending our farm products, and perhaps our fish as well, to places of exchange rather than to the places of consumption, because the goods we buy in exchange suit us better than if we were obliged to send our products to distant markets. The products of the farm amounted to $101,164, of which $96,115 went to the United States. Of animals and their products to the value of $339,374, the United States took the value of $336,566. Of our manufactures $301,059, the United States took $151,463. Under the head of miscellaneous, $48,644 all practically was sent to the United States. What we, in St. John and New Brunswick maintain, is that if our markets were enlarged, if we got a better opportunity to extend our trade, this trade would increase. It is the only profitable trade we have. I desire to call th attention of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) to a remark he made the other day with respect to protection afforded to exports of manufactures. If the hon. gentleman will look over the table of exports he will find that the manufactures that are exported are scarcely protected at all, in fact, that it is not our protective manufactures which are exported. The great bulk of our exports are exports manufactured from the raw materials of the country. In New Brunswick, for example, we export manufactures under the heading of hemlock bark, which is used in tanning. The gypsum which we manufacture, the grindstones we make, the granite, we polish, all these are natural products of the country in a state of manufacture, and these are the goods we can sell. At the present time we dispose of them in the markets of the United States under very great disadvantage. If those markets were open to us there was practically no limit to the quantity we could send in there. Take the article of red granite, which is found extensively in a natural state in the Province, and particularly in the county of Charlotte. There is a heavy duty on the manufactured article entering the United States; the granite is of very little value in its raw state, it is the labor that gives it value. Our merchants are continually told that if there was some arrangement made by which they could get their goods into the American market on satisfactory terms they would be able to do practically an unlimited trade. As regards the trade of St. John, I have here a statement, which the American consul was so kind as to prepare, of the shipment to the United States from that port for the five years ending December, 1887:

|---------------------------------|----------------|
| 1883—Produce not American | $ 415,812 26 |
| American lumber | 816,670 48 |
| Total | $1,232,482 74 |
| 1884—Produce not American | $ 411,318 19 |
| American lumber | 775,294 27 |
| Total | $1,186,612 46 |
| 1885—Produce not American | $ 372,675 24 |
| American lumber | 1,062,490 27 |
| Total | $1,435,165 51 |
| 1886—Produce not American | $ 461,728 79 |
| American lumber | 1,434,286 23 |
| Total | $1,896,015 02 |
| 1887—Produce not American | $ 705,976 00 |
| American lumber | 1,263,714 23 |
| Total | $1,969,685 23 |
| Gain | $737,203 00 |

The trade, so far as regards the American lumber, is not one that we can control, but the land is probably cut over year by year and the limit of production will probably soon be reached; but there is no limit whatever, I repeat, to the increased products of New Brunswick if opportunity is given. Reference has been made to the old tariff. I desire to call attention to the fact that during the eleven years preceding reciprocity the value of exports from New Brunswick to the United States was $2,300,000. During the eleven years of the operation of reciprocity the balance was $11,500,000. In 1854, the year before the treaty, it was $480,000; in 1865, the last year of the treaty, the value was $1,700,000. The fact is quite plain that the people of New Brunswick, remembering the advantages accruing from reciprocity, desire to again obtain a reciprocity treaty. But there was one peculiarity with regard to the treaty which has been referred to in our debate here. Our exports from the Province of New Brunswick increased to a large extent. In 1854 we sent out $485,000 worth; in 1886, $880,000 worth; in 1859 $1,115,000; and in 1865, the last year of the treaty, $1,800,000. But, Sir, the imports from the United States did not increase at all. In 1854 we brought in $3,500,000 worth; next year the same; next year $3,300,000 worth, and in 1865, the last year of the treaty, $3,100,000, showing that there is ground and good ground for the complaint made by the American people that while the treaty opened to us the markets of the United States it did not give them a corresponding advantage in our market. I can expect, Sir, that some gentleman replying to me will confront me with the savings bank returns. The savings bank returns always do a great service to the Government. I would like somebody who understands this question better perhaps than I do to look into those returns and see what they mean. One gentleman spoke about this money being laid up by the people and put in the banks. It is not in the banks. The people in their individual capacity have saved the money and the people in their collective capacity owe the money and have spent it. If the Government wants to pay that money to the country they have to borrow it at its own expense. I took the trouble to look over the returns for last year and I find that the operation of those savings banks is like the gold in King Solomon's Mines of which that imaginative writer Rider Haggard tells us. The interest account last year was increased by $1,322,000. But do we earn that interest? Is it like money invested in any savings bank or institution where there is a direct return? We are simply increasing this by writing it on papers, and the moment we add to the principal we commence to add to the interest again, and so it goes on increasing. Fully one-third of this amount is an amount which has no existence whatever but is added by a stroke of the pen of a clerk in the Finance Department. Sir, the hon. gentleman who spoke last referred to the State of Maine, and it is quite a common thing to compare New Brunswick with the State of Maine. What are the facts in regard to that State. In the first place a man who leaves the State of Maine goes to another part of the United States and he is still bearing his share of the national burden, and does not escape. With regard to the movement from that State any person who looks at history will remember that during the war of the rebellion the population of that country was disturbed and a large number of men went out from some States and have not come back again. Some left their bones on the field of battle, some took situations in various other places, and such was the disturbance among the male population of the country that it has not yet recovered. But the State of Maine notwithstanding the fact that it has only about double the population of New Brunswick has $35,100,000 in its saving bank while Canada has only $4,000,000. The State of Massachusetts which has not as large a population as Ontario, has could buy up the whole debt of Canada and have thirty or forty millions dollars left. Hon. gentlemen opposite talk about the savings banks and they seem to think it a great thing that the Government has left a small amount of money which they have not taken from the people by taxation. The sooner that saving bank business is looked fully in the face and the sooner the Government ceases to brag about it the better for the country. The State of Vermont in 1870 had $2,300,000 in the savings bank; in 1886 it had $11,700,000. You must understand that this money is invested in productive investments and it earns its own interest. It may not be as safe as in the hands of the Government of Canada, but I will not pronounce an opinion upon that. The State of New Hampshire, not a very remarkable State, had $21,500,000 in the saving bank in 1870, and in 1886 in had $47,000,000, or had more than doubled itself in that period. Now, as to the State of Rhode Island. I do not wish to refer particularly to this State because it is one of the richest States of the Union, and I can recollect the time when there was more gold and silver in Providence than there was in any other place. Rhode Island, in 1870, had $30,700,000 in the saving bank, and in 1886 $51,800,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And what is the population?

Mr ELLIS. The population is 276,000, not as many as the population of New Brunswick, but it has ten or twelve times as much money in the banks as all the people of the Dominion of Canada put together. I presume it is sufficient to call attention to those facts to show that all this talk about the greatness of the saving bank deposits in Canada is just sheer nonsense, when we compare the results with the industrial and prosperous condition of the country alongside of us. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries the other night referred to our gross trade, and when that gentleman undertakes to launch forth into a current of words nobody in this House can equal him. He made a long speech; perhaps I am making a long speech too, but I am endeavoring to discharge the duty I have before me as best I can. In the long current of words delivered by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries the hon. gentleman undertook to controvert the statement made by the hon. the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) who introduced this resolution into the House and he spoke about the geographical difficulties in the way of trade. The hon. gentleman built up quite a pyramid of words and when I came to examine his speech I found that he had reached about the same conclusion as the hon. gentleman for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). He says that somebody has tunneled the Alps. That is quite true. They made a straight line through the Alps, but I cannot myself see much sense in making an enormous hole in the Alps, if they put up a paper wall which is more effective against trade than when the mountain stood there in its natural state. We boast in this country that we have made the shortest and quickest route for the carriage of trade, and if there is anything in that argument how can you hold to the principle that it is best to carry trade over a long distance to the Maritime Provinces. The hon. gentleman referred to the trade of the east. Why, Sir, what greater achievement was ever undertaken by a single man than the man who carried the first overland mail so that there might be quickness of carriage, the man who devoted his life to that object of carrying the overland mail from India to England. And, Sir, England and Europe has followed his example and they have cut canals. You do not go against nature, but you use nature entirely for your own purposes. The best you can do is occasionally to wrest from her by patient and diligent work or by some accident some of her attributes which you can turn to your own account. All those things have been done to facilitate trade and they have been done not by going against nature, but by utilising nature as far as possible. Now, Sir, you have built a railway in this country over the longest possible route you could build it. Is that common sense? I think you will say no, because if it were you have certainly shown you did not believe in your own action, because you have put up a large amount of the public money of Canada to take the trade across the United States in order to bring it to the ports of St. John. You have corrected the mistake you made. The hon. gentleman was perfectly right in his statement, notwithstanding the apparent objections the hon. Minister of Marine raised. You are doing for New Brunswick what you refused to do for Manitoba, but what I presume you will have eventually to do. The hon. Minister of Marine referred to the trade with the West Indies. He said that Halifax was the proper place from where to carry on that trade, and I have no doubt it is. But let us see the condition of that trade. In 1873 the total exports from Canada to the West Indies were $3,984,000; in 1880 they had fallen to $3,588,000; and in 1887 they had fallen to $2,075,000 or nearly one-half. Well, Sir, not selling to that country, we cannot buy so easily from it. In 1882 there was entered for consumption in Canada from the West Indies $4,000,000 worth; in 1883 $4,369,000 worth; and in 1887 $1,942,000 worth, showing a falling off of one-half. The total imports from the West Indies, including British Guiana, were, in 1831 $4,000,000, in 1882, $4,400,000 and in 1887, $2,421,000. That trade is completely gone, and I think there are perhaps several reasons for it. I think the real reason is that there is no trade in the West Indies. Any one who takes up the work of the great Conservative historian on the West Indies will see that the whole country is in a state of chaos. I turn to New Brunswick and I find that in 1881 we sent from that Province to the West Indies $141,385 worth of goods. There was a time when we used to bring 100 pounds of sugar and a puncheon of rum from the West Indies, but with the spread of temperance we do not import this article to the same extent. The trade has fallen from $141,000 in 1881 to $46,000 in 1887. There is practically no trade that we in New Brunswick can carry on with that country. The Province of Nova Scotia can, I presume, send some fish there, but even in fish the trade is not so good as it was. Now, the facts which I have presented have not been set down in malice; they have not been exaggerated; they are statements found in the blue-books of the country, and they stare us in the face day after day. I live in a community where I have lived thirty years—a community in which the people are not to be excelled in enterprise, energy and spirit, and we are face to face with this question. I will not say that the farms of New Brunswick do not produce as well as they ever did. I presume that those that are cultivated do. But the great trade we had we are losing, and we want the trade of the United States; we want to pass into that country with our trade as freely as we can pass from one part of Canada to the other. How that is to be done I leave to the sense of the House; but, speaking with the responsibility I hold, I say it will have to be done or you will not retain New Brunswick in the Confederation. An hon. gentleman laughs. He has no responsibility to that Province; he does not live in it; and the fact that he laughs shows how little he cares about it. I will not conceal the fact that we have started some manufactories in that Province. I am, myself, in a small way a shareholder in a cotton factory, having become possessed of a share because the company could not pay me a debt it owed to me, and gave me the share. Mr. Gibson, a man of great enterprise and ability, has started a cotton factory, and the result is that he finds himself confronted by the fact that he has no market, except such as he can get by the most energetic pushing and driving in a market already well filled. The hon. Minister of Marine, the other night, asked what is going to become of the coal miner of New Brunswick if you allow American coal in. Well, Sir, we do admit American coal of a particular kind, and Nova Scotia produces coal that the Americans want, and if that market were opened there would be tens and hundreds of thousands of tons additional produced, and if you would displace a small quantity in one direction you would make it up in another. So with regard to cotton. Mr. Gibson believes that he can go in the American market and hold his own there, and I am told that the proprietors of a cotton mill on the St. Croix River, which is on the border, are quite anxious to get the American market opened to them; and why should they not? A man in the State of Maine may put up a cotton factory, and he trusts to his energy and enterprise to make his way. In that country one factory is nothing here or there, and if the manufacturer on the St. Croix river cannot make his way with the United States markets opened to him better than he can now in the overcrowded market of Canada, he had better take his mill down. The employment of the people of the Maritime Provinces in paying industries would have the effect of increasing the population, and we should have people going on the soil, not only farmers, but miners and persons engaged in various industrial occupations which first spring from the soil; and those people being there, manufactures would vastly grow up around them. In the city of St. John to-day there are quite a number of various kinds of small manufactories, there were quite a number of manufacturers in various lines, who, beginning with very little, have grown by degrees, and some of them were started 30 or 40 years ago. But the great difficulty now is that the present system compels the erection of immense factories for which there is not sufficient market. I notice with some interest that the Labor Commission are just now visiting the city of St. John, I notice that Mr. Alexander Crosby, who has his whole life been Conservative and an energetic Conservative, told the Commissioners that he had been in the business of wood turning for 20 years, and he had not increased it a great deal. It was as small now as it had ever been, and a few years ago there was better employment for the workmen than there is now. He says he knows now of no mechanics who build houses for themselves, and he holds that is due to the lack of profitable employment. That is the testimony of a prominent Conservative, well known among the clubs in St. John. Another hon. gentleman said he could employ more hands if the Upper Province competition was put at an end to. I notice that another gentleman, Mr. Pender, who is a man of whom any country ought to be proud—a man who, beginning in a small way, made an article of horse-shoe nails, which, for excellence of workmanship, surpasses all other articles in the same line. If he had access to the markets of the United States, I have no doubt that the excellence of his work would command these markets—complained that the difficulty in his work was the duty on nail rods. This he said should come in free, as no iron suitable for his purpose could be found in Canada. It appears he is allowed a certain drawback on the iron he uses, but it is not sufficient. He practically has not the raw material free, because he only gets back two-thirds of the duty he paid on it. I will deal with one point more with reference to the question whether it is possible, assuming that this treaty is made, to carry on the Government of the country, because, of course, this is a matter of considerable importance. Well, I think that in the first place the effect of opening up a large number of new manufactories in the country would be to increase our population. We have tried to do so under existing circumstances, and have failed. You cannot retain your population, and a great and growing factor in the political and social history of Canada to-day is that the people are leaving it. Can you do anything to retain them? I believe that by the creation of industries based upon the natural wants of the country you could. Other manufactories to suit our needs would follow, and thus by degrees would grow up requirements which demand almost every kind of undertaking. No doubt the country is expensively governed. I take it that we could do with seven members of the Cabinet. France has only seven or eight, and if a country like France can do with so small a number, I think Canada ought to follow her example. I do not see at present what further retrenchments could be made, but, no doubt, there is room for a great many. The establishment of reciprocity in fish with the United States would enable us to sweep away at once $150,000. You could go through the civil service, and with a firm hand make such a number of reductions as to bring down the expenditure of the country to a fair basis compared with its revenue. That might be hard work, because the country, under the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite has suffered so much from depression, that you cannot get a railroad started in any locality except by means of Government aid. There is a particular insect tribe in which the mother generates the young in her body, and they feed upon her until they reach maturity, and that is the way the Provinces to-day are feeding on the Dominion. One by one they are feeding upon it, and how it is possible for the country to carry the burdens which bear upon it, it is impossible for any man who takes a reasonable view of the case to say. What is the position of our coasting trade? We had in the city of St. John 600 schooners of various sizes and classes. Our seamen thoroughly knew the coast with all the indentations and sinuosities from the harbor of Quebec to the cape of Florida. But the people of St. John, at any rate, are compelled to-day to put their money in American vessels, as it does not pay to put it in Canadian vessels, and the hardy mariners of our coast are passing under the American flag. That may make no difference to hon. gentlemen opposite, but these are facts of great importance to us, and there was a time when they were infinitely important; there was a time the mother country would spend thousands of dollars in promoting the growth of a good class of seamen in the Dominion. Having pointed out these things, I do not know that I have much more to say, but I would like to refer to just one matter, and that is the political aspect of the question as regards the mother country, I see the hon. member for Montreal in his seat, and I may say, with reference to his remarks, that the articles he read to-night against the proposition before the House, seemed to me to suit admirably the case of the Maritime Provinces. Had he made the application of his remarks to these Provinces they would have been far more pertinent than they were in the way he did apply them. There is one fact in the history of the mother country which is plain as any fact can be. The hon. member for South Oxford referred to it in his speech. He did not, perhaps, cover the whole ground, but it is an absolute fact that England is putting forth every possible effort to cement friendship with the people of the United States. That is one fact that stands out above all others in the literature of the times, so far as the current of English literature is concerned. I do not think that any small pecuniary disadvantage which might happen to England from the loss of a small trade, could be at all put in comparison with the advantage which would come to England by any arrangement that would have for its object the promotion of peace and prosperity between the two people. I read the other day in an English magazine a paper written by an English Liberal, once an English politician, Lord Coleridge, to the memory of the brilliant English Conservative, Sir Stafford Northcote—an article that is replete with as much tender sentiment, perhaps, as Englishmen like to express, an article that in some respects rises to the perfection of Wordsworth's poetry, as the perfection of art so carried out that it seems like nature. What was the one fact which he put forward above all others why the people of England should keep enshrined in their memory this amiable and able Conservative? It was that during the war of the rebellion, during the differences which arose out of the Alabama question, this man stood by the side of the North, and he emphasised that fact above all others in order to impress upon the American people, as well as upon his own people, the duty of a relationship which should exist between the two; and, taking up the other day a book written by a historian who probably stands as high in English literature as anyone we have, I refer to Mr. Freeman, the historian of the Norman Conquest, I came across an extract which I think suits the position better than anything I could say myself, and I will read it to the House. I have nearly finished.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. ELLIS. An hon. member says "hear, hear." I am very much obliged to the House for the patient hearing they have given me. Mr. Freeman says, speaking in the United States:

"If we do not belong to the same nation, I do hold that we belong to the same people, or rather, to use a word of our own tongue, to the same folk. By that, I mean that we come of the same stock, that we speak the same tongue, that we have a long common history and a crowd of common memories. I mean, in short, that we are one folk in all things except that local and political separation which the hand of nature and the facts of nature have wrought. And these ties of blood and speech and memory surely rise above the lesser facts of local and political separation to make us feel ourselves in the highest sense one people. We dwell in different quarters of the globe, but we are surely more to one another than dwellers in the same quarter of the globe who do not come of the common stock, who do not speak the common tongue. Let me say that the words 'foreign' and 'foreigner' are words which should never be spoken between men of the English folk in Britain and men of the English folk in America. It grated more on my ears when I heard myself, in a speech otherwise highly honorable to me, spoken of as one of a 'foreign nationality.' But I was relieved and comforted by the hearty zeal with which the rest of the company accepted my strong disclaimers of anything foreign about me, and welcomed me as one of their own kin. 'Foreign,' 'foreigner,' and 'foreign nationality;' away with such forms of words! You are not foreigners; we do not look on you as foreigners, when you come to visit the older England in Britain. And I am not a foreigner, I will not deem myself a foreigner, I will not bear that you should look on me as a foreigner, when I come to visit this newer England in America. Here on your soil I am not indeed in mine own home, but I am none the less among mine own folk. I am among men of mine own blood and mine own tongue, sharers in all that a man of either England deems it his pride and happiness to share in. How can we be strangers and foreigners to one another, how can we be other than kinsfolk and brethren of the same hearth, when we think that your forefathers and mine may have sailed together from the oldest England of all in the keels of Hengest or of Cerdic—that they may have lurked together with Ælfred in the marshes of Athelney—that they may have stood side by side in the thick shield-wall on the hill of Seulac—that they may have marched together as brethren to live and die for English freedom alike on the field of overthrow at Evesham, and on the field of victory at Naseby. I surely need not remind you that the whole heritage of the past, the history, the memories, the illustrious names, which belong to the earlier days of the English folk in Britain, are yours as well as ours. They are in the stricter sense your own. The men who piled up the mighty fabric of English law and English freedom, were your fathers, your brethren, no less than ours. In the long line of hero—Kings who built up the Kingdom of England you have as full a share as we have. In building up the Kingdom of England they were building up the commonwealth of America. If yours is the King who lurked in Athelney, yours too is the King who won the fight at Brunanburh. Yours are the King who waged the year of battle with the Dane and the King who waged the day of battle with the Norman. And if the Kings are yours as well as ours, so are the men who curbed the power of Kings. Yours are the men who wrung the great charter from the kingly rebel; yours are the men who dictated the provisions of Oxford and the men who gathered round the victor of Poitiers on the nobler field of the Good Parliament. Your share is alike with ours in every blow struck on behalf of freedom from the day of Lewes to the day of Marston. And if we boast that we won to ourselves the men of other lands, if we changed the Dane and the Norman into Englishmen as true as if their forefathers had first seen the shores of Britain from the keels of Hengest, the work was yours as well as ours. The strangers whom we made specially our own, they whose names we rank alongside of the noblest of our native worthies, the men who came from the beech-clad iles of Denmark, from the deep Alpine valley of Aosta, from the strong mount that guarded the land of France against the Norman, to become Englishmen on English soil—Canut the King, Anslem the bishop, Simon the earl—they are yours by the same law of adoption that makes them ours. And when the course of our history parts asunder, when the English people become two nations instead of one, if the history which you have wrought in America is no longer ours, if the history which we have wrought in Britain is no longer yours, in the same sense as in the common history which we wrought together in earlier times, still, we have a common interest, a common fellow-feeling, the feeling which follows the deeds of friends and kinsfolk with a different eye from that with which it follows the deeds of strangers, in all that men of English blood have done on American soil since the older and newer England parted asunder. And you too, I trust, have not ceased to look with the like feeling on all that men of English blood have done on British soil since the day when the newer England bade farewell to its political connection with the elder, but did not, I trust, bid farewell to the far higher tie of a common blood, a common speech, the long glories of a common history.

And so I agree with the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), that whatever we can do to strengthen the ties between England and the people of the United States in the way of trade relations it is our duty to do, it is in the interests of England as well as in the interests of Canada, it is not against the interests of England, and it is not worth while to raise that question here to-day because the interests of Canada, as they stand to-day, are certainly the interests of England.

SECOND SESSION, SIXTH PARLIAMENT.—51 VIC.

Vol. XX.

Ottawa, Thursday, March 22, 1888.

No. 21.

NOTICE TO MEMBERS.

Necessary corrections to Members' Speeches, for the bound edition, must be forwarded to the Debates Office within twenty-four hours after the printed copies of the speeches have been circulated, as after that time the contractors may print the copies for the bound edition without further delay.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 22nd March, 1888.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 59) to confer certain powers on the Nova Scotia Telephone Company (Limited).—(Mr. Tupper, Picton.)

Bill (No. 60) to amend Chapter 27 of the Revised Statutes, respecting the Department of Public Printing and Stationery.—(Mr. Chapleau.)

EASTER HOLIDAYS.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I asked the Minister of Public Works yesterday if he could give the House any information as to the intention of the Government with respect to the Easter holidays. The hon. gentleman was to have mentioned the matter, I think, to the Prime Minister, and, as I see that the right hon. gentleman is now in his place, I ask him if he can give us the information.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We are very anxious, if it is possible, to finish this important debate before the adjournment, but that is for the House to say, not for us. We propose, if it be the will of the House, that when we adjourn on Wednesday night, we shall stand adjourned until the following Tuesday, at eight o'clock.

PRIVILEGE—THE UNRESTRICTED RECIPROCITY DEBATE.

Mr. McMILLAN (South Huron). I rise to make an explanation. The hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Porter), in his speech the other night, denied the accuracy of my statement previously made that the value of farm land in the County of Huron was not increasing, and he said that between 1880 and 1886 it had increased in value 15 per cent. I sent and got the minutes of the County Council of Huron for this year, to prove the statement I had made, that land was not rising in value, and, Sir, I am borne out by those minutes. I find that in 1880—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. My hon. friend is quite in order. The statement made by him was contradicted on the floor of this House, and he is now simply proving that he made an accurate statement. I have never known an hon. gentleman refused permission, when contradicted, to prove that he was right. I do not suppose the First Minister wishes to do it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If he confines himself to that point.

Mr. McMILLAN. As I understand the rules of the House, I have a right to speak to the amendment after I have spoken on the main motion, and therefore I take the opportunity of making an explanation.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member has not the floor. If the hon. gentleman wishes to speak on the amendment he cannot do so now, because the hon. gentleman who has moved the adjournment of the debate, has precedence.

Mr. MITCHELL. If I understand the position, the hon. gentleman rises to a question of privilege for the purpose of explaining a statement in which he was contradicted, and in that case he has a right to speak.

Mr. SPEAKER. But he claims to speak to the amendment.

Mr. McMILLAN. I wish to correct the statement made by the hon. member for West Huron contradicting my statement. In the first place I stated—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman cannot make a speech now.

Mr. McMILLAN. I am not going to make a speech.

Mr. MITCHELL. Let him make an explanation.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman made his explanation and is now proceeding to give his proofs. If that is not making a speech, I do not know what is.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman will have every opportunity. My hon. friend who moved the adjournment of the debate has the floor. When he sits down, the hon. gentleman can get up and make his speech, and make his explanation at the same time.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Are we to understand it is ruled that an explanation cannot be had, although the Order has not yet been called? My hon. friend has a right, before the Orders of the Day are called, to make his correction.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have already ruled that when the statements of an hon. member have been misrepresented, he is always allowed to say that what had been attributed to him was not what he said, or was not what he intended to say, and nothing more.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then, do I understand that you rule that an hon. gentleman who has been flatly contradicted on a point of fact, is not allowed to produce the evidence which he wishes, that he was right?—because that has hardly been our practice, I think.

Mr. SPEAKER. The whole of this debate is a contradiction of statements made on either side, and if I allow every hon. gentleman to get up a second time and prove that his statements were correct, and to make a new speech to show that what he said ought not to be contradicted, I should have to allow every hon. member to speak, perhaps, a dozen times.

RECIPROCITY WITH THE UNITED STATES.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Richard Cartwright :

That it is highly desirable that the largest possible freedom of commercial intercourse should obtain between the Dominion of Canada and the United States, and that it is expedient that all articles manufactured in, or the natural products of either of the said countries should be admitted free of duty into the ports of the other (articles subject to duties of excise or of internal revenue alone excepted). That it is further expedient that the Government of the Dominion should take steps at an early date to ascertain on what terms and conditions arrangements can be effected with the United States for the purpose of securing full and unrestricted reciprocity of trade therewith.

And on the motion of Mr. Foster in amendment :

That Canada in the future, as in the past, is desirous of cultivating and extending trade relations with the United States in so far as they may not conflict with the policy of fostering the various interests and industries of the Dominion which was adopted in 1879 and has since received in so marked a manner the sanction and approval of its people.

And on the motion of Mr. Jones (Halifax) in amendment to the amendment :

That in any arrangement between Canada and the United States providing for the free importation into each country of the natural and manufactured productions of the other, it is highly desirable that it should be provided that during the continuance of any such arrangement the coasting trade of Canada and of the United States should be thrown open to vessels of both countries on a footing of complete reciprocal equality, and that vessels of all kinds built in the United States or Canada may be owned and sailed by the citizens of the other and be entitled to registry in either country and to all the benefits thereto appertaining.

Mr. BAIRD. Mr. Speaker, I promise not to detain the House long with the remarks that I have to make. The subject has been well and ably discussed on both sides, and I must admit that there is no great necessity for any speech at all from me. But coming as I do from the chief commercial city of the Province of New Brunswick, representing a constituency near that city where the people are, I may say, intensely interested in the subject of this debate, I feel it a duty and a privilege to lay before you the reasons for the vote that I intend to record; and I trust that you will excuse me if my remarks are somewhat broken and fragmentary. I do not come here armed with an array of figures. Statistics have been so ably filled in here that I think it unnecessary for me to produce any more, and I shall rely on a few general statements in placing my views before you. I want to be very careful in what I say. Since Monday night I have conceived a great horror of scrap books. I would rather meet almost any thing else in the world than to have one of these hon. gentlemen after me with a scrap book. Up to that time I had gained the impression that hon. gentlemen opposite had always entertained only one view of this question, but I have learned that very many of the leading lights on the other side of the House, at some stage or another in their political career, have been coquetting with protection, and many of these sages and profound statesmen have been thinking and believing both sides of the question. It was a revelation to me, because I knew nothing or recollected nothing of it in the past. Now, Sir, it appears that both sides claim to be actuated by motives of patriotism, and I hope and trust they are. But I think everyone must admit there are two kinds of patriotism in this House. There is the despondent patriot and the hopeful patriot; there appears to be the patriot who sees nothing before us but political and financial ruin, who thinks only of neglected farms and deserted homes, the result of emigration, who speaks of deserted villages and ruined cities, and an impoverished people, the result of corruption and misrule. Then, on the other hand, we have the hopeful patriot, who likes to look at Canada as she is, who likes to look at her as she appears on the map of the world, greater in extent than the whole continent of Europe, greater than the great United States of America, stretching away from ocean to ocean, nearly 4,000 miles, with the Atlantic bathing her eastern and the Pacific bathing her western shores, with an area of fertile land greater, I may say, than any other country under the sun, with broad plains, and magnificent forests, and an intelligent and industrious people able to subdue these forests and to convert our vast prairies into fields of waving corn. He likes also to speak of many other of her great qualities, of the surroundings of the ocean, of her bays and her harbors and her rivers filled with the tribes of the sea, making up one of the most magnificent fisheries in the world. Then he speaks of her great highway being finished from ocean to ocean, and with pride he speaks of the fact that the banner of the Canadian Pacific now floats from the top of the Rockies, and draws your attention to one of the greatest monuments of engineering skill ever known to the world. Well, Sir, the hopeful patriot does not stop there. He looks beyond. Away to the westward he sees the broad Pacific capable of bearing commerce ten-fold greater than has ever yet furrowed the waves of the Atlantic. He looks across that ocean, and sees that we are trading neighbors to seven hundred millions or eight hundred millions of people, and with hope he believes that we have an interest in the trade of the Orient, and he looks to that as one of the future prizes to the Dominion of Canada. Then he looks to the eastward and he sees we are trading neighbors to two hundred and fifty millions of the busy populations of Europe, and each year our large trade is growing and will continue to grow with those busy nations. Then, again, he looks to the southward, and finds the great United States, a people whom we are proud and anxious to call our American brothers, and we can boast of a great trade with that people, a trade on which our friends opposite enlarge. We think as much of the American people, I trust, as do hon. gentlemen on the Opposition benches, and we know them to be a shrewd and clever people, a people who have in the past shown their ability to enforce the law of political science, and we have to look to our dealings with them with a careful and jealous eye. He does not stop there. He looks further to the south, even crossing the equator, and beholds the countries of South America. Many of them have grown with a rapidity that even outrivals the United States, cities growing up in the Argentine Republic and in the Brazils outrivalling the growth even of Chicago. And I say in looking at the south we have a warm interest in her trade, which may be called a foreign trade, to be built up with that continent. I hear hon. gentlemen opposite speak with great emphasis in regard to an exchange of natural products or a natural market. If the word "natural market" has any meaning as between Canada and the United States, that meaning is ten-fold increased and ten fold intensified when used as between Canada and South America. In Canada we grow all that will grow in the northern temperate climate, in South America they grow all that will grow in a tropical climate, all that will grow under the blaze of the meridian sun. We are the two extremes. They are known to be a people of great wealth, a people who are surprising all beholders at the prodigious strides they are making. The great thing to be considered is this, that in South America they have little or no manufactures. That country is low and level chiefly, and affords no water power. Then, again, coal is one of the motive powers of the day, and that they are absolutely without. Their supply of coal at present comes from Great Britain, chiefly from Cardiff in Wales. That coal when it leaves Cardiff costs 11s. sterling a ton and is carried at freight rates varying from 20s to 27s. 6d. per ton, and that coal when delivered realises too high a price to be used in arts and manufactures. Canada has a right to look in that direction for a trade with that people. Again, they have none of the products grown in Canadian forests. They have neither pine nor spruce, and, if I am correctly informed, those cities, even the cities of the Argentine Republic, consume perhaps one hundred millions of lumber of the northern temperate climate, and, strange to say, those one hundred millions of lumber are supplied from our two neighboring States, Maine and Massachusetts, and when their supply is short they come into Canada and obtain here what they require to carry on that trade. It is strange that we must sit idly by while this trade goes into the hands, and is kept under the control, of our American neighbors. I say there is a real meaning when you speak of exchanging natural products, or obtaining a national market in regard to South America. Here are the two extremes. There is a land of perpetual summer, where the tall palmetto waves; here we are the land of the pine and the maple; and, if there is any meaning to be given to the words, "exchange of natural products," I think hon. gentlemen opposite will see that the meaning has great force as regards trade between these two countries. While I am dwelling on this matter I will speak of a movement on foot in the city of St. John with a view to secure and encourage trade as between Canada and the countries of South America; I should not say St. John alone, because I find the other Provinces of the Dominion are identified with it, and with commendable zeal they have undertaken to drive the enquiry to the very bottom. The Government have been approached on this matter, and I am gratified to say that they too have taken the matter under consideration, and have appointed a Commissioner to visit those countries and make a report. I trust that report will be a favorable one. I trust that on a future day we shall see the products of Canadian forests being carried to the countries of South America. I trust we shall see the products of the mines of Nova Scotia taking the place of the products of the mines of Great Britain, and it will be a gratifying thing to see trade, which is untold in its volume, carried on in this way. When we take a further view of it we find that hon. gentlemen opposite in dealing with this matter appear to take great satisfaction in speaking in a doubtful way respecting Canada generally. The subject is one that enables them to reach the highest altitude of liberal statesmanship in running down and belittling Canada. They appear to reach their greatest height in dealing with this subject, and they appear to enjoy the privilege of making unfair comparisons between Canada and the great United States of America. They are not content to compare Canada with Australia, New Zealand, or New South Wales, or some other colony that is doing just what Canada is doing, that is, trying to open up and develop its resources, making great expenditures in view of the large territory it has to deal with in order to develop the country and make it attractive, and drawing the population of Europe by immigration here to fill up the country. This is what we have been doing, this is what the colonies have been doing; and if you make a comparison with those colonies you will find that Canada outrivals them all, that Canada to-day is the most favored of all British colonial possessions. But they are not satisfied with that—United States alone is the subject of comparison. It is unfair, it is unjust and ungenerous that you should compare Canada with the great United States. They have had privileges that no other country under the sun ever enjoyed. They have had the wealth of forest and field in an abundance that is most marvellous. They have had in addition to this a wealth of mine and mineral that surpasses all records of the world. They have had the wealth of hills and mountains that were fairly blasted with silver and gold, and they have had the wealth of river and stream whose yellow sands when sifted enabled them to build up cities by magic, and furnish them with all the grand em-bellishments of art and science. In addition to that, they have been drawing from their western prairies the strength of the virgin soil and transporting it as rapidly as possible in order to convert it into cash. Some time, if reports be true, they might as well have taken the acres and shipped them away, as they were drawing the very strength from them by tilling large areas with all modern means and appliances and gathering great crops of grain year after year, until the land is no longer productive, and if reports be true, the very best areas of the United States have been turned into ready cash; and in this way the country is rolling full of money, which fact no one denies, but all readily admit. It is unfair to compare the savings banks and monetary institutions of the United States with similar institutions in Canada. We have had none of those advantages. On the other hand, we have the natural advantages of which I have spoken. We have our fertile soil and good climate, we have an industrious people who are willing and are determined to make of Canada all that can be expected or can be asked for. I say that a person coming with such an argument, in that way acts unfairly against Canada. I consider it a damaging statement to go abroad to the people, who hear and must every day read the remarks that are being made. Take the effect of this when it is placed before the uninitiated mind. Take it and place it before the farmer's son. He may be content with his surroundings, he may be content with the farm and the homestead life, but you preach to him and tell him that the land is fit to starve him to death; tell him that it is in fact no life for him to lead, give him to understand that there are more prospects to the westward, tell him that there are colossal fortunes to be made there and do not tell him the real truth, do not tell him that the laborer in the United States is not better off than he is in Canada, but paint such a picture, and he becomes discouraged under those strange arguments. It is a disposition in all the human family to be somewhat dissatisfied with their lots, and most minds are susceptible to it. You can even convince a man that he is sick, for if a number of persons tell him he is sick he may yield to their persuasion. So the human family is constituted. So they receive the damaging propositions, and so the mind becomes imbued with a false idea. Those damaging assertions are made against Canada only for the purpose of bringing certain people prominently to the front and of creating discontent in the minds of the Canadian people. In order that they may gain something, those damaging assertions are made by certain gentlemen, to get the public mind interested in the matter. They think they may gain something if they can make a disturbance in the minds of the people of Canada. Now, Sir, to come right down to the matter before us and to deal with the question that is now before the House in its closer sense, I would like to take hold of the remarks which I first heard made by the hon. member for Queen's, P. E. I. (Mr. Davies). That hon. gentleman made the charge against the present Administration, that when protection was first introduced, or, as he said, when it was "first preached" to the people of the Maritime Provinces it was not introduced or it was not preached to them as a remedy for their troubles, for it was introduced to them as a remedy which would bring about a return of the old Reciprocity Treaty or some treaty of commerce between ourselves and the people of the United States. The hon. member for Queen's, P. E. I. (Mr. Davies) dwelt most heavily upon this point, and his worthy colleague there appeared to endorse very strongly what he said. The substance of what he said was that the people of the Maritime Provinces were cheated by this delusion, and carried away by the hope that it was going to bring back to them reciprocity with the United States. Now, Sir, the hon. member spoke for Prince Edward Island, and I will undertake to speak on behalf of New Brunswick.

When the policy of protection was first introduced in the Maritime Provinces, Sir Leonard Tilley, a statesman who occupies the highest respect from friend and foe alike, was about the first I heard speak on the subject. He and several worthy members of our party opened the subject in the city of St. John, and what I understood from them was substantially that they laid before the people the fact that, located as we were alongside the people of the great United States of America, who, in consequence of some ill-feeling towards Great Britain arising out of the late rebellion, had abrogated the treaty of commerce and had put up a wall against us and our trade relations, by which they should take charge of us and our markets, and by which they were taking away our raw material and sending back manufactured goods. Those gentlemen pointed out that it was absolutely necessary that something should be done to turn the tide of affairs, and I am pleased to say, Sir, that the people of St. John and the people of New Brunswick readily understood their meaning at the time and become deeply interested in the question. They knew that something was wrong and they could see that the country was being wasted in its youth, and that the people were being impoverished in the midst of great natural abundance which only awaited development. The policy was laid before us in that way. Shortly after that I recollect that the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) visited the city of St. John, and I looked very anxiously for his coming. I was deeply interested and anxious to see and hear him, for up to that time I had never seen a live English knight. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman spoke to us in the St. John's skating rink, I think, and he dwelt the greater part of his time on the Pacific Scandal, and then for an hour or two he told us what he had done for the country—and what he would do for the country. The people gave him a patient hearing and I think they made up their minds that he had done enough for his country and they ought to give him a rest. At all events, they acted upon that principle. Among other things Sir Leonard Tilley taught us to believe was that by the adoption of this policy of commercial independence, or even of retaliation if you like to call it so, that we would be able to show our American neighbors that we could take care of ourselves, that we could live in defiance of the wall which they put up against us, that Canada had rights which she knew and was ready to protect, that the effect of the National Policy would be to bring the American people to a clear understanding of what our rights were, and that if they would no longer deal with us in that way, we could live independent of them. I am proud to say, Sir, and to see that the prophecies and promises made respecting that policy were truly made, and that they never had the appearance of being more literally verified than they are to-day. Surely the signs of the present times show it. Why are the American people interested in us to-day more than they were at that date? If you recollect aright, at that time they laughed at our inability. They laughed at the idea of our independence and they prophesied that they would drive us into annexation. That was the kind of talk which prevailed at that time. Why is it now that the Butterworths, the Morriss', the Hitts, the Wimans and other political economists are trying to draw us from our attitude to-day? Why is the attitude of the United States Congress liberal towards us? Do you think it is because they wish to help us or benefit Canada? No, Sir, they see we are able to maintain the attitude that we have taken, that we are able to take care of ourselves under the protective system, and that we could really live independent of them. Hon. gentlemen opposite claim that the American people are now ready to make overtures to us. There must be some reason for that; and I say that we are driven to the conclusion that it is in consequence of the adoption of the National Policy, which had far more efficacy in bringing that state of things about than any servile prayer for admission to their trade would have had. When you look at the matter fairly, I think you will agree with me that no set of men could have had deeper forethought or greater wisdom in handling the affairs of a nation than the hon. leader of this House and his worthy colleagues, when they prepared that policy of commercial independence for the Dominion of Canada, and applied it to the country in the firm manner they did. Hon. gentlemen may assert that they acted from a different motive than the welfare of the country, and I have heard it asserted, on the platform, that they did it in order to draw from the people a large revenue which they might squander in all sorts of spendthrift profusion and extravagance. But I have confidence that they had higher aims and nobler ambitions than that—that they were working for the true interests of their country; and I think the results to-day prove it. If to-day there is an approach by the people of the United States, it is in consequence of the firm attitude that has been taken and maintained down to the present day. The people of the Dominion of Canada may well congratulate themselves on having sustained the National Policy three times, and they may well be proud of the statesmen who inaugurated that policy and showed to the world that they were able to take care of Canada in every exigency. Now, I wish to reply for a few moments to the hon. member for the city of St. John (Mr. Ellis) who made the last address on this subject. That hon. gentleman undertook to set forth the deplorable state of affairs in the Province of New Brunswick, and with an array of figures that lasted nearly two hours he applied himself to the task of showing that there had been a decline in our trade and prosperity. I do not intend to occupy your time with a like array of figures; life is too short for that kind of business. I think we are here to deal simply with the causes of the decline, and to supply a remedy if we can, and having done that, we shall have done our duty. Now, my business career is short, but by experience and observation I claim to have acquired some knowledge of the causes of the decline, and I shall show you that the National Policy is not to blame for a single dollar of the loss which he has shown to have occurred in the Province of New Brunswick. He has stated that lumber and shipping are our chief industries, and I agree with him. The manufacture and export of spruce deals to the English market and to the Mediterranean ports in the early days yielded great profits. My recollection runs back ten or twelve years, during which time I have been about the city of St. John. When I first went there, I saw and handled deals for which $11 per 1,000 superficial feet was paid. Time went on, and prices began to decline; the English market failed; the Baltic trade sprang up, and from that the English were able to obtain deals at a lower price than they were paying us. Therefore prices gradually declined to $9, $8, and I believe as low as $7 and $7.50. Since the National Policy came into effect it is very rarely that we have seen spruce deals sold above $8 or $9 per 1,000—the average, I think, would be $8. Before the National Policy was introduced, our forests were largely depleted, and the lumberman to-day has not only a reduced price to contend with, but he cannot get his lumber with the same facilities as he could when the primeval forests were there in their original grandeur. The forests have been cut away, and he has to go farther and get inferior lumber to what he did ten or twelve years ago; he has to contend with a reduction of 25 per cent. in the price, he has to pay increased stampage; and all these things have had a tendency to dry up the lumber trade, and hence the volume of the trade of the province, and to dry up the statistics my hon. friend handled. Is the National Policy to blame for that? Were you told that the National Policy was intended to keep up the English market? Could the National Policy affect a market in the ports of the Mediterranean? It is with regret that we have seen the lumber industry become a waning industry; we had some years ago a large trade in pine and birch timber, which brought remunerative prices on the other side of the Atlantic. This timber was required to be cut square, and to be sound and good timber. But the forests have been cut away, and there has been a large decline in the supply, and along with that the prices have declined. Then, again, up to the time of the National Policy, we did a considerable trade in box pine for the West India Islands, to be used for boxes required in the sugar trade. That trade lasted up to perhaps nine or ten years ago and then it suddenly dropped. The means of transportation were entirely changed, the timber was gone, and there was no demand. Ten or twelve years ago, all the mills surrounding the harbor of St. John, as soon as they shut down on the production of spruce lumber, would begin to be occupied in sawing lumber for sugar boxes. A fleet of vessels carried the boxes to the West India Islands, where they would load with sugar and carry it in other directions. Had the National Policy anything to do with the loss of that trade? If you had had unrestricted reciprocity, could it have prolonged that trade any longer? He states that the shipping industry is an industry of the past, but no blame can be attached to the National Policy for the decline in that respect. When I first went to the city of St. John, every place where a ship-yard could be established was a hive of industry. A large number of wooden ships were being built, and an immense number of men employed every day in the year; but since then the iron vessels have ousted the wooden ones from the trade, and the shipbuilding industry has received a blow from which it will probably never recover. I remember when at times two ships would be on the stocks at once, and when in one year, as in 1873, from 120,000 to 150,000 tons of shipping would be added to the shipping list of Canada. Again, the ships were largely owned at the port of St. John, which was, at that time, ranked as the fourth port in the empire for the ownership of ships; and go where you would throughout the world, you would see "St. Johns, N.B.," written on the bows of numerous ships. It was almost impossible to visit any shipping ports in the world without seeing in its waters a number of St. John's vessels, but that trade has been destroyed almost entirely by the increase in the number of iron ships, which, having taken the place of the wooden vessels, have dealt the finishing blow to the shipbuilding industry. But surely it will not be contended that the National Policy can be blamed for this state of affairs. The hon. gentleman takes great delight in dwelling on the reduced condition of the city of St. John. Instead of sympathising with her in her misfortunes, he seems to gloat over them. But when we consider the great losses that St. John has sustained, when we consider the great industry that has been swept away from her, when we consider the immense revenues which flowed from the large fleet of ships that formerly frequented her harbor into the hands of her ship owners, but which now have become a thing of the past; when we consider the destruction that took place on June 20, 1877, when the entire city was swept away by a terrible conflagration which left hardly anything standing but a few desolate walls to mark the resting-place of that once fine city, it should be, not a matter for condolence, but rather a matter for congratulation that she should have sprung up as she has, like the phoenix from its ashes, and should occupy the position she does to-day despite all her reverses. Instead of showing that, despite her great losses, St. John is able to hold her own to-day, the hon. gentleman endeavors to depict her condition to make out the worst he can out of her condition. He is obliged to confess, however, that despite all his wailings, St. John is still able to hold her own, and in admitting that, he admits a great deal. Again, the city of St. John, I may say, had another stroke of disaster on the 22nd February, 1887, a political stroke as blighting almost as the flames of the great conflagration. Will the hon. gentleman undertake to tell me that St. John would have recovered, as she has to-day, in a great degree from her reverses, had it not been for the National Policy? Can he in any way point out a single fault that can be found with the National Policy? Could the shipping trade have been in any way affected by the abolition of the National Policy? If it could, the hon. gentleman would not have failed to tell us how and in what manner the National Policy has worked to our detriment, but he confined himself to pointing out that St. John is in a deplorable condition; he contented himself with merely pointing out her difficulties and misfortunes. He took delight in taunting her people with their poverty, and was careful not to furnish a single shadow of an excuse for that state of affairs, a state of affairs which, instead of discussing fairly, he largely exaggerated. The hon. gentleman ought not to complain, for he has been well provided for in that city. He has been sent here as its representative, and I think he has dealt unjustly towards the city of his birth, or adoption—I do not know which,—and that it deserved better treatment at his hands. Did the hon. gentleman assign any cause for the state of affairs he depicted? No, he was entirely silent on that point. He merely recited all these calamities, and did not even go so far as to say they were the result of the National Policy. He did not say that if the National Policy had never been adopted there would have been a different state of things. He did not say that the National Policy is responsible for the people of the United States abrogating the Reciprocity Treaty. He would not go to that extent. Now, what remedy does he propose? Or does he propose any? I find him silent on that point, too. The hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Foster), and, I think, the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood), congratulated the hon. gentleman upon his boldness and courage; they congratulated him on showing that he had the courage of his convictions, and was prepared to give his remedy boldly and openly in preference to the hon. gentleman who, they said, really contemplated annexation in disguise. I thought, when I heard those hon. gentlemen speaking, that they really did not know their man, and that they would find they were mistaken in him. I was confident we would not have from that hon. gentleman a bold and outspoken statement of what he considered the true remedy. Nor have we had such a statement. The hon. gentleman does not like honorable warfare; he likes warfare of a more quiet and concealed nature and he would not put himself on record by going the full length of his views, as the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and the hon. member for Westmoreland supposed he would. It may be, however, that the hon. gentleman has relented, and is not prepared to go so far as he led us to believe he would. I hope he has relented; I hope he has receded from the position he once took; I hope he is not now disguising his real sentiments under a species of mock loyalty; I hope and trust the hon. gentleman has changed his tactics. Surely the hon. gentleman would not like to see all that is Canadian handed over to foreign hands; surely his mind has undergone a change; surely patriotism and love of home and country are not still to him words without meaning; surely the memory of England's care and England's love for her patriot sons in all parts of the world has awakened in his mind the slumbering recollections of his earlier manhood, and brought him to a nearer and clearer sense of duty; surely the thought of an alien flag floating over loyalists' graves has formed a barrier between him and the darling scheme he held a few months ago. I hope and trust that a change has come over the spirit of his dreams; I hope and trust the hon. gentleman is in a position to say that he has relented and cast his annexationist ideas to the wind; I hope and trust that the hon. member is hand to hand in sentiment with true patriots. The hon. gentleman, through the medium of his press, has always taught us to look to this part of Canada as our natural enemy; he has taught us to look upon inter-provincial trade as a humbug and to cast our eyes towards the United States as our great and only friend, as our only real friend, as the only source from which we have anything to hope. The hon. gentleman might have explained, for he is up here among Ontario gentlemen who are on the same side of politics with him, and no doubt hold high hopes, and high anticipations, and high aspirations as to Ontario. But the hon. member has always told us something different through the medium of a mischievous press. He has given us to understand, you are a weight and a burden, and and you are dragging us down to ruin. He might have explained this, but he did not see fit to do so. The hon. gentleman and several others on that side of the House, I have heard make mention of the industries that were in existence. But they do not take the trouble to mention such as were to be found in the city of St. John, such as were sustained by the protecting care of the National Policy; they do not mention that the population of St. John, large as it is now, is maintained and sustained by manufactures which have taken the place of shipbuilding. This was not very suddenly the result, but it was of slow growth. Many other parts of the Dominion have grown up more rapidly, but we have not stood still. While I was on my way up here, I asked a gentleman to give me some statistics of the industries which were going on in St. John, and he did so, but, unfortunately, I have dropped the statement. At all events, he showed, I think, that there were nearly or quite 2,000 men employed in factories there, in the cotton factories and the iron works, and the car establishments, in all those industries which are well known to men who come from St. John. Those industries have grown up and are maintained under the fostering care of the National Policy. Still the hon. gentlemen did not speak of them, but they all did speak of the factory of Mr. Alexander Gibson, and many of them quoted the remarks made by Mr. Gibson. I am not aware, and I scarcely believe, that Mr. Gibson ever made the remarks attributed to him. However, I would not be afraid to deal with the question, or to hear Mr. Gibson express himself. Those hon. gentlemen speak as if he wanted an extended market. I only visited his factory once in my life, and then it appeared to me to be the pride of Mr. Gibson to point out a lot of orders and to say, I cannot begin to fill the orders, that is my trouble; I do not have to send out a runner, because I cannot fill the orders I have, and I believe, if I had another factory like this, I could run it. To take the reverse view of it and say that he wanted the market of the United States, appears extraordinary to me. What reason or what argument is there why Mr. Gibson, or any other man, should contend against the great establishments of the United States? We know that cotton is a little lower in the United States than in Canada; we know that they have an over-supply of factories, that they have an over-supply of cotton which they could throw on to this market, and make a profit. The hon. gentleman knows very well that the 60,000,000 of people he spoke of as his market are well supplied, and there is a surplus in the United States which would come into Canada if the Customs line were taken away. He knows that he would not point with pride to unfilled orders hanging upon the wall if they had full swing in our market. I have understood that Mr. Gibson has repudiated the statement and declared that he never made it, but, if he did make it, it has been the subject of his reconsideration. Now, we do not stand alone in this matter. When these gentlemen introduced and inaugurated this policy of protection for the industries of Canada, they could not have been working on their imagination alone. They had the experience and they had the precedents of other nations. In fact, all the powerful and sagacious nations of the earth, at some time in their political history, have been forced to do in self-defence just what Canada did when she adopted the National Policy. This is no assertion of mine, it is a matter of history. Each of the powerful nations of the earth at some time have tried this policy. We know that France, Germany, Austria, Prussia, Belgium, all these great countries have seen fit to adopt a protective system. For instance, we may take Germany. At the time she commenced with her protective system, if statistics are to be believed, she imported $240,000,000 of manufactured goods from Great Britain more than she sent back. Ten years afterwards she had entirely turned the tables, and was sending to England upwards of $240,000,000 more than she brought back. That was the effect of the adoption of that policy. In all these other countries, there has been unparalleled prosperity from the time they adopted their protective policy. They had wise and sagacious men at the head of affairs, each considering what would be best for his country, each taking up this system in turn, and each going in that direction as far as the system could be enforced. England alone, at the present time, of all these great nations stands out as a free-trade people, but at the time she commenced her system of free trade, at the time she admitted grain into her ports free, although all the world hailed it with delight as a step in the direction of free trade, it was in reality a master-stroke in the direction of protection. At that time England was the manufacturing centre of the world, it was the workshop of the world. Sir Robert Peel saw that, by encouraging her industries, he could, as he desired, really make her manufacturing supremacy complete. All he had to do was to give cheap breadstuffs to her people, and, while he was willing to sacrifice her farmers, he knew he could draw a generous supply of breadstuffs from the different parts of the world, from the prairies of the United States, from the banks of the Nile, from the shores of the Baltic, from the fields of Russia and of India; that he could obtain a more generous supply from those regions than he could by trying to protect the farmers of Great Britain, and he saw that it was really a master-stroke in the way of maintaining the manufacturing supremacy of Great Britain at that time to adopt the policy he did. That state of things continued for a time. England really was the workshop of the world, and to a great extent she has preserved that position, but at the same time she had a full and complete supply of coal in unlimited quantity and iron to an unlimited quantity, and she had workmen and she had everything but cheap bread, and it was Sir Robert Peel's design to give her cheap bread and thus to maintain her manufacturing supremacy. Now, in dealing with the subject of iron, I have heard one of the gentlemen opposite, from East Huron, I think, deal with the question of iron, and I have heard many members on the Opposition side find fault with the price of iron, and the additional duties which have been placed on iron, and they always point to the great United States, and to the flourishing condition of the iron industry in the United States; but they do not take the record of the iron industry in the United States in the past, but speak of it as it is to-day, just as it suits their argument. Why do they do not go back a little over twenty years? If they do, they will find that that industry in the United States was then in a flatter condition than it is now in this country. At that time steel rails were held at $150 a ton in Great Britain. The Bessemer Steel Works had full control of that market. Then protection comes in in the United States, and, after that, the iron industries are started there. The English manufacturer sees that it is to be an encroachment on his work, and he visits the American market, and then down goes the price of steel rails from $150 to $130 a ton. But they had taken the grip of this matter in the United States. They saw that to be compelled to pay from $350 to $400 a ton for the rails when landed in New York was going too far. They found, as the hon. gentleman explained it, that they had an abundance of coal, they had an abundance of iron, almost an unlimited quantity, and there was no reason why it could not be manufactured if their industries were fostered and encouraged, no reason why they could not manufacture as cheaply as Great Britain. Well, the prices came tumbling down until they reached the historical figures of 54. Perhaps the hon. gentlemen remember when steel rails got down to 54, then there was a great purchase made for Canada. Hon. gentlemen did not believe in protection at that time, they did not consider that protection was at work upon the industries of the United States, and that the price of steel rails would come tumbling down through the range of prices, leaving them dangling in the air at 54. They ought to recollect those figures. When hon. gentlemen opposite deal with the iron industry, they ought to deal with its history for a few years back, and not deal with it as it is today. It seems to me that they must know that iron is the very sinews of our modern civilisation, that no country which cannot supply its own iron can be independent. It is needed in commerce, it is needed in war, it is needed everywhere. If I recollect aright, we import $11,000,000 worth every year to carry on the great public works of Canada. In face of this fact, the hon. member for Huron told us that we had unlimited coal fields in Canada, that we had boundless fields of iron ore, and all the materials in the earth, only waiting the magic touch of capital and enterprise to drag them forth for the benefit of the people. Still, they are unwilling that the industry should be encouraged; they would rather see this country purchase from a foreign country, and from this standpoint they argue. I look at it from an entirely different standpoint. If you are going to adopt a protective system, you must adopt it in its entirety, and you must apply it to all the industries that need encouragement and protection. The true principle of protection is to encourage every industry that needs protection until it can stand alone and can compete with like industries in other countries, or in other words, until it is able to take care of itself. It appears to me to be right and consistent that the iron industry of Canada should be protected and fostered, and that it will have the effect of forcing into action the very powers that are capable of making Canada an iron manufacturing country. Now, Sir, the question is also one that appeals to our patriotism, somewhat, as well as to our material interests. We have a pride in talking of our British connection, notwithstanding that the hon. member for South Oxford tells that it is a flimsy hope. He gives us to understand that the day is rapidly approaching when some power more potent than the arm of Britain will be needed to protect us from invading foes, and indeed, he warns us in a quiet way that we had better seek shelter under the wing of the great American Eagle. Well, Sir, that has not much effect upon our minds in the Province of New Brunswick. I do not think it has much effect upon the minds up here in this part of the Dominion. We have long had implicit faith and confidence in the power of Great Britain, and we are proud to say that she has always protected her dominions, and always protected her subjects. We do not expect to live to see the day when we shall have to learn the bitter lesson that Britannia no longer rules the wave. I can tell the hon. member for South Oxford that his prediction does not affect our minds in the least. He tells us that all the great powers of Europe, France, Germany and Austria, are in league against Great Britain; still we are willing to take our lot and share with her, and if she is not able to protect her broad domains, then, Sir, we are willing to go down with her expiring glories. This is our view of it down in the Province, and I think it is really the view of the hon. member himself, only he wants to make an argument to suit his own purpose. Now, I want to deal with another industry, one which is somewhat difficult for me to speak about, an industry referred to in the amendment of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones)—I refer to the shipping industries of Canada. That amendment is somewhat artful, somewhat ingenious, and it would be folly for an individual like me who claims to be acquainted with the mariners interests of the country, to contend for one moment that the privileges mentioned in that amendment would not be a great boon to the Maritime Provinces. I admit that they would be a great boon; I must also admit that, comparatively speaking, perhaps no member in this House would be more benefitted by such a privilege than myself; no one would hail with greater delight such a privilege if it could be obtained upon fair and equitable terms to the Dominion. The reasons are obvious to any man who is acquainted with the shipping industry. We know that to give Canadian coasters the privilege of coasting along the American seaboard from Maine to Mexico, would be to enhance the value of Canadian coasters 50 per cent., yes, perhaps 100 per cent., at a single stroke. It would open a field to Canadian mariners where they could outdo our American neighbors. Let it be remembered that the carrying of the ocean trade of the world is now a subject of keen competition. It is a matter where combines and monopolies do not reach, it is really a survival of the fittest and it is only by energy, industry and a close application of the rules of economy, that we can obtain success in prosecuting the marine industry. Now, Sir, Canadian ships can under-work and outdo the American ships—lower cost of construction, lower wages, more economy exercised, and the sterling qualities of courage, energy and hardihood so prominent in the English sailor, and which have enabled England to become the mistress of the sea, are still to be found in her Canadian sons, which would win in any race upon the ocean. But, Sir, we have got to look at this matter in the face. Can this privilege be obtained? I am of opinion that it cannot be obtained, but even if it could be obtained upon the terms the hon. gentlemen propose, I would say, No, the price is too high. The matter comes home very close to me in that respect. Many of you are aware that every dollar I possess in the world is the result of following that industry, and every dollar I possess is involved in that business. But, Sir, if I must declare between my country and my property, I shall let the property go. I say it would be better that our coasting interests should perish, it would be better that our commerce in that direction should be driven from the seas, it would be better that our ships should rot, than we should engage in an increased trade in that direction at the fearful price to Canada that hon. gentlemen opposite propose to pay. It is coming right down to that with us. I expect to meet these statements. I expect to again face my constituents, and to hear it heralded on every platform that I stood in their light and in the way of obtaining a reciprocity treaty or unrestricted reciprocity. It will, no doubt, be heralded just as though hon. gentlemen opposite held reciprocity in their hands, and that voting for them and sustaining them would give us reciprocity. Such is not the fact at all; that is the way they desire it should go to the country, and, no doubt, they will avail themselves of it; but I will give them credit if they are able to persuade the people of my county that such is the case. I think I can show fairly and honestly what is the true state of affairs. I can show them that the proposition of hon. gentlemen opposite would mean the destruction of Canada. Experience has proved beyond a doubt that new industries can not combat with establishments that are cemented by time and raised by generous capital, backed by credit, the result of long and continued success, and operated by a large number of skilled and experienced workmen. It is impossible to expect it. They ask us at a single stroke to do away with protection, they ask us at a single stroke to open our markets to all foreign fabrics, to all the merchandise of the world, the result of which would be that our stores and warehouses would be filled with foreign fabrics at the price extinguishing our own manufactures. This is the extent and true state of affairs, and the carrying out of such a proposition would shake to its very foundation every industry and every establishment now in operation in this Dominion, and we would soon have a repetition of the scenes enacted in 1878 when the flies were on the wheel. It would not be long before we would get back to that position. It is unnecessary for me to follow that line of argument further. I think hon. gentlemen understand my views. I believe, I firmly believe, that the time is coming when we shall have freer trade relations with the people of the United States; but I take to ourselves the credit of bringing about that reciprocity of trade through the operation of the National Policy. That alone can bring it. I can fully understand and appreciate any remarks made by hon. gentlemen from different localities, particularly from Prince Edward Island, whose constituents suffer great loss on many products that go to the United States by the high duty and tariff against them. One of the hon. members for Prince Edwards Island spoke more particularly of potatoes. That is a low-priced article, and when a duty is placed on it, I sympathise with the farmers who have to meet it; but I say there is no advantage in the course the hon. gentlemen opposite are taking with regard to our natural products. I say it is only by holding firmly, by adhering strictly to the principles of our present policy, that we shall get reciprocity on fair and equitable terms to Canada; then I would claim it should be had, and I would fail to support any Administration that would not give us any reciprocity on those equitable terms. Hon. gentlemen opposite perhaps take that view to a certain extent, perhaps they do not. Perhaps they are of the opinion that all that is necessary for us to do is to say to the people of the United States that we are ready for unrestricted reciprocity or for any other kind of reciprocity, and they would accept our offer. But there is nothing to lead us to suppose that or to hope for that, and going to them in that way, as has been done repeatedly, will not bring about the desired result. Then I would ask each hon. member who can deal with the question from this standpoint to remember with me that the best interests of our country demands that we should maintain ourselves in our present condition until we know we can get fair and reasonable terms from the people of the United States. Remember that the best interests of our country, the power and glory of our country, depend entirely upon the prosperity, the intelligence and the inspiring hopes of the people we are here to represent and to govern. Then, so far as we can see, our duty lies in the direction of taking care of our different industries, and if we love our country we will stand by her industries and by the statesmen who have made them great.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. The question now before the House is perhaps one of the greatest interest that has been discussed since 1878. It would appear as if as many members would discuss this on the floor of Parliament as have discussed any other question since the date I have mentioned. I have the honor of representing a constituency which forms a portion of the county of Lambton. The hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) and myself represent, I think I may say without being egotistical, one of the finest counties in Canada, an opinion which the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) I feel satisfied will endorse, as he will anything I may say in regard to the prosperity and industry of the people of that county. In addition to the farming community and its farming interests, in addition to its fertile land, in addition to the intelligence of the people and the growing prosperity of its farmers, it has in its centre one of the largest industrial interests in this Dominion. That industry came into existence twenty years ago. Enniskillen, now Petrolia, was, at that time I may say, almost a solid bush. Now, so rapidly has that industry advanced, that to-day it has a population of about 5,000 people. To-day, Sir, let us look at the prosperity which is taking place in the country, and we will see that instead of the frame houses built temporarily some 20 years ago we have now some of the finest buildings and residences in that place that you will find in any other prosperous town in the Dominion. We have now before the House a choice of two resolutions. The one is unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, irrespective of the injury or the damage it may do to any of our prosperous manufactories or other prosperous industries in our country. The amendment to that motion embraces as well the desire to have reciprocity with the United States, but it is clothed with a protective clause which I think will meet with the approval of this House by perhaps the largest majority that this Government will obtain on any vote that will be taken during this Session. It will not only receive the very large support of the respective members of the House, but I think that if the questions were to be referred to the people of Canada, a still greater proportion would endorse the principles enunciated in the amendment of the hon. the Minister of Marine. While, Sir, adopting and approving of reciprocal trade with the United States to a large extent this motion protects our position in this country. Allow me to read it:

"That Canada in the future, as in the past, is desirous of cultivating and extending trade relations with the United States in so far as they may not conflict with the policy of fostering the various industries and interests of the Dominion which was adopted in 1879 and which has since received in so marked a manner the sanction and approval of the people."

This, Mr. Speaker, would appear to be the question before the House. The arguments adduced in favor of the original motion, if I mistake not, are these: First, that the deplorable condition of this country requires this radical change; and that, Sir, is perhaps the strongest ground that gentlemen on the other side submit to this House as to their argument that we should have unrestricted reciprocal trade with the United States. It is also contended, as a second argument, that free trade with the American market would add to our wealth, would increase the industries that we have in the country, and would increase the manufactures and manufacturers of the country; that it would increase the mining interests of this country, and would more thoroughly develop and increase the population. It is stated further, that it would also bring back to this country thousands of Canadians who are to be found in the United States, and who have left our Dominion; and it is also contended by those gentlemen opposite that all this could be obtained without any increased expense to us, without even resorting to direct taxation, and without tending to annexation. I wish to take issue flatly with those gentlemen on the other side on the arguments they have brought before the House, and on which, so far, they have maintained their position. I wish, Sir, and I hope to be able to prove to this House in my humble way before I sit down, that every argument they have used is untenable. I hope to be able to prove to this House that the position taken by the Conservatives of this country is the true position, and the only one that can be supported by facts. Now, Sir, as to the argument that they make that this country is in a deplorable condition, that it requires this radical change. I shall say a few words. It might be almost like cracking chestnuts if I attempted to repeat the testimony given by members on this side of the House, and which testimony points clearly to the improvement and steady progress of this country. But, Sir, you will remember that very distinct language has been used by gentlemen on the other side. The hon. leader of the Opposition, in the early part of his remarks to this House, treated the question on the ground that it would remove the agricultural depression which exists. This was the position that he took. In addition to this the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), in referring to the same matter says "that it was a cruel insult to the farmers of Ontario to say that they were in a prosperous and contented condition." Now, Sir, you have had the views of the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper) and the testimony of the highest authorities in the Province of Ontario on this question. You have had quoted to you the remarks made by Mr. Mowat, and also the remarks made by the hon. the Minister of Education for that Province. It may be that the experience of those gentlemen who administer public affairs in the Province of Ontario, has shown them the position of that Province better than it has to the gentlemen who are opposed to us in this House. In addition, Sir, to the remarks made by the hon. Minister of Education, and which this House surely is bound to accept, in addition to the remarks he made that this country had advantages and was surrounded by influences tending to make us a peaceful and contented people—using the very language in the positive that the hon. leader of the Opposition used in the negative, and using the very language in the positive that the hon. the member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) used in the negative—I will quote, Sir, another expression of this gentleman (the Hon. Mr. Ross) which I do not think was quoted on a previous occasion. He says, Sir:

"Our prosperity must have impressed him——"

This was addressed to the Hon. Mr. Chamberlain.

"and I hope he will speak of it when he returns to our friends in the mother country."

The gentlemen on the opposite side of the House will have to accept one of two positions. They must either have to apologise to the hon. the Minister of Education for the Province of Ontario for their ignorance in speaking of the farmers of Ontario, or else they will have to put up their hands to him and say: "Never mind, I was only talking 'buncombe' in the House of Parliament." I think, Sir, that I shall leave the hon. gentlemen on the other side to fight out this matter with the Hon. Mr. Mowat and the Hon. the Minister of Education, and not take up our time any further on this ground. Now, Sir, I shall refer to the position often referred to before in this debate which Canada occupies at the present time. Her progress to-day and the growth of her industries, as hon. gentlemen in this House know, whether they are willing to acknowledge it or not, are dependent on the resolutions of 1878. These resolutions having been carried into effect, have had the results of what protection in any young country will do, to foster the industries of the country, to increase its manufactures and to furnish a home market for the farmers of the country and thus improve their condition. I regret to say that the hon. the leader of the Opposition is absent from the House, but I will quote to you what the hon. gentleman said during the elections previous to the last election:

"I freely acknowledge that the situation had been changed even by 1882, and I have as freely acknowledged that it has been changed more since 1882, and that many things then possible are now absolutely impossible."

Now, Sir, he was then speaking against any interference with the tariff or in any way returning to the position that the country had been in prior to 1878.

"And that a more permanent structure has been raised some may think it for good, some may think it evil, but so it is. What an absurdity it would be not to recognise existing facts, not to avail ourselves fully and freely with frank and unprejudiced minds of all the knowledge and all the experience which has been accumulated, not to direct our course by the light so to be gained."

There, Sir, was the acknowledgment of that gentleman that having had the experience of this country since 1878, he said, as his own language tells us, that it would be wrong now not to direct our course by the light that we had gained. What was the result of that? The result of the adoption of the policy set forth in that speech is that many a Reformer to-day sits in this House who would otherwise never have been here. The hon. gentleman said:

"I have always recognised the great importance of stability in tariffs. It is one of the most material things."

It is only a few months since that language was used by that hon. gentleman, and it is only a few months since the Reformers who now occupy seats on the other side of the House were elected on the strength of the hon. gentleman's words. But to-day we find them, in the absence of the hon. gentleman, who I believe is in Italy, springing upon this House a motion for unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union with the United States, or whatever you like to call it. Surely that cannot be done with the sanction of that hon. gentleman. I hope, Sir, his absence is not dependent on this resolution being passed or refused by this House. I hope his absence will not be delayed a moment on account of this discussion. To me, a very young politician indeed, it seems that when a radical change of this kind is proposed, this House should remember that the principle of protection which was submitted fairly and honestly to the people of Canada, in three elections, was approved by the people only some thirteen months ago; and on that principle the majority of the members of this House now hold their seats. Therefore it appears to me that it would be monstrous for any member of this House to vote for this resolution of unrestricted reciprocity with the United States without at least having had the sanction of his constituents. Before any gentleman votes for it, I think his duty would first be to resign his seat, go to his constituents and tell them: There is the issue, I want you to send me to Parliament upon it. If hon. gentlemen opposite are prepared to take that course, I shall regret, after the election, the absence of a number of familiar faces that I see opposite me now. Now, Sir, on account of the very large vote of the farming population of this country, hon. gentlemen opposite have tried to awaken the prejudices of the farmers as much as possible. What is the best policy for the farmers? Hon. gentlemen opposite may say that I do not know anything about them; but I think I have had as much communication with farmers as many hon. gentlemen opposite. I say that any policy having the effect of increasing the demand for farm products must be of benefit to the farmers; and, not to waste more time on that subject, because it has already been fully discussed, I would just like to read three lines written by Robert Ellis Thompson, the great political economist of the United States, a gentleman who stands so high that he has been invited to lecture on political economy in the Harvard University. Upon that question he says:

"The policy which increases the number of those who are not engaged in farming, but must live on its products and pay for them, is that which secures for the farmer the best and steadiest remuneration."

Now, Sir, that policy was adopted by the hon. leader of this House, and has it resulted in benefit to the farmer? Let me refer to a few statistics showing the quantities of breadstuffs imported into this country under the policy which existed from 1874 to 1878, and under the National Policy from 1882 to 1886, and we shall see at a glance whether that policy has been of benefit to the farmers of this country or not. From 1874 to 1878 we imported breadstuffs to the enormous value of $67,692,000; from 1882 to 1886, with the protective tariff stemming back the flood of produce from the American market, the whole amount that has been permitted to come to this country to compete with the produce of the Canadian farmer, has been only $18,536,000 worth. $50,000,000 worth of breadstuffs have been excluded under the National Policy during those five years, which would have otherwise have come in to displace the produce of the Canadian farmer. Sir, that is not an evidence of ruin or desolation in Canada, but the very reverse. But while hon. gentlemen are wailing over the discontent of the farmers have they any idea of the condition of the farmers in other countries? Have they any idea that while we in Canada are enjoying prosperity, other countries are in the condition which they have improperly attributed to Canada. I find a report in a Scotch newspaper, of the Teviotdale Farmers' Club, stating that agriculture in Scotland is in a deplorable condition, that they have looked from year to year for an improvement in that interest, but without avail, and that now there appears to be no brighter prospect for the future, and there was no word of encouragement that could be offered to the farmers of Scotland at the present time. So that you find that your language is more applicable to other countries than to our own. Now, the result of our protection, as I have said, and I believe the statement cannot be contradicted, is, that it fosters the industries of the country, by increasing the demand for labor and creating among ourselves a variety of industrial functions. This same writer, to whom I have referred, Mr. Thomson, on page 363, says in reference to protection:

"It creates a variety of industrial functions within the nation, and fosters the most rapid and continual interchange of services between persons thus differentiated. It promotes associations between members of a same nation by producing variety in their employments; while free trade between more or less advanced nations always has resulted in the destruction of association among the people of the less advanced, and in a reduction to a monotony of occupation."

The United States have seen the folly of free trade, and Mr. Thomson, at page 358, refers to the development of the industries of the States, under its protective tariff, in these words:

"It is admitted on all hands that the effect of our present protective tariff has been an extraordinary development of our manufacturing industries, and a rapid advance towards a period when we shall be altogether independent of the rest of the world, as regards all the great staples which are capable of economical production on American soil."

Now, that is just the goal towards which we are steering in Canada to-day. And in time, economic writers will be able to use, with regard to Canada, the same language as Mr. Thomson has used in reference to the States. Now, it is stated by hon. gentlemen opposite that all they propose to do by their policy may be done without ever having to resort to direct taxation, and the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), speaking of the amount of money we would require to economise, said that we would not be in a worse position than that in which we are to-day. He said:

"It is possible to reduce our expenses by the entire loss that we would sustain from the American duties. We could reduce our expenses $7,000,000 with advantage."

Now, I understand, it is conceded in this House that the loss to the revenue of this country would be about $7,000,000 upon American imports, based upon the returns of last year. I maintain, however, that if we had free trade or reciprocity with the United States, the amount that would be cut off from our revenue would far exceed $7,000,000. I do not think I would be far astray in saying that it would be nearer $17,000,000 than $7,000,000, and my reasons are these: Hon. gentlemen opposite start off by saying that our loss would be $7,000,000, because that is the amount of duties we collected on imports from the United States last year; but the gentlemen who have been arguing in favor of unrestricted reciprocity and commercial union on the other side, have told the Americans there—and I believe their argument was a good one—as an inducement to carry out this policy, that it would double, if not quadruple, the trade between the United States and Canada. They contend that the Americans would furnish the Canadians with more cotton and machinery and with an additional quantity of every item upon which our tariff to-day imposes a tax of $7,000,000. What would the result be, we cannot use any more goods in the country than we make now; we have quite enough for our wants. It is therefore undeniable that, with a tariff ruling against all other countries but the United States, the result must be that the American goods will crowd out goods from Great Britain and Germany and other countries in the world, and thus deprive us of one-half, if not three-quarters, of the revenue at present obtained from our Customs tariff on imports from those countries. Let me tell you, Sir, what is the amount of dutiable goods received by us: the total imports of dutiable goods into this country last year were $105,639,000, of which we got from the United States, $45,107,000; from Great Britain, $44,962,000, and from other places the balance, about $15,500,000. From the United States, as I have said, we imported of dutiable goods $45,107,000 worth, and from other places, including Great Britain, $60,535,000 worth. Well, if the Americans were to bring into this country double what they bring now, we would only have about $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 worth of goods coming into this country from all the rest of the world, upon which the Minister of Customs could lay his tax. What would the result of that be? The result would be inevitably just what those hon. gentlemen say will not take place: it would be direct taxation. Are the people prepared to have direct taxation? I am sure the House would show by an overwhelming majority that we are not, and I am sure, if the hon. gentlemen opposite would go to the country on a policy of direct taxation, they would be met with the most ignominious defeat that they have yet received. I have here the language in reference to direct taxation, which the hon. gentleman who formerly led the Opposition and who is now in Italy, used here in January last. He said: "The great bulk of our taxes come, and must come, from taxation." Again he said: "What are our sources of taxation? Direct taxation is at this time out of the question." That hon. gentleman was, therefore, as fully impressed as we are to-day with the conviction that direct taxation is entirely out of the question. The reasons, he said, I need not discuss; the advantages and disadvantages I need not review. We are dealing with practical conditions, and no one suggests direct taxation as practicable. I think I have established that under the most economical system that could be devised, under a system that I would almost be willing the leader of the Opposition should adopt on this side of the House, it would be impossible to so control the finances of the country that we would not fall short $10,000,000 or $12,000,000, which would have to be raised by direct taxation. So much for direct taxation. A number of hon. gentlemen have talked about the sentimental view. So far, I have only dealt with the question in a business light, but I have sentiments just as other gentlemen in this House, and I should not like to enter into any trade arrangements that would have the effect of severing, at any time, our connection with the mother country, and I think that statement meets the hearty approval of every member of this House. If there is any hon. gentleman who does not approve of it, he had better retire and ask his constituents whether his views and theirs are in harmony. Now, dealing with this question of annexation with the United States, or with the fact that a resolution of this kind would have the effect of tending towards annexation with the United States, I feel I am correct in stating that it would. My naked statement certainly will not convince hon. gentlemen on the other side, but I think I shall prove to them, out of their own mouth, out of the mouths of their own newspapers and out of the mouths of their own supporters, that the result of this unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union will unquestionably tend, sooner or later, towards a political union of the two countries. I now read from the Globe of August 1st, 1887, the organ, I suppose, of hon. gentlemen opposite—at least, I do not think they will repudiate it as being their organ. The Globe says:

"Unrestricted reciprocity without a customs union is the unattainable best."

That is, that they consider that unrestricted reciprocity without a customs union is the best for this country.

"With a customs union, it would be very good, and that we can probably obtain. To refuse unrestricted reciprocity because it happens to involve commercial union would be like refusing a business worth a million a year because to take it would necessitate the abandonment of a trade worth ten thousand."

Now, what does this mean? It simply means, to begin with, that unrestricted reciprocity means commercial union, and, having defined that so far, I think I shall be able to prove to you more clearly that commercial union means annexation. Now, gentlemen on the other side, though they do not have their friend Mr. Goldwin Smith on the floor of the House to advocate their views, still advocate views very much like his, and they seem to be taking their cues from him and from the Wiman combination. On the 27th August last, speaking in Detroit, Mr. Goldwin Smith said:

"I believe that annexation would be best for both countries. I believe it is bound to come. It was not possible in this era of civilisation to keep apart two peoples so much alike as these. Their manifest destiny was to come together, and commercial union was but a step, though a large step to that end."

Do I prove it out of his mouth? Let me also refer to some gentlemen who are members of this House, and see whether their views are the same as those of this gentleman. This gentleman expresses almost a desire for annexation, but I believe the member in this House to whom I refer will not for a moment endorse the sentiments of Professor Goldwin Smith in this regard. I believe he is too loyal to do that, and I feel sure that there is not a taint of annexation about him. I refer to the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister). Still, I want to quote his words in reply to an interviewer who had an interview with him in the town of Sarnia, last summer. The interviewer says:

"Will not union develop the annexation sentiment?"

What is his answer, as far as the newspaper gives it? I was not there, but I have never heard it contradicted, and it is published in his own newspaper, the Sarnia Observer. He says:

"Annexation is the natural outgrowth of union, and, if we had that, annexation would probably follow ultimately."

I think I have convinced you of two things, that unrestricted reciprocity is only an underhand name for commercial union, and that commercial union in this country means only annexation ultimately, as the hon. member for Lambton West says. There is another thing to be considered. Having answered, I think, in some way, perhaps not to the satisfaction of all hon. gentlemen in this House, but according to my own opinions, these questions, I think we may fairly sum up by considering what would be the result of this union as it is to be brought out now. What would be the result to this country if we had this unrestricted reciprocity, by any name you choose to give it? I listened with great pleasure indeed to the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran). He seemed to grasp the key of the situation. He dealt with it in a masterly manner, showing the effect that commercial union or unrestricted free trade had in foreign countries where it had been adopted before, the effect it has had upon nations in the past, and that is the only way in which we would be able to judge as to the result of this proposed commercial union. My own impression would be that the United States would be constantly underselling us Canadians, that our manufacturers in this country would suffer from day to day, that the large surplus manufactured on the other side, which used to be brought in here as to a slaughter market under the 17½ per cent. tariff, would continue to be brought into this country in larger quantities than ever, that it would oust our manufacturers from the trade they have now accumulated here. That would have the inevitable result of destroying the growth of capital in the country. The one certainly follows the other. If you destroy the manufacturing interest in this country, you destroy one of the great means of increasing capital and making wealth. If you adopt the motion of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), you will destroy many an industry in this country, and the variety of industries in Canada will be lessened. That will be the inevitable result. Some industries are of a weaker class than others which have grown to be strong under this policy, and those would be wiped out, and in a short time the industries of this country would be probably counted on your fingers. I think also that the result of this resolution would be to cause the productive powers of Canada to steadily decline, the capital having been drawn out and the means of accumulating wealth having been taken away, and before very long we would find this country in the condition in which the hon. gentleman from Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) described the industrial manufactures of his own country. Now, Sir, this political economist, Mr. Thomson, has also very decided views upon that question. The House will pardon me if I read what he says upon the effect of free trade union between two nations, not between two nations of equal weight, of equal capital, of equal resources, but free trade union between a wealthy nation and a nation that is not in as good circumstances. Here is what he says:

"But this is by no means the actual state, even of the nations called civilised."

That is, they are not on an equal footing.

"No two nations have reached the same point in industrial development, some are far ahead, because of an earlier use of natural advantages, others lag far behind, though they are striving with all energy to come up. Suppose now, that two nations that differ thus should establish full and free commercial intercourse between each other, what will be the necessary effect? At first sight it might seem that the rich nation would be conferring benefits upon the poorer one, which the other could but feebly return; that the difference between them would gradually and steadily diminish through the poorer nation coming forward in industrial development, and taking an even higher place and that more rapidly than before."

Now, Sir, this author says that at first sight all that might be the result—at first sight only. He says that the picture drawn by the hon. gentlemen opposite may be a correct picture; but hon. gentlemen opposite, perhaps, had better study political economy a little more carefully and see if that is the inevitable result or not. Mr. Thomson goes on to say:

"But experience shows that just the reverse of this is the case: The rich nation becomes, for a time, at least, richer by the exchange, the poor nation permanently poorer. The former, through its command of cheap capital, and, by consequence, its greater division and deficiency of labor, can continually undersell the latter in whatever it chooses to export to it, for it can send it manufactured goods at prices with which the manufacturers of the other cannot compete. The process of accumulating capital in the poorer country is decidedly checked; its people are reduced from what variety of industry and the mutual exchange of services they had possessed, to a uniformity of employment in which no man needs or helps his neighbor. Their power of association is destroyed; money, the instrument of association, is drained out of the country. Nothing is left them but the production of such raw materials as the richer nation chooses to buy, and how unprofitable a commerce of that sort is, we have already seen. The country steadily declines in all the elements of productive power, even in the character of the single home industry that is left it. 'From him that hath not, is taken away that which he seemeth to have.'"

Now, Sir, that is the true doctrine, and I hope that hon. gentlemen opposite, before they cast their votes, will consider well the doctrine that is laid down by this political economist. Let me ask those hon. gentlemen now, if they were upon this side of the House, and charged with the administration of the country, is there a single man of them who would dare to pronounce in favor of unrestricted reciprocity? I will guarantee that it never would be mentioned by any one of those hon. gentlemen, if they were conducting the finance and the fiscal policy of this country, as they were elected to do, and as that policy is now being conducted by the leader of this Government. In conclusion let me say that the vast majority of the Canadian people are in favor of cultivating trade with the United States, but, in the language of the amendment, only in so far as it does not conflict with the policy of fostering the various industries of this country; nor will the Conservative party support any policy that will disturb the trade and industry which have been established here. I can honestly say that I wish hon. gentlemen opposite would not take such a gloomy view of this country and of its future. I believe if they could rid themselves of that tendency they would be much better able to discuss this question. I wish they would lay aside their partisan views in discussing a national question like this. Hon. gentlemen may laugh, but I ask them whether they would not take the same view if they were intrusted with the administration of this country. We ought to approach the consideration of this question as true and loyal Canadians and British subjects. But hon. gentlemen opposite seem to have no faith in the future of this country. It may be well said of them, "O, ye of little faith." In closing, Mr. Speaker, permit me to quote just four lines from an American poet, which I venture to believe, echo the feelings and echo the hopes of all true Canadians:

"Our hearts, our hopes are all with thee;
Our hearts, our hopes, our prayers, our fears,
Our faith triumphant o'er our fears,
Are all with thee, are all with thee."

Mr. SKINNER. In rising to address the House upon this important question I feel some embarrassment, because I doubt if the opinions I hold are entirely in accordance with those held on either side of the House. Still, whatever opinions I have I feel it my duty to express them under the circumstances, because, from the liberty of debate that is granted here, it seems to be generally conceded that every gentleman should have the privilege of saying pretty nearly what he likes upon this question. The reason that I feel a degree of embarrassment in addressing the House on this question is that I ran my election under a pledge to my constituents that I would make no war upon the National Policy. I do not know but that, to a certain extent, at least in my own mind, I thought that was a wiser way in which to run the election, because I believed that, outside of the merits or demerits of the National Policy, inasmuch as the country had approved of it in subsequent elections, it was better, in the interest of the whole country, that it should be maintained, for a time, at least, in order that the manufacturers and capitalists of the country should know what to depend upon, and that the business of the country should be, as far as possible, upon a stable foundation. But holding that opinion and making these statements, representing as I do and running as I did in connection with a maritime constituency, I always understood that those who framed the National Policy framed it in this way, that as soon as the United States were willing to relax their tariff we would be willing to meet them and relax ours. And therefore I stand upon that foundation in this House to-day, and while I have been a supporter in my own constituency of the National Policy, and while I am to a certain extent at least a supporter of it here, I say that I support it upon the understanding that it is not to be forever, so to speak, established among us, that it is not to be considered as one of the permanent institutions of the country, but as the strong hand of the people for the time to guard the manufacturers of the country until they shall by the strength of the tariff have sufficient power of themselves to compete with other nations. If they are not then willing to accept the National Policy, then my opinion would be that it would be better that we had never had it. Passing from that branch of the subject as to permanency of the tariff I say this, that if we can get free trade with the United States I am in favor of having it. If we are to have free trade with the United States I want us to acquire it in such a way that we can conduct the institutions of the country and preserve our national existence all the way through. It has been said here that if the tariff of the United States was going to be disagreeable to England, then so much the worse for England. I do not accede to that proposition at all.

An hon. MEMBER. A Tory.

Mr. SKINNER. Never mind what I am, Tory or anything else. We could not get free trade with the United States as a matter of legislation; that is to say, that if the United States would give us free trade now, within five or ten years they might change that legislation and so upset the whole trade relations of the two countries; that would not do. If we are to have free trade with them it must be a matter of treaty, and if so, the treaty must be made as matters now stand through the British Government, we speaking through and with them, as was the case in regard to the Fisheries Treaty. That being the way these matters would have to be proceeded with we should move hand in hand with the mother country, or I would rather say shoulder to shoulder with the mother country. I do not, therefore, like either here or at the hustings or in the country or anywhere these sentiments thrown out—that if the mother country did not like it we would do so and so. Let us as loyal men and as the representatives of loyal people first ascertain what the mother country is willing to do, and if after that had been done it was not satisfactory, it would then be time enough for us to express sentiments of that character. There are two points to be kept in view with respect to the National Policy; the first is the building up of our domestic trade, and the second is the creation and building up of a foreign trade as well. We all know that the National Policy or protection is practically directed towards the building up of internal trade, and in proportion very largely as it builds up internal trade it does so at the expense of the foreign trade, and that country cannot be called to any very great extent a successful country which, while it may strengthen its right hand, so to speak, its domestic trade, paralyses its left hand, its foreign trade. The real truth of this matter is, therefore, not on either side of the House, or at all events is not as much on either side as hon. gentlemen on the Opposition seem to think. Now, with respect to our foreign trade. I do not agree exactly with what my co-representative (Mr. Ellis) said last night in regard to the West India trade. He seemed to think we would reach the very sum of happiness so far as trade was concerned if we obtained free trade with the United States. I do not think so. I think free trade with the United States would be very desirable, I do not think it would be everything. I hold that growing as young Canada is we are capable, even if the United States would never give us free trade, of building up a foreign as well as a domestic trade. My

hon. friend said that it was not worth while troubling about the West India trade for it would not amount to much. I looked into the statistics with respect to the West India trade the other day and I differ from him, and with the very best of feeling I put this difference before the House. Since last session of Parliament I have done what I could in my own constituency with a view to turning the attention of the merchants and traders of the Province to the development of a foreign trade—not exactly a foreign trade, but a trade with South America and the West Indies. What is the West India trade, that is trade with the British West Indies in particular? Last year the United States exported of their products to the West Indies an amount to the value of $6,462,030; Canada sent products to the value of $1,166,268. When you remember that the West Indies are a part of our country and that if we had facilities for trading with them and if our people directed their attention to the same extent in that direction as they have done in other directions the United States would not so far outstrip us in that trade. If hon. members would turn their attention, moreover, to the details of the articles that make up the merchandise sent by the United States to the British West Indies last year, they will see that Canada could have supplied every article the United States sent there. I think, therefore, it is worth our while to turn our attention to this trade and to control it if we can, and the merchants and manufacturers of Canada in view of the perseverance, capital and capacity they have shown in regard to the internal trade, could no doubt substantially control that foreign business if they make up their minds to do it. Take now the great country of Brazil, a country as large as the United States, and one possessing vast resources. The United States sent there last year goods to the value of $7,071,753, Canada sent goods to the value of $439,382. Is there not a fine field there for the cultivation of Canadian trade? How was it with respect to the Argentine Republic? The United States sent that republic last year $5,671,729 worth of merchandise. How much did Canada send them? Only $385,984 worth. See what a field there is there. That country is rising into mercantile greatness, not into manufacturing greatness, and it is rising with astonishingly rapid strides, and, so to speak, inviting the merchants and manufacturing world to bid for its trade. Let us in Canada not turn so much to internal business but direct our attention to the foreign trade, and when we want some field of operation let us not altogether turn our attention to the United States but let us take other countries as well. Then there is the French West Indies. The United States last year sent them $4,344,344 worth, and Canada sent them next to nothing, if not almost nothing. I put those statistics before the House because I recognise that all peoples as well as all individuals are inclined to run too much into grooves. We are running one time into the groove of the National Policy and we get it, so to speak, on the brain. We relieve our minds from that, and then we turn our attention to the United States as the great panacea for what are called the evils of this country. I think this question is larger than that, and I ask that the attention of the country shall be turned towards South America, in order that a trade may be built up in that direction. I wish also to say, when I am upon this subject, that, as a Canadian and as a British subject, I hope to see the day when every foot of British soil in America shall be under the confederation of which we have the honor to be associated. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, and gentlemen, I make this expression of my opinion, and I do not wish to be misunderstood in the slightest. I am not seeking to go between parties, or anything of that kind. I have just as much interest as the rest of you in falling right into line, and I merely wish to express what my own honest conviction is. I do not wish to be considered as attacking party lines. The expression is purely of my own opinions, whether they be worth anything or not. I am in favor of reciprocal trade with the United States. I am in favor of meeting the United States, as it were step by step, as they may hold out their hands towards us, but I am not in favor of cringing to them; I am not in favor of degrading my own country, and asking them to give us free trade because we are poor. Gentlemen, poverty is no more honorable in a nation than it is in an individual. The individual who is poor is powerless as still water. So it is with a nation and so it would be with a Dominion like this. In my opinion, if we want the respect of the United States, and if we want the respect of the world, it is our duty to stand upon the greatness of our country, and whilst we say to the United States: "We want to trade with you," we should also say: "We do not want to trade with you because we are poor, but we want to trade with you because we are rich, because we are capable of giving you as much as you can give us, and we can make our relations reciprocal and to the interest of both of us." Now, gentlemen, as to the coasting trade in the Maritime Provinces. Some hon. gentlemen from the Maritime Provinces scarcely grasp—at least, I think they scarcely grasp—the importance of the coasting trade and of all that it implies. I would have you remember that in the Maritime Provinces we have something over 800,000 of a population, and taking them man for man they are as prosperous as any people in the Dominion. They may not be as wealthy, because we have not had the opportunity of heaping up wealth of individuals as you have had in the western country, but yet, take our population man for man they are on the average as independent, as contented and as prosperous a people as in any other part of the Dominion. We have heard a good deal of the greatness, of wheat products of Ontario. Why, gentlemen, the fishing privileges and properties of the Maritime Provinces are equal in value to the wheat crop of Ontario. Therefore it is that with those maritime interests on our hands we are not as deeply interested in the National Policy as you are in the other Provinces. Protection of course is a sort of congestion, protection benefits the centres more than it does the extremes of a country. In those ports and places situated upon the coast of the country there, merchants stretch their eyes as it were out over the seas and their business grows up upon the water, and merchants and manufacturers in those centres are more deeply interested in protection than others. In my opinion therefore the policy of Canada should be so moderated, or, so to speak, it should be so modulated, that it should not be all for Ontario, if you like that, but it should prosper the Maritime Provinces as well, and the Government of the country casting their eyes over the whole country should see what the whole demands and make an average policy for the benefit of the entire Dominion. That being the case you will see that our policy could be modified in a great many things, so that it will give to the merchants of the sea an opportunity to build up a foreign commerce, as well as to give the manufacturers of Hamilton, Montreal and Toronto an opportunity to have protection against "slaughter markets" and against all foreign trade unfairly carried on against them. I wish to say a word with reference to the Intercolonial Railway. Everything seems to have been drawn into this debate and I have heard it charged here against the Government of Canada that the Intercolonial Railway does not pay. Gentlemen, the River St. Lawrence does not pay, but if you would close it up it would paralyse the free flow of trade and commerce of this great Dominion to such an extent that you could not get any person to vote in favor of closing it up. The Intercolonial Railway is as I understand it in the same position with reference to Canada as the Canadian Pacific Railway is, that is to say, the two together make up the great artery of trade through this Dominion.

In this connection, I am sorry to see that one of my maritime friends should have reflected upon the Government because they gave money enough to build the Short Line Railway. A remark of this kind, of course, does not please a gentleman who comes from another part of the country. As you know, in the city of which I am one of the representatives in this House, this project has been looked forward to since Confederation. They have looked forward to having the shortest line to Montreal and the west for the purpose, of our trade. We say that this work is in the spirit of Confederation, we also say that it tends to develop the commerce of the whole country, and the city of St. John is, therefore, heartily in favor of the Short Line Railway. We hope, when it shall be built and when we have facilities to carry on business with Western Canada, we shall be in a position then to extend our trade with Montreal and Toronto under greatly more advantageous circumstances than we have had before. Gentlemen, we, in the Maritime Provinces, have made sacrifices in connection with the Union, and as my hon. friend said last night, our foreign trade has been depressed. It has decreased to some extent but the decrease of our foreign trade has been made up by the development of a certain amount of internal trade, otherwise we would have been in a very bad position in St. John and New Brunswick. Mr. Speaker, in reference to this question of how New Brunswick has suffered from the trade relations of this country let me say this, that when we entered into the Union our Province, according to its population, was one of the largest shipowning countries in the world. The money of our merchants was invested in wooden ships, and that business has been entirely wiped out—when I say entirely, I mean substantially; and after that business was wiped out by the iron ships, one would think we would fall beneath the loss. But we did not; and more than that, we stood up under the great calamity of the fire of ten years ago, which was as great a loss to us as would be the loss to the people of Montreal if a fire should occur there to-morrow and sweep away $75,000,000 worth of property. We could not have done that unless our business houses were on good foundations, and unless manufacturing to some extent had been developed. We are holding our own to-day, and I do not believe that in the Maritime Provinces anything like a substantial vote would be cast in favor of taking New Brunswick out of this Union. I come here representing the sentiments of a class of people who believe they should have some remedies given them, and who believe they can get those remedies by loyalty to the Union, by joining hands with those with whom they are associated, and persevering in the course we have undertaken to follow.

After Recess.

Mr. SKINNER. I do not intend to continue my remarks at any great length. I have expressed the views I hold on this question and in doing so have attempted to condense rather than expand. If I had my own way in the matter, I should propose a resolution different from any of those now before the House; but before saying what that resolution would be, I wish to call the attention of the House to a fact in illustration of the object at which I think we should aim, namely, to reduce our tariff whenever the business of the country will allow of it, and whenever the course taken by the United States would be in the same direction. For example, the members for the city and county of St. John have recently heard from their constituents, and we have seen it is stated in the public press, that a petition has been sent to the United States Congress by persons interested in the lime business in the United States paying for an increase in the duty on lime. We have near the city of St. John one of the finest lime deposits in America, and recently there has been an extensive development of that business, and the lime has been exported in large quantities to the United States, thus, of course, coming into direct competition with the lime produced in that country. Our tariff on lime is 20 per cent, whereas the tariff of the United States is 10 per cent, and the petition presented to Congress asks that the duty on lime coming from Canada should be made equal to the Canadian duty. Now, that strikes me to be a case to which the attention of the Government should be drawn, and if our tariff is higher than that of the United States, let it be reduced. Therefore, I would have no cast-iron rule regulating this matter; but I would say, let us modify our tariff as the interests of the country should require. The resolution I would like to move would be something like this: Resolved, that the Government of Canada be requested to communicate with the Government of the United States, and ascertain whether they are willing to enter into an arrangement of reciprocity in all articles the produce of the two countries, and if they are, on what terms it can be had, and that the result of the enquiry be laid before the House. Then we could ascertain whether we could get such an arrangement and on what terms, and the House and the country would be able to come to a conclusion as to whether they could get it or not. But, as I say, situated as I am, it is not for me to say what resolution should be submitted to the House, because it would be useless for me to move a resolution unless I were certain of getting some considerable support for it. Therefore my views of the question just bring me to this conclusion, that I am in favor of reciprocity when it can be had, even if it impinges to a certain extent on the National Policy. The amendment moved to the resolution by the hon. Minister of Marine is to the effect that we can never have reciprocity if it is going to impinge on the National Policy. That far I cannot go, and, therefore, I shall not be able to support that amendment. I would rather something such as I suggest should be offered, so that inquiry could be made, because I wish it distinctly understood that I am in favor of reciprocity between the two countries when we can get it in harmony with the interest of the country, and in accordance with the dignity of Canada.

Mr. BORDEN. The hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) in his speech last night, based a large part of his argument, to justify him in voting against the proposition for unrestricted reciprocity, upon certain reports of agricultural societies from which he read very extensive extracts to this House, the principal one being that of an agricultural society in my county. It is possible that I should not have troubled the House with any remarks on this subject at this stage had not the hon. gentleman paid so much attention to the county which I have the honor to represent. Now, I will say at once that I have no objection to that report. That report in the main, so far as it referred to the subject to which it had a right to refer, as the report of an agricultural society, was true. It is a report written by a clever man, but not by an agriculturist. It will be clear to any one who reads it, that the report was a very peculiar one to emanate from an agricultural society. The fact is it was the work of a doctor of medicine. Like many other doctors, whom we know in this House, this doctor had a mind above and beyond the ordinary practice of his profession, and if this report be fully read, it will be found that he is inclined to cut a very wide swathe, because, in the course of the report, he treats of the physical position of the country, its political position, its trade and commerce, and winds up with a short dissertation on morals. He concludes his report in this way:

"The only ruin threatening is rum ruin. Let us see to it that our Council makes every provision in its power for the enforcement of the Scott Act."

So you will observe the author of this report is a cosmopolitan gentleman, who does not confine himself to matters of agriculture. It is only fair for me to explain in this connection that the gentleman who wrote it took a very active part in politics in the county of King's, and took the stump throughout the elections just preceding the issuing of this report, the local elections of 1886. Having taken a very prominent part in these elections, and having got the worst of it, he took advantage of his opportunity to abuse his position by interjecting political matters into a report which should have been entirely free from anything of the kind. But, as I have said, so far as the report treats of matters which legitimately belong to it, I endorse it entirely. When he says that the valley of Cornwallis and Annapolis, the country represented by the hon. member for Annapolis and myself, has superior advantages for the growing of fruit and apples, I agree with him. When he says it is one of the finest spots on the face of the earth for that industry, I approve of what he says. His statement cannot be gainsaid. But the hon. member for Annapolis has no right to make use of statements improperly put in his report, as for instance, the following with regard to potatoes :

"For years the crop which overshadowed all others in this valley, since the abrogation of the reciprocity treaty, and the imposition of a duty, in 1886, have gradually taken the second place, apples now leading. In the political agitation which recently visited us, there is no doubt that potatoes and reciprocity were greatly mixed up in the minds of our farmers. The old days of a dollar a bushel held a fond place in their memories. Reciprocity for King's means simply a free market in the United States for potatoes. This, it is believed, would be a panacea for all our ills."

Now, by that very statement, he admits that the question of reciprocity is an important one in the county of King's. That very statement shows that the people think reciprocity would be the panacea for all their ills, yet the hon. member for Annapolis argues from this report that the people of that country are entirely satisfied with their present condition, and do not desire reciprocity at all. Now, with regard to the growth of fruit, and with regard to the apple crop, we have, as I said before, superior advantages. We have, it may be said, a monopoly, which is a natural monopoly, a monopoly which the Great Giver of all goods has bestowed upon us, and which hurts nobody but does good to everybody. It is not a monopoly which we have had to seek at the hands of Parliament; it is not a monopoly which taxes the rest of the country to support us. Quite the contrary, it is a monopoly which does everybody good, both those to whom we sell and those who have the fruit to sell. The hon. member for Annapolis has told us that we go abroad into the world to sell our products. So we do, we go into the English market. A year ago, we sold in that market 100 barrels of apples, for which we obtained good prices; but we have not to thank the National Policy for that. We have not to thank any particular legislation for that. On the contrary we were interfered with. Our enjoyment of the very benefits which Providence has conferred on us is interfered with by the fact that we are not allowed to buy where we sell; and when we go across the Atlantic with our fruit, we cannot bring back English goods, but have to bring back the money and spend it somewhere in the Dominion, in purchasing, at enhanced prices, the articles we consume. To judge by the tone of the remarks of the hon. member for Annapolis, the people of King's and Annapolis live exclusively upon apples. They clothe themselves with apples or apple leaves, possibly, as in the old story with regard to the Garden of Eden. Why, the people of those counties are large consumers. They want something to eat; they want clothing; they want agricultural implements and the tariff we have in this country interferes with their buying in the markets where they want to buy, and obliges them to come back with their money and buy it home at enhanced prices. However, I do not intend to enlarge on that subject.

I wish to show further that the hon. member for Annapolis is not correct in endeavoring to convey to the House the impression, although he was correct in what he said with regard to the fruit industry, that we do nothing in those counties but grow fruit. One of the most important features of that magnificent valley is the diversity of the crops we are able to grow. We not only grow apples but we produce an enormous quantity of potatoes, and there is no crop from which our farmers are as sure of getting a return as from the potato crop. The hon. member for Annapolis did not see fit to read extracts from some of the reports of the agricultural societies, which would have thrown light upon this industry, and have shown that we are dependent upon other markets besides the English market for a return for our crops. In King's country, the Central Agricultural Society has this report :

"A new market has been opened to us through the Hathaway Line of steamers which ply between Annapolis and Boston."

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). That is defunct years ago.

Mr. BORDEN. Well, there is a line in its place. Is there not regular steam communication between Annapolis and Boston every week or twice a week.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). Yes.

Mr. BORDEN. Then it does not matter whether it is a Hathaway Line or another line. But the report goes on to say :

"A new market has been opened to us through the Hathaway Line of steamers with Boston, which has already been of great importance to this section of the Province. A large amount of mutton, fruit, vegetables, poultry and dairy produce have been shipped, and favorable returns realised."

The King's County Agricultural Society in its report says :

"A new departure was made in this county by the shipment to New York of several cargoes of turnips at 35 and 40 cents per bushel. Should a market for turnips continue, even at 30 cents, this will make a profitable crop, as they can be made to yield 1,000 bushels to the acre—900 having been grown on one acre in Cornwallis last season."

That report was written by the very gentleman whose other report was so largely quoted by the hon. member for Annapolis. Then the Central Agricultural Society of King's County, says :

"Potatoes, our staple crop, have given a very abundant yield * * * Lamb, poultry, eggs and dairy produce (owing mainly to the Boston market via the Hathaway line from Annapolis) have been in good demand and bring good returns. A large amount of potatoes are also sent by this line, which is a great accommodation to many farmers along the line of railway."

The Union Agricultural Society reports :

"With an average crop of fruit they (the farmers) are obtaining very large prices, and in the sale of an extraordinary large yield of potatoes and hay of superior quality, the returns have seldom been equalled and never exceeded. In viewing the prospects of the industrious agriculturists, we are more and more convinced that, with free and favorable markets for the sale of our products, our lines have fallen in pleasant places and that we have a goodly heritage."

The Farmers Agricultural Society Directors' report of 1884 says :

"In reference to the crops we beg to report that as a whole we have been blessed with a liberal harvest, for which we feel grateful to the Giver of all good. Potatoes, our staple crop, were about an average; prices however, ruled low, and owing to the exorbitant duty, but few will be likely to find their way to the United States; probably a large portion of them will be driven to market. * * * Apples probably not more than half an average crop, but quality good; a large quantity have already found their way to the United States markets."

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). What year is that?

Mr. BORDEN. 1884.

M. MILLS (Annapolis). That is four years ago.

Mr. BORDEN. Three years ago. It is not very long ago. The West Cornwallis Agricultural Society Officers report says :

"Potatoes an abundant crop, especially in moist land, but as yet prices ranging very low."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will quote to the hon. gentleman some of the reports from the Annapolis Society which he seems to have overlooked, and first the Nictaux Agricultural Society Directors' report, says:

"Potatoes a large crop, and turnips about an average, but owing to the low price and small demand they will mostly be fed to stock."

Bridgetown Agricultural Society Directors' report:

"Potatoes a fair yield, but the market value both 'home and abroad' is very discouraging for paying prices."

Paradise Agricultural Society Directors' report:

"In presenting their annual report the directors of this society would note that while our farmers are not untouched by the 'hard times,' which more or less affect all branches of trade, their condition will yet, we believe, compare favorably with that of their fellows enjoyed in other industries."

"2. Crop Report.—Hay far below the average, but well made. Potatoes above average and of fine quality. Grain, average yield; turnips and other roots, owing to want of timely rain, small. Fruit far below average, but prices for hand picked, rule high; from $3 to $4 at the orchard."

The Eastern Annapolis Agricultural Society Director's report states:

"The past year has been in many respects disadvantageous to the farmers in this place in common with other localities, as regards general cultivated crops. Hay very short and gathered in bad condition; wheat small quantities sown with fair yield; corn below average; peas and beans medium; potatoes, small crop and rather inferior in quality, selling value nothing; apples, abundant crop, of average quality, but the selling prices are low, so in the end our net cash receipts on our year's operations in crops will be much less than was wished for and expected in the early season."

Now, I think that those extracts which I have read show very fairly that the impression which the hon. gentleman attempted to convey to this House last night was not exactly in accordance with the facts, first as to our dependence entirely upon the fruit crop, and secondly, as to the people of that locality not wishing or caring for a reciprocity treaty. The potato crop, as I have shown, is one of our most important crops, and, as pointed out in one of the reports I have read, we know that our farmers are met with a duty of 15 cents a bushel on these potatoes when they send them to the United States. Last year the farmers of my county exported more than 200,000 bushels of potatoes, which at 15 cents a bushel, means $30,000 which the farmers of the county would have received but for the duty. I do not know the extent of the exportation from Annapolis county, but I have no doubt, judging from the reports which are here, that it was very large. Then there is the article of hay, and I am sure the hon. gentleman is deeply interested in that. I believe that Annapolis county exports a very large quantity of hay to the United States market, where it meets a duty of $2 a ton. The hon. gentleman told us that the values of real estate had greatly increased in that valley. He said that the statements made by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, that the assessed value of property in this country had not materially increased in the last twenty years, were entirely a mistake so far as our section of the country was concerned. I agree with him so far as the orchard lands of that valley are concerned. There is no question that there has been in the last five years a great increase in the value of those lands, but, I am sorry to say, they are all not orchard lands; orchard lands bear a very small proportion to the total number of acres in that valley. We have large farms which are not growing fruit at all, but are depending entirely on the growth of potatoes and other vegetables, and I say, and I challenge contradiction, that any farm which has not an orchard on it is not worth half what it was in 1866, the last year of the Reciprocity Treaty. I think the hon. gentleman will find that, in the county of Annapolis, as well as in the county of King's, along the area of the mountain range along the southern side of the Bay of Fundy, there are thousands of acres of land which are now not occupied at all and which twenty years ago were supporting hundreds of thrifty and industrious people. I challenge contradiction on that point. Three years ago, the total assessment of the county of King's did not exceed by many thousand dollars the total assessment twenty years previous to that date.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). The same may be said of Annapolis as regards the assessment.

Mr. BORDEN. The assessment is conducted on the same principle now as it was then.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). The assessment is no criterion whatever.

Mr. BORDEN. It may not be a criterion, but I say that the assessment is made on precisely the same principle as it was twenty years ago.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). I would like to make an explanation, if the hon. gentlemen will allow me. The assessment is no criterion. In the county of Annapolis—and I know what I am talking about, for I have had some experience in regard to it—they assess the wards, each ward has an assessor, and the county is rated according to that assessment. In some wards, they think the ward nearest to them is assessed too low, and, notwithstanding their oath, they will assess the property in their ward lower still, and so on until they get the whole thing down to a very low rate of assessment. That is the way in Annapolis, and I think it is in King's also.

Mr. BORDEN. I do not see that that is very much of an explanation. The principle upon which the assessment is made is precisely the same now as it was twenty years ago, and I say that the assessment has not increased pro rata with the population in the last twenty years, and the reason is that, although there has been an enormous increase in the value of orchard lands, there has been a corresponding decrease in the value of those lands which are used for ordinary farming purposes only, and I say further that, if we had the old Reciprocity Treaty—and I appeal to the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) to contradict me if he can—if we had a restoration of the old Reciprocity Treaty of 1854, the property in the county of Annapolis and in the county of King's, the moment it was known, would be worth 25 per cent. more than it is to-day. The hon. gentleman cannot contradict that statement. Now, I will call attention still further concerning the value of property. There is another kind of property, the property in the villages and towns along the coasts of our western shores. During the existence of the Reciprocity Treaty we had a continuous progress. Towns and villages grew up and became thrifty, and did a profitable trade with our neighbors in the United States. Those towns have become almost depopulated. Along the whole coast of King's county and the Bay of Fundy, and, I will venture to say, the county of Annapolis, you will find scores of houses untenanted, shops unused, and wharves unused. If the resolution of the hon. gentleman for Halifax could become law, if that arrangement for coasting trade between the two countries could be made, I venture to say that in only three years these towns and villages would be restored to the old prosperity which they enjoyed during the period between 1854 and 1866. Now, since the report of the gentleman to whom I referred in opening my speech, has been read so extensively, and commented upon so extensively, by the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills), I may be pardoned for illustrating this part of my subject by referring to an incident of the campaign during the elections of 1866. The gentleman who made this report was on the stump, supporting the candidate who was opposed to me. I happened to meet him in a public meeting. He pointed to me and said: "Dr. Borden is the last man to complain of our not being entirely prosperous."

"Why," he said, "he is prosperous, look at the fine place he lives in, the nice grounds and beautiful buildings that he has around him. I am glad of it, but he is the last man to complain of hard times." I said in reply that I did not care to have my private affairs dragged into a public meeting, but as he had seen fit to take me as an example I explained to this meeting how I happened to become possessed of that property. That property was purchased in 1866 by the man who sold it to me the last year of the Reciprocity Treaty, and one year before Confederation, for the sum of $4,000. That man spent $1,000 in adding lands and buildings to that property, making it cost him $5,000, 15 years after that date, that man was glad to sell it to me for $2,100, and that is the way I became possessor of that valuable property. That argument seemed to satisfy even the gentleman himself, and I may state further that if any person would come to me to-day and give me $2,100 and the additional money which I have spent in building since, I will gladly sell him that property. I think that is a fair illustration of how property has diminished in value in towns. I do not speak of farming and orchard lands, they are exceptions, but of the towns in the western part of Nova Scotia. So much, then, for the assessed value of property. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have been a somewhat attentive student of public questions in this country since I had the honor of a seat in this House. Since 1874, I have usually been in my place, and I have had the pleasure of listening to most of the discussions that have taken place in this House during the time I have been a member of it, and I have always understood, up to this time, that reciprocity was a part of the political faith of both parties in this country. I think I can show the House the very best reasons for believing that. Take the history of the different treaties. Both parties assisted in the negotiations of the treaty of 1854; both parties agreed that it was a good thing. In 1866 both parties agreed that that treaty should be renewed if possible. The liberal party sent an agent to Washington, in 1874, to attempt to negotiate a treaty; unfortunately he failed. The next utterance we have upon the subject of reciprocity was made in 1876, in this House, and I had the pleasure of listening to it. I hold in my hand the speech of the present Finance Minister, which he made in this House on the 15th March, 1876, and here is what he said:

"Individual members might be opposed to reciprocity, but both political parties were favorable to such a treaty, which meant free trade to a certain extent with the United States; and it could only be attained by one means—a defensive policy. Why did we get it 20 years ago? Simply in order to remove the customs duties, which restricted the free interchange of certain products between the two countries. Why did they adopt that treaty? It was because there was a hostile tariff on both sides of the line, and the time has come when, if we would secure a renewal of reciprocal relations, we must have something to offer. Therefore every one who believed in reciprocal free trade with the United States was bound to support the resolution before the House."

The resolution mentioned was moved by the right hon. gentleman who now leads the House, in amendment, I think, to going into Committee of Supply. Then what do we find next? In 1878, on the eve of the general election, the right hon. gentleman moved the following resolution:

"This House is of the opinion that the welfare of Canada requires the adoption of a national policy, which, by a judicial readjustment of the tariff, will benefit and foster the agricultural, the mining, the manufacturing and other interests of the Dominion; that such a policy will retain in Canada thousands of our fellow country-men now obliged to expatriate themselves in search of the employment denied them at home, will restore prosperity to our struggling industries, now so sadly depressed, will prevent Canada from being made a sacrifice market, will encourage and develop an active interprovincial trade, and moving (as it ought to do) in the direction of a reciprocity of tariffs with our neighbors, so far as the varied interests of Canada may demand, will greatly tend to procure for this country eventually a reciprocity of trade."

"They will not have anything like reciprocity of trade with us unless we show them that it will be to their advantage. Why should they give us reciprocity when they have our markets open to them now? * * * It is only by closing our doors and by cutting them out of our markets, that they will open theirs to us. If they would take the same steps as England had done with France, and say: We will lower the duties on your wines, if you will lower the duties on our cotton goods, for instance, something might be done. All the Browns in Canada sent to Washington will be of no avail unless we have something to give in return. * * * If you say 'we will cripple your trade and shut you out, but at the same time we will give you every opportunity of fairly entering into a reciprocity of trade with us; if not we will keep our markets to ourselves,' it would have a great effect."

What was the object, then, in imposing this high taxation? It was in order to keep the Americans out and to force them to make reciprocal trade relations with us. We objected to the admission of their manufactured goods into Canada. We said: We will put up a high tariff and keep their manufactured goods out, and when the proper time came, according to the hon. gentleman's own reasoning, that we had something to give them, what was that something? It either meant that or nothing. As late as 28th March, 1884, during a discussion of a resolution in favor of reciprocity offered by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), the hon. gentleman who now leads the Government said:

"Unless the United States will come at some time or other to a conclusion that they would be willing to enter upon a reciprocity treaty, not only for our natural productions but for our manufactures as well as our natural products, we will never have a treaty."

Thus, I think, I have shown clearly that the raison d'être of establishing the policy of protection which was established in this country was, that we would be in a better position to negotiate a reciprocity treaty with the United States. That kind of language was used not only in this House but also in the country. We are all aware that the Finance Minister stated once and I think twice in public in Prince Edward Island, on the eve of elections, that we would have reciprocity within two years. I venture to say that the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills), notwithstanding his statement last night, declared during his campaign at the recent election, for he dare not do otherwise, that he was favorable to reciprocity if reciprocity could be got. I venture to say he did so. This policy of protection has been put forward as an alternative, as something not desirable but something that we could not help adopting, and something that we were to use as a means to an end. Now the policy seems to be the reverse, and this protective policy is to be the means of preventing the attainment of the desired end, because the resolution of the Minister of Marine, plainly tells us that if reciprocity is to interfere in the slightest degree with any industry fostered in this country then he will not have it, thus virtually substituting a policy of protection for a policy of reciprocity. Why, Mr. Speaker, coming down to a later date, almost up to this very day, we find that it was the policy of this Government, and the policy therefore of this country, to endeavor to obtain a reciprocity treaty. Let hon. members look at the correspondence between Mr. Bayard and the Finance Minister; let them look at the protocols and at the offers made. Are we to suppose that that offer to negotiate on the basis of freer trade relations was not made sincerely? I should be very sorry to suppose anything of the kind, I do not believe anything of the kind. I believe it was the policy until a very late date, until almost within an hour of the time this resolution was put before the House by the Minister of Marine. I cannot say why this change of base has been made; but certainly after the statements I have made and the proofs I have given, it is not fitting that hon. gentlemen opposite should charge members on this side of the House with inconsistency. We have been consistent advocates of reciprocity from first to last; hon. gentlemen opposite have been advocates of reciprocity up to the time when, I venture to think, there is more chance of obtaining it than there has been at any time during the last twenty years. Are they abandoning it because there is a prospect of our getting it? Is that the reason? I do not know what the reason is. This extraordinary change of base requires explanation. I cannot understand it. Does it mean that the manufacturers are getting too much power? Certainly there must be some explanation to afford. I await with interest their explanation. It is scarcely necessary to ask, after I have shown that both sides have agreed as to the advisability of reciprocity, and it has been an axiom in the political faith of both parties, to show whether it is a desirable thing or not. I might ask the question: Is commerce desirable at all, is it advantageous? Surely if commerce is desirable, if foreign trade is desirable, it is certainly desirable that we should have the freest possible trade with our neighbors to the south. They are our nearest neighbors. They want what we have to sell, and we want what they have to sell. Our geographical position is such that it is convenient for us to trade with them; and as to the advantage there cannot be any question, we have had experience of it. What did the experience of 1854 to 1866 show? Why, trade went up by leaps and bounds during those twenty years, advancing from six million dollars to ten times that amount. We have heard a good deal during this debate of the loyalty cry. I have here an extract from a report of the Committee of the Executive Council approved by the Governor General of Canada, 19th February, 1865, upon the subject of the old Reciprocity Treaty. I believe the right hon. gentleman who now leads the House was a member of the Government at that time; I do not know whether he was leader but he was a member of it. After a reference to loyalty to their sovereign the committee concluded with these words:

"They cannot err in directing the attention of the enlightened statesmen of the Great Empire, of which it is the proudest boast of Canadians to form a part, to the connection between material prosperity and political contentment, feeling that they appealed to the highest motives of patriotic statesmen, the desire to perpetuate a Dominion founded on the affectionate allegiance of a prosperous and contented people."

My hon. friend from Queen's, N.B. (Mr. Baird) has spoken of this aspect of the question. It was quite pathetic to hear him. He said that there was no doubt at all that the adoption of the policy shadowed in the resolution of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) to give us free coasting trade along the whole coast of North America would be a wonderful advantage to his constituency and to himself. He spoke as if he had a personal interest in the matter, but he would rather sacrifice his property, he said, his own personal interests, than do anything at all that might savor of disloyalty. It was truly pathetic. It reminded one of what another distinguished patriot, Artemus Ward, said during the Southern rebellion. He said rather than the secession of the Southern States of the Union should have taken place he would have sacrificed his wife's relations. The hon. member for Queen's, N.B., would sacrifice his property rather than be suspected of disloyalty. I tell that hon. gentleman that there are some things in the world quite as important as loyalty. And if he would turn his attention as carefully to all the other virtues as he does to this, possibly it would not do him any harm. I will not remind him, possibly it would not be parliamentary to do so, of what the celebrated Dr. Johnson said of people who were inclined to talk so much about their own loyalty. But, Sir, we are told that we are disloyal because we are in favor of freer trade relations with the United States. I hold in my hand, Sir, an article in the Westminster Review on the subject of Imperial Federation and I think it will be generally conceded that this review—a British review—might be supposed to be quite as loyal in its utterances, particularly when it is advocating a cause such as that of Imperial Federation, as the hon. gentleman who takes an opposite view to myself on this question.

Mr. BORDEN.

"We are long past the day when the interests of classes can long prevail over those of nations, or diplomatic artifices or expedients over facts; and it is only when those who are in the right descend to artifices and expedients that the opponents of truth and nature have a chance. The Canadian people know what they are about and what they want, and will vote as benefits their own commercial interests and national and imperial instincts. Those who think otherwise should consider how and why the Reciprocity Treaty fell through, the vast and almost magical changes already resulting from the development of the Great North-West, how the transcontinental and inter-oceanic railway at once empowers, embodies, and stimulates the spirit of patriotism and empire, as well as the energies of commerce, and whether it is likely that citizens of the freest country in the world will much longer continue to raise a superabundant income by taxing themselves for the benefit of a few manufacturers?"

And again:

"Every passing year now strengthens the Canadian nationality beyond all ordinary computation of the effect of time, but if commercial union with the States should come and prosper, popular content with things as they are would strengthen with it."

And again:

"We hear a good deal now of Canadian railways which are political and ought to be commercial, and of the Canadian farmer, with profits mulcted by excessive freight on the one hand and a protective tariff on the other, who is kept out of the States' markets close by, whilst beckoned on through vast spaces to Dominion markets that hardly yet exist. We rely, however on general causes operating naturally, and we think irresistibly in a given uniform direction; and we say that Canadian nationality has grown with everything that has favored it, and in spite of everything that seemed to hinder it; that it has increased and not decreased with the feeling of loyalty to England, and of pride in belonging to a great empire, and that facts now favor an immense development of that feeling. Canada has nationality and wants empire. She can have a freer hand as a member of the British Empire than as one of the United States railways beset railways and traffic traffic. Unity consolidates nationality, and nationality leads to empire. Dominion markets must constantly extend and increase. Railways will create along their route and especially at either end, vast emporia of commerce. Esquimalt Harbor, land-docked easily protected, of sufficient depth, of four or five hundred acres area, and covered by Vancouver's Island, the only coal producing spot in that region, will be a place of concourse for the fleets of that hemisphere, and eyrie of imperial outlook and a stronghold for defence and communication."

How does he conclude the article?

"All tends to show that Canadian nationality and loyalty bid fair to be intensified and extended, and that if Canadian and States commercial unity comes, it will not mean severance from England."

That is the opinion of the reviewer in the Westminster Review. Now, Sir, what is the truest kind of loyalty? It is loyalty to the best interests of the country. The time has come in our system of government when the best understood wishes of the people are the wishes of the sovereign, and when there is no difference between the feelings and desires and wishes of the majority and the wishes of the sovereign under whose beneficent sway we are proud to live. That is the fact, and if we, by a large majority in this country, show to Her Majesty the Queen that we are in favor of freer trade relations with the United States she will not only consider it disloyal, but she will be proud to assist us in carrying out that which is going to be for our own material advantage. Now we are told that the adoption of this resolution and this policy will injure the manufacturers. I dissent entirely from that view. I do believe that so far as the Maritime Provinces are concerned that the manufacturers of Toronto, Hamilton, London and perhaps of Montreal will not have the markets in the Maritime Provinces. I quite admit that the Maritime Provinces would have the right to trade where they want to trade, where they have a right to trade, and where they would trade, were it not for the very high tariff, with the United States their nearest neighbor. Those centres to which I have referred would become centres of a larger area of country. They would have their share of the trade with the 60,000,000 people to the south of us, and they could send their goods down in competition with the manufacturers of the United States. Is it possible that after a lengthened period of protection to our manufacturers in this country that we are not able to compete with the manufacturers of the United States? I would be ashamed to acknowledge anything of that kind. I do not believe it. I believe that the adoption of the policy would be as advantageous to the manufacturers of this country as to any other of the people of the country. If not, then what does it mean? Is it not a contention that the people of this country are being taxed heavily in order to support those manufacturers and that we are annually paying heavy taxes into the revenue and putting the taxes into the pockets of the manufacturers? This is what it means. What do we find in the United States? We find that twenty-five years, aye, fifteen years ago, manufacturers were unknown in the southern States of the Union; we find to-day that manufacturers are going ahead rapidly and that the southern States of the Union are doing their own manufacturing, notwithstanding that their neighbors in the New England States had from fifty to one hundred years the start of them. Are we, who are manufacturing almost as long as the manufacturers of the New England, to fall behind in the race, when the southern States have within a few years developed their large manufactures? I think not. I am entirely of a different view from that. I have in my own county a few manufacturers and I have talked with them on the subject. We have manufacturers of axes and I am assured by those men that they do not fear reciprocity and free trade with the United States. They say give us the raw materials free and we will compete with anybody. We are not afraid of competition. So it is with all the manufacturers. They say: "give us a chance to send our manufactures into the State of Maine and we are not afraid of competition. We are more afraid of Canadian competition under a high tariff than we would be of competition under free trade with the United States." We are further told that this is not a practical question, and that it does not come within the range of practical politics. I think, Sir, that this article which I have read on the subject of Imperial Federation, and in which incidentally this question of commercial free trade with the United States is considered, shows that it is within the range of practical politics, shows that it is being considered upon the other side of the water, and I think it is only necessary to read a letter of Mr. Bayard to Sir Charles Tupper in order to see that the question is within the range of practical politics. We find now that there are two propositions on this subject in the United States, one before Congress and one before the Senate, directly pointing to the carrying out of something similar to that which is proposed in the resolution before the House. I refer to Congressman Hitt's resolution for commercial union, and I refer also to the resolution of Senator Frye for reciprocal commercial relations between the United States, Mexico, South America and Brazil. Why were we not included? Simply because we have not at present the power of negotiating our own treaties. It is clear from these propositions, which are now before both branches of the United States Legislature, that the Americans are turning their attention to greater freedom of trade; and in view of that disposition on the part of the United States to extend their trade relations with the whole of North America, I think it is not correct to say that this subject is not within the range of practical politics.

Mr. SPROULE. Mr. Speaker, in occupying the time of the House at this late stage of the debate, the only excuse that I can offer is the importance of the subject under consideration. The hon. member who introduced the resolution told this House, and through this House the country, that this was one of the most important subjects that ever engaged the attention of the Canadian Parliament since Confederation. I think hon. gentlemen on both sides of this House will agree with him in that statement, for from whatever standpoint we consider the issue involved, we must acknowledge that it is a most important question. If we look at it from a commercial standpoint, it means a complete revolution in the trade of over 4,000,000 people.

If we examine it from a social standpoint, remembering that in social life as in everything else the greater invariably controls the less, it means a change in our social status. It means a change in every part of our country, so that we must ultimately grow more and more like the nation with whom we associate. If we examine it from the manufacturers' standpoint, I think there are few but would admit that it means virtually the extinction of the manufacturing industries of our country. If we examine it from a political standpoint, it means the annihilation of our system which we believe to be modelled on the best system in the world, or the grafting upon it whatever is new and peculiar in the political system of the great country lying to the south of us. If we examine it from a national standpoint, whether as an integral part of the British Empire or as an important nation growing up on the North American continent, it is equally important, because I believe it means our national extinction. If we examine it from the standpoint of the mother country, that power which has been our protection and shield in our embryonic life to the present, whose flag has shielded us through the helpless years of infancy and has continued to wave over us in our growth to maturity, whose influence and power have secured for us the rights of the high seas, and whose overshadowing influence has always afforded us protection in every part of the world, it means the detraction of this important and integral part of the British Empire from the mother country. We must admit that it is a great issue. The hon. gentleman who introduced this resolution told us that it was only owing to the condition of the country at the present time that he ventured to spring upon the Canadian Parliament such an important issue, and he went on to give us that doleful and lamentable picture which we have had presented to us year after year since 1878, when hon. gentlemen opposite were so signally defeated at the polls. He painted that picture in all its horrors and melancholy. One might almost suppose, if the picture was sketched by an artist, that after he had given it the last touch of the brush, he would sit down in solitude and melancholy and feel unhappy for the rest of his life. He gave us a picture of the condition of our country from many standpoints. It was a ruined and impoverished country. He told us our railways had cost millions of dollars, and had never paid for the money invested in them. He forgot to tell us of our highways, our concessions, our streets, for which we have paid large sums of money, but which do not pay any interest on the investment; but they are there to enable us to carry on our trade and intercourse with each other. He forgot to tell us of the great highways of nature, such as the St. Lawrence, which have been deepened in their channels, or the canals which have been dug in the earth, and which are paying no interest on the money expended. But will he tell us that any civilised country in the world could do without these conveniences of life? They do not give us any returns in dividends, but they enable us conveniently to carry on all the operations of trade and commerce like other civilised countries. He told you that the farmers, a great and important industrial class of the country, were growing poorer and poorer every year, that they are unable by their labors to supply themselves and their families with the necessities and comforts of life. He represented their farms as shrinking in value year after year, and debts growing up on their farms in the shape of mortgages which represented a large percentage of their actual value, and their wealth as decreasing owing to a reduction in their profits from the products of their farms. He declared that we were rapidly rolling up a national debt so burdensome to the people of Canada that they were unable to bear it. With regard to that, I have a return from which I find that the burden imposed upon the people in consequence of that national debt is comparatively very light. The only burden they can feel is the interest they pay on it; and how much a head does it amount to to-day? When Mr. Mackenzie left power it amounted to $1.58 a head, and if there was any truth in the assertion that the extravagance of this Government had run up the debt so rapidly that the people could not endure it, you would naturally expect the interest to be much greater, but it is only $1.59 to-day. Did he tell the people that the magnificent railway system we possess, nearly 3,000 miles in length, in addition to the other railway lines subsidised all over the country, is no compensation for this one cent ahead? Did he tell them that the development which has gone on in this country from 1878 to the recent time is of no importance, and that they are paying too dearly for it at the rate of one cent a head more than they had in 1878? If the hon. gentleman were honest, he would give credit to the party which has successfully navigated the ship of State since 1878, for the greatest progress which any country has accomplished in the same time, and this, with the very least burden imposed on the people. But instead of this, the hon. gentleman asserts that everything in Canada has been falling into decay, that there has been a shrinkage in values in every line, that poverty is depicted on every countenance, and concluded by saying that there is no country in the world to-day in which the producing people receive less for what they sell and pay more for what they have to buy. He made this sweeping statement, and when we consider his position as a public man, we might be disposed to attribute to it some force, but what can be thought of that hon. gentleman's standing, what can be thought of his intelligence and of his integrity, when, on looking at the different markets of the world, we find that we are receiving for what we produce as high prices as the great people to the south of us receive for similar productions, and that we pay as little for what we buy as almost any people in the world. When we look over this country and find, in spite of the hon. gentleman's doleful picture, that the sun shines as brightly here as ever, that the day is as long, that the people have their three meals a day, that they are well clothed, healthy, happy and prosperous, when we look at them in their homes and at their gatherings and see them well dressed and buoyant in spirits, what opinion must we form of the patriotism or the intelligence of the hon. gentleman who draws these dismal pictures? We have heard from time to time, during the last ten years, the same oft-repeated story which has become stale and unpalatable, but which has been dished up to us this last few weeks in an entirely new form and dress; we have seen the picture drawn so often that we can almost imagine the people of the country addressing the hon. gentlemen opposite in the celebrated language which the poet Edgar Allen Poe addressed to his raven. These hon. gentlemen have often on previous occasions challenged us to appeal to the country. Speaking the other night, an hon. gentleman said: I challenge the Government to appeal to this country on this issue, and I can assure them that if they should accept the challenge they would not come back with the corporal's guard. This is not the first time we have heard of this corporal's guard. We heard of it in 1879, when the National Policy was adopted, and we heard of it again when the contract was given to the Canadian Pacific Railway; yet on every occasion that we have appealed to the people we have come back with a good many corporals guard. We may well imagine the people addressing the hon. gentleman opposite as I have said in the celebrated lines:

Prophet! said I, thing of evil. Prophet still, though bird or devil, Whether tempter sent, or whether, tempest-tossed the here ashore—
Be olate yet all undaunted, on this desert land enchanted,
On this home by horror haunted, tell me truly I implore,
Is there—is there balm in Gilead, tell me—tell me, I implore.
Said the Raven: never more.

Mr. SPROULE.

Hon. gentlemen opposite said to the people of the country for ten years, "never more," but they have now come back with a remedy, and they say there is balm in Gilead. There is a remedy, and that remedy is unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union. Let us see what that will lead to. We have these doleful pictures given to us by hon. gentlemen opposite, notwithstanding the fact that when we entered Confederation we had only 2,000 miles of railway, while to-day we have 10,700 miles. Our canals have been extended, widened and deepened in every part of the country. The position of our people is a prosperous one, looked at from every standpoint. Whether looked at from the standpoint of the savings banks deposits, the deposits in the banks, the operation of loan companies, the number of farm mortgages, the comfort of the people in their homes—from whatever standpoint we look at it, you must conclude unmistakably that the condition of our people is prosperous. An hon. gentleman opposite said that the number of mortgages held by the loan society was no criterion, because a number of people in private life are taking mortgages on farms. I would ask, where the people get the money to lend, if not from the operations they have carried on during the time when the opposition said the country was going down and men were receiving no return for their labor? We find farmers to-day lending money to their brother farmers on mortgages; and we must conclude that if their agricultural operations had not been successful, they would not have been in a position to lend money. Take the deposits in the post-office savings banks, which I consider is one of the most correct barometers for ascertaining the condition of the working people. There is no reasonable man who will not come to the conclusion that the people are not in a very bad condition to-day. I have a return before me, by which I find that, in 1873, when Mr. Mackenzie came in power, the deposits in the post office savings bank amounted to $3,000,000; in 1875 the amount was $3,000,000; in 1876 $2,000,000; in 1877, $2,000,000; in 1878, $2,000,000; but in 1879, the first year under the present Administration, the deposits reached $3,105,000; in 1880, the amount deposited was $3,945,000; in 1881, $6,000,000; in 1882, $9,000,000; in 1883, $11,000,000; in 1884, $13,000,000 and last year no less a sum than $19,880,000. Now this represents the deposits from 109,383 peoples, showing that they covered a large class, and according to the post office regulations, the deposits must have come from the poorer classes because you can only deposit a small sum at a time. To-night we have a remedy proposed for this condition of the country by hon. gentlemen opposite. We have a remedy proposed for the condition of this down-trodden people. The hon. the leader of the Opposition gave us several remedies; but to finish up, he was pleased to propose what he called the climax, "unrestricted reciprocity." He said we want a distribution of the taxes equitably; we want to curtail expenditure on public works, we want a reduction on expenditure in building railways, we want a reconstruction of the civil service, and we want a revision of the constitution. I may say of the hon. gentleman that if the constitution needs revision, and if his motion should pass, the unfortunate provisional revision would not be in the direction mapped out by the provincial delegates last year or in the direction mapped out by the Hon. Mr. Mowat in Ontario, but it would be a reconstruction of the state so as to make it suit an alliance or connection with the United States, so as to cause the annexation of our country, so as to sink our national individuality, and to make us part and parcel of the United States, with such provisions as to make us work in harmony with their system of political government. He said, we are going to do away with railway monopoly, and we are going to do that by asking another country to open her arms to us and receive us—a country which has the Vanderbilt railway monopoly, and the Jay Gould railway monopoly, of which we have all heard, and the celebrated Mr. Wiman, himself, the apostle of free trade and unrestricted reciprocity, is one of the greatest monopolists of telegraph lines on this continent to-day. This is the direction in which this resolution leads. He says it is to do away with the gigantic railway monopolies, and for that he says the true remedy is to have free trade with the United States, and that in that way the sting would be taken away from these tariff combines. It is for us to consider to-night how far that would be a panacea for our ills. I purpose to examine this question for a short time, because I think that hon. gentlemen are very unfair in their presentation of it. These hon. gentlemen have placed their policy before the country and the House. They have submitted that panacea, and they are to-day in the judgment of this House, and will be in the future in the judgment of the people of this country, because we are told that this is only a commencement, that they will fight it out at the polls, and will continue the agitation, and I tell them that, when an appeal is made to the country, they will come back with some experience, and with some such consolation and comfort as the old lady obtained from the parrot for which she paid a high price. There is a story of an old lady who lived alone and had no children and had very few comforts as far as society was concerned. She induced a little girl to come to her from the orphan's home and to live with her, and she promised her a great deal, but the discrepancy between age and youth was so great that the child did not find much comfort there, and, as an inducement, the old lady used to tell her: "Stay until I die, and I will give you all my money, and then you can buy what you want, you can be rich and pay for everything you desire, and be a great woman." She did not comfort her much in this way, and a gentleman came round selling parrots that he said were great talkers, and, though they were held at a high price, the old lady bought one of these parrots, thinking it would be a great comfort to her, and would be some company for the child. After she had bought it, she found that, like a good many parrots for which high prices had been paid, it did not talk at all; but the little girl was so lonesome when the old lady would go away that she used to say to herself: "I wish the old lady would die, it would be a good thing, and then I would get the money." She repeated this so often that the parrot got hold of it, and he would say: "I wish the old lady would die." So the old lady had not much comfort from the parrot. She was lonesome, and she appealed to her spiritual adviser, and told him: "The parrot that I have is the curse of my life; it only says two or three words, but it never says anything but bad words, and there is no comfort in that." He suggested a remedy: He said, "I have a parrot which has been with me for a long time; it does not talk very much, but, as I am a preacher, what it says are good words, and not bad words. You take this parrot and put it with your parrot, and it will teach it to talk in such a way that it will say nothing but good words." So she got the preacher's parrot. In due time the preacher came to visit her, and he said: "Well, sister, how is the parrot getting along?" "Oh," said she, "it is worse and worse. These parrots are the curse of my life. I do not know what to do with those parrots. When I come in, feeling so lonesome that I could sink into the ground, the first thing I hear is, 'I wish the old lady would die!' and then your parrot will draw a long face and say, 'Lord, answer prayer!'" I think hon. gentlemen will have about as much comfort out of the situation when they come back from the country as the old lady had from her parrot. But we may be asked, what does this unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union mean? We have had the versions of several hon. gentlemen. They have not been very definite. They have not given a very clear definition of what it is, but, if we can glean from those hon. gentlemen who have been advocating the subject so strongly what they mean by it, we will be able to find out what is meant by unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union. You will understand that I hold these to be synonymous terms, that they are convertible the one into the other, because in reality they mean the same thing. But it happens that these hon. gentlemen, finding of late that the words "commercial union" turned out to be not very palatable, have dressed them up and adopted a new name and presented the same idea in a different shape. If we ask what does it mean and take the gentlemen who have been discussing the question not only in Canada but in the United States, we may fairly be entitled to accept their views as to what it means. The Hon. Robert Hitt, who has introduced a Bill in the United States Congress, pointing in the direction at which these hon. gentlemen aim, says, speaking of the people of Canada:

"They would probably accept commercial union, with unrestricted trade, common fishing rights, coasting trade privileges, and an equalised tariff would abolish all these custom houses."

What does this include? Exactly what is included in the first motion made by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and the addition tacked on to it by the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies). What does Mr. Goldwin Smith say about this? He is another gentleman who has been enlightening the country on this subject, and he says:—

"Commercial union would, of course, involve assimilation of tariffs, which, however, since the raising of Canadian import duties, has brought the tariff more nearly to a level, would present no insurmountable difficulty."

The Hon. Mr. Longley, Attorney General of Nova Scotia, writes as follows:

"I have just had time to express a strong sense of the value and importance of a commercial union and to hie to the spirit in which the United States—from whom such a proposition must emanate—should approach it. The passing of Mr. Butterworth's proposed measure by the American Congress, will, in my judgment, be an enormous step in the accomplishment of this great object."

"Canadian Union"—that is what one of our Canadian statesmen calls it, and that is what he understands by this motion before the House. Then take Mr. Wharton-Barker, and he speaks of it as Commercial Union with Canada. He says:

"A commercial union with Canada, such as is here proposed as preferable to reciprocity, would be established on the footing of a common tariff for both countries, and the distribution of the receipts from customs on the basis of population, or on some other basis that might be thought more equitable. As the present Canadian tariff contains many duties 'for revenue only,' its assimilation to our own would be attended by some loss of revenue to Canada; and it would not be unfair to guarantee her a sum equal to her present receipts for a number of years."

Now, he speaks of it and he makes no difference between unrestricted reciprocity and commercial union. He is an American. We go further, and we take Vallancy E. Fuller, one of our own Canadians, who has been over Ontario in reference to this question. We find him addressing a circular to the Farmers' Institutes of Ontario, asking them to take up this question and pass resolutions in favor of it. The following is the heading of his circular:

THE CANADIAN FARMERS' DUTY,

By VALANCY E. FULLER,

President Central Farmers' Institute of Ontario.

Now, the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) said the other night that 48 Farmers' Institutes has passed resolutions on the lines of the resolution that was introduced here. Then, if that be so, who will say that it does not mean commercial union? Why, the Farmers' Institutes recognise it, Mr. Fuller looked upon it, Goldwin Smith, and Mr. Shaw, of Hamilton, who is conducting a campaign in the west—all these look upon it as practically commercial union. Then, are we not entitled to consider it in the same light? I think we are. But Mr. Wiman himself speaks of it in the same light, and he called it commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity. So we have it from different public men who have given utterance to sentiments on this question, that they mean the same thing and the agitation has been kept up since in our country on these lines. Take the utterances of every public man on this question, and you can come to no other conclusion than that they understand commercial union and unrestricted reciprocity to mean the same thing, and it is the same thing. Then I would like to ask one question here. The hon. member for North Norfolk said that 48 Farmers' Institutes decided in favor of this scheme. Why did they decide in favor of it? Because we had Mr. Shaw, of Hamilton, we had Vallancy E. Fuller, from Hamilton, we had the agent of these men going through the country calling the Farmers' Institutes together, and addressing them upon the subject, almost entirely on the one side, there was no discussion on the other side at all, and it was an easy matter, when these men were brought together, to get an opinion from these Institutes on the one side, when there was no discussion on the other side. It was an easy matter to get resolutions pointing in the direction which the hon. member for North Norfolk has spoken of. Now, let me ask what is unrestricted reciprocity, provided we get it? I hold that from our position as Canadians it is unreasonable to expect that we could get a fair commercial treaty with the United States to-day. Commercial Union, I believe the people of Canada do not want, but a fair commercial treaty, I believe they will be willing to make, and are prepared to accept freer trade relations with the United States any time that they can get them. But can we get them? We find that during the last 22 years every effort that has been made by Canada to extend these trade relations with the United States, has been rejected almost contemptuously. In 1869 it was rejected, and in 1874, when George Brown went to Washington, it was rejected. Our standing offer which has been on the Statute-book since 1879, has been disregarded and ignored, and every offer that has been made to induce the United States to grant an extension of these trade relations on lines which we believe would be in the interest of the people of Canada, has been systematically ignored. Now, would we be more likely to obtain it to-day? Let us see the answer which was made to the British plenipotentiaries by the representatives of the United States, and I think that is the very best argument we can produce to show that we are unlikely to get it at the present time. Here is what the United States Commissioners say:

"While continuing their proposal heretofore submitted—on the 30th ultimo—and fully sharing the desire of Her Britannic Majesty's plenipotentiaries to remove all causes of difference in connection with the fisheries; the American plenipotentiaries are constrained, after careful consideration, to decline to ask from the president authority requisite to consider the proposal conveyed to them on the 3rd inst. as a means to the desired end, because the greater freedom of commercial intercourse so proposed would necessitate an adjustment of the present tariff of the United States by Congressional action; which adjustment the American plenipotentiaries consider to be manifestly impracticable of accomplishment, through the medium of a treaty under the circumstances now existing"

Now, then, it appears that this matter is to them one of perfect indifference. This is the conclusion that we must come to from reading their answer to Sir Charles Tupper's letter, and this is the conclusion they come to after careful consideration of the question, that if they proposed such a thing from their standpoint, it would be impracticable for the simple reason that it would require Congressional action, which they are inclined to think they could not get. Now, how far would England be likely to tolerate this, provided we got it? I understand there is a provision made between England and other countries, that when commercial relations with other countries are entered into she promises to give them the same advantages, the freest trade relations that they concede to the British Empire or her colonies. Now, if this is the case, and I believe it is, how far would England tolerate a discrimination in tariff in favor of the United States, and against her, and against all other countries with which she was on amicable relations, and with which she had trade relations. Would it not be a distinct violation of her commercial treaties with other countries? Because if we do not let these countries trade with us upon the same terms that we let the United States trade with us, we do not give them the advantages of the most favored trade relations. Therefore, I say it would be a violation of her treaties, and if there were no other reasons, that alone would prevent her from entertaining the subject for a single moment. But what objections are there to the commercial relations provided we had them? Well, in the first place, it would destroy the revenue of our country. Now, I think that both parties are agreed that if we abolished the duty now paid by goods that we receive from the United States, the change would at one slap take away from us $7,300,000, and if we can believe the sentiments uttered by the hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House, when they tell us that if we had unrestricted reciprocity, our trade with the United States would increase nearly one hundred fold, I say it means nearly twice the amount. I believe that it means, at least, a falling off in our revenue of over $15,000,000. Now, when you reduce the revenue of a country by $15,000,000, you bring about a very serious condition of things in that country. We are yet a new country, and we must spend increasing amounts of money almost every years, because our country being new, it needs to be developed. We want railways, we want canals, we want harbors, we want public buildings, we want various things to enable our people to carry on their operations as successfully as other countries which are in the enjoyment of advanced civilised life, therefore we need an increasing amount of expenditure each year. But the United States are an old country, and their great difficulty is to know how to decrease the revenue at the present time. Then I say that if we were to rest the tariff on the principle suggested by the hon. gentleman, to say that we could throw our customs revenue into one pool, whereas we are 5,000,000 of people, and the United States are 60,000,000 we could draw out only one dollar for every twelve they drew out. They want to reduce their revenue, but we want to increase ours. Now, in order to reduce their revenue they must reduce their tariff, and we do not believe that it is the interests of the people of our country to reduce our tariff now. Therefore, provided we had this, what would be the result? We would be face to face with the very condition of things that we find in the United States to-day. We would be almost in a state of insolvency. We would be unable to raise enough money to carry on the operations in our extensive country. The Provinces are spending money as part of the Dominion of Canada to-day, and when they run short of money they can come back and say: We want an additional subsidy. We are obliged to do it because they are a part and parcel of our country. But could we go to the United States after we had entered into an arrangement for a certain time, but found in a few years that we were short of revenue, and ask them to readjust this arrangement? They would tell us, no, that it was entered into for a definite length of time, that they could not adjust it to suit our purposes, that we must take the consequence, that it suited our public men at the time, and that we must accept the result. What would be our condition then? Either we would have to get rid of the compact or would have to devise some other means of relief in the direction of raising money. Suppose we went out of the compact. Suppose we stepped out again and assumed our national independence as it exists to-day, it would bring about a financial crises in our country that would shake it from the centre to the circumference, that would be felt in every line of trade for ten years to come, and it would leave us in the condition we occupied in 1867 after the abrogation of reciprocity, and we would have to build up our country again. Suppose we accepted the other alternative, and imposed direct taxation. We have heard a great deal from hon. gentlemen opposite about the burdens imposed upon the country and as to who pays the taxes, the poor men or rich men. They would require very little argument, provided that state of things was brought about that I have indicated, to satisfy poor people as to who paid the taxes. If we levied direct taxation, instead of the taxes being paid by the wealthy, in part by foreigners and only in a fractional degree by poor people, the poor people would have to bear the burdens of the country as they would find to their cost, and they would be called upon to pay the bulk of the taxation required to carry on the affairs of this great country. I say it would be most impracticable, most unreasonable to ask the people to enter into such a contract and into such relations, because we would be unable at any time to carry out the arrangement. We say further that you would have no chance to protect the interests of our people. Why? Because the tariff of the United States represents the interests of 60,000,000 of people, and they would necessarily make it suit their wants, even though it might crush our industries. Then it is suggested we might change our tariff. What right would we have to do so? It is proposed that those tariffs would be framed and agreed upon by some kind of a committee which would be composed of twelve representatives of the United States to everyone from Canada. What influence would one representative have among twelve? What chance would he have to protect the interests of this country? What could he do in regard to altering the tariff for our protection and to suit our requirements and wants, and to aid in the development of this country that is only partially developed, especially when as regards the United States the country does not need development, for it is developed to-day, but it needs reduced taxation so that less money need be raised. We would have little or no share of the work. There is another feature which must not be lost sight of. Canadian history from the earliest time to the present shows that the Reform party has sought to get Canada from under the control of the mother country. It has always been said that Downing Street has too much part in controlling this country, and even at the present time hon. gentlemen opposite are fighting for the right to negotiate our own commercial treaties. If Canada entered into a commercial treaty as is proposed, what would she be doing? She would be giving away the right, not to the mother country that is interested in our welfare and progress, but to a country whose interests are foreign to ours, whose interests are not on the same lines, but distinctly opposing lines, and that power which was taken from Downing Street and transferred to Canada would be taken away and given to the Congress of the United States. Would that be desirable as regards Canada's interests and would she be likely to prosper under it? This would be in harmony with the line marked out for constitutional government and our right to do our own business by the Reform Party from 1867 to the present time. But we may ask, provided the arrangements were carried out successfully, what interests would it affect? I have told this House that I believe it would be disastrous to our country, that it would give away our right to control our own affairs to foreigners, that it would prevent our being able either to raise or reduce the tariff, and it would injure the country and its various interests. I will go further. What would be those interests injured? I believe it would injure every class. It would injure the commercial class, because it would transfer our wholesale houses at Toronto, Montreal, Quebec, Hamilton and London to New York, Boston, Chicago, Philadelphia, Minneapolis and St. Paul. Those would be the commercial centres built up at the expense of Toronto and our own cities. Then we would have American commercial drummers passing over this country pressing upon the retail trade the superiority of their goods, and, no doubt, they would sell large quantities as they did before 1879. We find that our commerce was virtually taken away from us. Again, it would prove disastrous to our railways, because, as the mover of the resolution stated, our lines of trade would be directed into natural channels, and they would not be run east and west but north and south. In other words, our trade would pass right across the border. The hon. gentleman has complained that the railways were furnishing no revenue for the money invested in them. I would like to ask him if the present policy is not much more favorable to the railway companies than a policy would be which would carry the trade across the lines and not among them. It would prove one of the most destructive elements in regard to our Canadian railway system ever introduced into the Canadian Parliament. It would destroy our commercial life. I believe it would also destroy our shipping interest. It would certainly entirely destroy our manufacturers. But our manufacturers could compete against the United States with its advanced intelligence, with its attainments in all manufacturing departments, with the vast capital, with the improved machinery and the cheapness with which they can turn out products, that our manufactures, which are comparatively in an embryonic state, could withstand such competition, is something that no reasonable or rational man would believe. I am satisfied that if this policy were carried into effect it would prove most disastrous to the manufactures of our country, and would either cause the transfer of our capital and our labor across the lines or it would kill them out in a short time. Our manufactures and trade would pass from us, and the result would be that our money would follow, and if our money followed that must mean the impairment of the country. There is another phase of the question which leads me to believe that the policy proposed would be a very disastrous one to Canada. In whatever line you take it if you allow the people to assemble together and associate together in trade relations the money will follow, on the principle that the greater attracts the less, and sixty millions must absorb five millions. Our social institutions would be imbued with their manners and customs, and the result would be a complete absorption of or extinction of our national existence, and we would imperceptibly fall right into what many people on the other side desire, and I am sorry to say a great many desire here, annexation, and our country would be virtually destroyed. Let me go further, and ask what other interests would be injured by it? Perhaps the most important at the present time that would be injured by commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity would be the agricultural interests of this country. The tone of all the arguments which have been addressed from the Opposition side, I think, without exception, was that this would be a great panacea for the farmers of our country, and that it would be a great advantage to the farmers of the country. I would like to ask them why? I would like to ask them how is it that it happens to be so? If the American people were all manufacturers and not farmers, then I could understand that it would be a great value to the farmers of our country to get their market, but the American people have a variety of climates stretching from north to south, and a varied country from east to west, with all kinds of soil and with all kinds of climate so as to enable them to raise every line in which our farmers are interested or engaged in here, and indeed to raise very many that we do not raise at all. I see in their vast wheat growing areas of the Western States, with their southern climate, their northern climate and with the climate found in the middle of the country, that they raise very largely and very extensively every line of produce raised by the farmers of our country here. If we look at their Trade and Navigation Returns we can see what shape in this principle would affect the farmers of our country. I see that the policy would expose them to competition in the various industries in which they are now engaged. The United States to-day are engaged in the same line of produce and they are exporting the same articles that our farmers export. The American farmers raises somewhere about $2,500,000,000 in round numbers worth of agricultural products. He consumes out of that a portion at home and he exports $550,000,000 in round numbers. In that respect he becomes a competitor with our farmers. Our position is about this: We raise about $400,000,000 worth of agricultural products. There is about $330,000,000 worth consumed in the country, and we must find markets for about $42,000,000 worth in foreign countries. The American has to find a market for $550,000,000 worth, and is it reasonable to say that the United States, if we had commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity, would not send a large share of that stuff over here into Canada? In some parts of the country they have an early season and, consequently, their grain comes in earlier. Close to our borders they raise some lines cheaper than we do in Canada, and everyone of those lines would come into direct competition with the farmers of our country. The hon. gentleman for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), in speaking on this question the other night said that we would open up a market of 60,000,000 people to the people of Canada. But he might as well have told us that we were not only opening up a market for 60,000,000 but we were entering into trade relations with a people and giving them the privilege of throwing into our country $550,000,000 worth of agricultural products in the year if they can find a market for it here. To tell me or to tell any farmer in this country that that will not displace the market for a very large amount of agricultural products is something I do not think any farmer will believe. Before we had our protective tariff we found the oats coming in at Georgian Bay from the Western States and being sold there. In one day the price of oats was reduced 20 cents a bushel on account of western oats coming into the market from the States. We found that the lumbermen were bringing all their pork from Chicago because they got it cheaper; it was this corn fed pork raised cheaply and our farmers were unable to sell them pork. We found that corn was coming in and taking the place of grain and oats for the purpose of feeding cattle and horses. Every one of those lines came in direct competition with the farmers of this country. I hold that whatever trade relations we have with the United States, it would not be in the interest of the Canadian farmers to take off the duty which we have on those commodities I have referred to. So sure as it is taken off, so sure will we find the same condition of things cropping up very soon as we had before. I pointed out that while the American farmer has to find a market for that $550,000,000 worth of products he would throw a large share of it into our country and when the people of the United States supplied our own people we would have to find a market four thousand miles away, and the cost of transportation over that four thousand miles would come out of the pockets of the Canadian farmers. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) in speaking on this question endeavored to build up an argument that seemed to me to have at least the advantage of originality. That hon. gentleman has had an experience in educating the people of this country as to his views upon tariffs. In 1876, I understand he was a protectionist, in 1878, he was a free trader and since that he has been a revenue tariff man or a free trader I do not know which. During the years of 1878 and 1879 when the present protective tariff was put on, and for the last ten years he has endeavored to educate the people of this country in the belief that the consumer always pays the duty. He has advanced various kinds of arguments for that purpose, and he turns around now and tries to prove to the Canadian farmer that not the consumer but the producer pays the duty. Because it happens to suit his purpose he turns around and preaches all over the country that the Canadian farmer loses an amount equal to the duty on all our stuff which goes to that country, and, therefore, that our farmers are at a disadvantage, and that it is a hardship to them because they pay 15 cents on every barrel that goes to that country. He says the amount sent from our country to the States is so small that it cannot affect the market of that country, and he was telling the poor people of this country that by virtue of the National Policy they were obliged to pay more for every line they used because they had to pay the tariff. He forgot that he was building up an argument against his own logic. He says in one case that the producer pays the duty, but on the other side, he says that the poor man in this country pays the duty also on what he consumes. Is there any force in his argument? I contend there is not. The hon. gentleman from North Victoria (Mr. Barron) endeavored to give as his argument that the Canadian farmer was a very large exporter and whereas he raised the goods in this country and he was obliged to find a market for them he was obliged to pay the duty, and that therefore it was in the interest of the farmers that we should have this commercial union. He went on to show that we exported from Canada last year 18,225 horses and that those horses were valued at $2,214,338. He was correct in this, so far as the Trade and Navigation Returns go, but when I asked that gentleman a fair question he very indignantly refused either to answer it or to give a reply at all. The taunt came back of ignorance. Although he intended as he said in the outset to debate this question upon high toned principles the retort came back of ignorance. Last year we exported as I said before to the United States 18,225 horses; of which the value was $2,214,338. But did the farmer, he asks, get that amount of money? No, he said the farmer had to pay $442,000 in duties. I asked him how he got at the amount of the duty which he told the Canadian farmer he had to pay; was it by taking the value of these horses as given by the Trade and Navigation Returns, and multiplying that by twenty, because the duty is 20 per cent? He did not deign to give me a reply. It did not serve his purpose to enlighten the farmers of this country on this question. Now, I will show the House and the country wherein his argument was unfair and misleading. I have here the trade returns of the United States, and I find that the Americans imported last year 38,000 horses, whereas we exported 18,000. They valued those 38,000 horses at $2,450,000, while according to the hon. gentleman's estimate ours were valued at $2,214,000, that is over twice the number of horses are valued at about the same amount. Therefore the value on which the duty should be computed should be less than half of what the hon. gentleman stated. The United States returns show that instead of $442,000 being paid upon them there was just $245,075 paid. This shows how unfair a presentation of the case to the Canadian farmer the hon. gentleman gave. It would lead him to believe that this $442,000 was taken out of his pocket, when in reality, if there was any correctness in the argument advanced for the last nine years by the hon. member for North Norfolk and his friends, it was not the seller of the horses who paid the duty, but the party who got them in the United States. Upon what value was that duty imposed? We only value the horses when they are going over the lines, so as to ascertain the amount of our exports. The Americans who collect the duty put their own value on them. A large number of horses are taken into the United States for the improvement of their stock, and there is no duty on them. But instead of valuing those horses at $2,214,000, he should value them at a little over $1,000,000. Did the Canadian farmer get that money? the hon. member asks: and he answers, No, the duty was taken off the $2,214,000, and he got the balance. Now, one of two things the hon. gentleman must admit, either his deliberate intention to mislead the farmers of Canada or his ignorance. If he intended to mislead the Canadian farmer, he ought to be ashamed of himself. If he was honest in his calculation, then I say he ought to be ashamed of it. That is his dilemma, and he can take whichever horn he chooses. It is not much to the credit of the hon. gentleman, who was so very imperative in forcing his views on the people of this country. I say that this measure would injure the Canadian farmers very much. I need not discuss its effect on the cattle, sheep or other products of the country which we export, because I find that he made the same mistake with regard to them that he did with regard to horses. Therefore, that argument was most fallacious and unfair, and should not have been used. The Canadian farmer received the market value of his horses in this country, where they were bought by buyers. Hon. members will remember that a short time ago England sent men to this country to buy horses. They only picked up a few, because they said the market price was so high here that it would not pay to buy them. But those they did buy they bought at the Canadian price, and when they took them to the United States, they got them in as best they could, whether at a reduced value or free of duty, it made no difference to the Canadian farmer. If the Americans have to pay more for the horses which are taken into the United States from Canada, because of the duty, it makes no difference to the Canadian farmer. If the American comes into Canada and buys an article he pays the market price here. In the same way, if we go to the United States to buy anything we have to buy at their price, and when we come to the border line we must pay the duty, which may enhance the value of that article here. This measure would also bring the Canadian farmer into direct competition with the American farmer in his oats, his peas, his barley, his wheat, his Indian corn, his hay, his roots, and almost everything else he raises. It would do more than this; it would bring him into direct competition with the American farmer in one of the most important lines in the country, namely, the dairy interest. According to the Trade and Navigation Returns last year we exported to England no less than 73,604,000 lbs. of cheese, which represented a value of $7,108,000. How would commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity affect the Canadian farmer in that line? I will show you how. I have here a clipping from a newspaper in reference to an enquiry made on this subject in London:—

“LONDON, March 20.—It was announced in the House of Commons to-night that the Colonial Office is about to enquire of Canada whether the alleged adulteration of imported American cheese also relates to the Canadian product, especially as regard the practice of using animal fat in making cheese.”

The adulteration of American cheese has so lowered its price in the market that it would be unfortunate if our cheese were sent to England through the same channel and should be known as American cheese; and if we have unrestricted reciprocity, that must be the result. While we exported that large quantity last year, we find that the American cheese producer, with his far-sightedness shipped his cheese to Brockville, Gananoque, Kingston and Montreal in order to have it sent to the English market as Canadian cheese. That is being done every day at the present time. Over 5,000,000 lbs. of this cheese was brought into Canada during the last year, and shipped to Europe from here, so as to create the impression in England that it was Canadian cheese. This cheese is adulterated with lard, cotton seed oil and various ingredients that depreciate its value. I say it will be incumbent on our Government to do, as they have shown they are always anxious to do, whenever the interests of any great class of the people is concerned, to devise some means, by which the English purchaser may discriminate between Canadian and American cheese. I would suggest that the Canadian Government should label every box of cheese that comes from the United States as United States cheese, and our own as Canadian cheese, so that there would be no possibility of mistake. Had we unrestricted reciprocity, the depreciation in the value of American cheese would be a great drawback, as it would destroy the standing of Canadian cheese in the home market. The same principle would apply to American butter, which would be shipped to foreign countries as Canadian butter, and thus destroy the reputation of our article in the market. People do not know often how to discriminate between the oleomargarine, butterine and other various compounds and our own butter, and often put the two on the same level. Seeing the importance of this subject, I may refer to a discussion that we had only two years ago in this House on the question of oleomargarine, and I may be pardoned if I read a short statement made by Mr. Reall at a meeting of the National Dairy and Agricultural Convention held in New York on the 16th February, 1886, relative to this butter question;

“For ten years the manufacture of artificial butter has been growing until dairymen everywhere find their vocations almost ruined. The 18,000,000 milch cows in the country have depreciated $10 per head, and the land on which they are kept, something over 75,000,000 acres, worth nominally $50 an acre, has declined 25 per cent. These reductions represent a loss of $1,000,000,000. This is not brought about through honest and fair competition, but in consequence of the most outrageous and glaring fraud that can be practiced, for the substitute is not sold to the consumer for what it is, but as butter. The people of New York city alone are paying not less than $10,000,000 for the stuff they suppose to be butter, and which brings to the manufacturer one-half profit. Some 700 grocers of the city have refused to deal in the article.”

If the manufacture of this spurious article means that large reduction to the American farmers, it must mean a proportionately large reduction to the Canadian farmers. He says further:

“Boston, New York, New Haven, Cleveland, Baltimore, Cincinnati, Louisville and St. Louis have large bogus butter factories, while Chicago manufactures more bogus butter than all the other cities together.”

Speaking in Prince Edward county a short time ago, the candidate supporting the hon. gentleman who represents the Opposition said the Opposition were entitled to credit because the hon. member for Brant introduced a resolution for prohibiting the importation of these spurious articles into the country. But if the policy advocated by the Opposition, of unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union, should be adopted, what advantage could we derive from this prohibitory resolution? What benefit would the Canadian farmers derive from the prohibitive duty of 10 cents a lb. and the inland revenue duty of 8 cents a lb. imposed on these articles to-day, if we had commercial union? All restriction would be broken down entirely, and the country would be flooded with all this stuff which the Americans chose to send us. The Americans manufacture 260,000,000 lbs. a year, a very large amount of which would come in here to take the place of Canadian butter and thus reduce the reputation of the latter in the foreign markets. What will the farmer think of these same men who took so much credit for having that policy of restriction imposed on these spurious compounds, but who now want that restriction removed. They remind me of the cow, which, after giving a pail of milk, kicked the pail over and spilled it all. I believe the Canadian farmers are sufficiently intelligent to see what would be the result to him were this restriction abolished. Were we to do away with it, what would there be to prevent the American farmer from sending to this country this very large amount of spurious butter? In what other line would this policy bring about competition with our Canadian farmer. Hon. gentlemen will remember the interest created by the announcement, a few years ago, that Sir Charles Tupper had succeeded in having Canadian cattle taken off the schedule when imported into Great Britain. Our Canadian farmers had been building up a very large and important export trade to Great Britain. It was our best and largest market. The Americans were also competing with us, and, unfortunately for them, a contagious disease, known as pleuro pneumonia, had sprung up among their cattle and destroyed their trade in England, because the English Government refused to allow American cattle to be imported alive and transported through the country for fear of transmission of the disease. The result was the cattle were scheduled, and through the influence of the English farmers, Canadian cattle were also scheduled and excluded from the English market. Had that policy been persisted in, it would have meant destruction to the cattle business of this country, but to the credit of Sir Charles Tupper, be it said, he succeeded by his indefatigable energy and great ability in getting that order rescinded, and the Canadian cattle were taken off the schedule. Supposing we had reciprocity unrestricted, how long would we occupy, as regards our cattle, the superior position we hold as compared with the Americans? In a short time we would stand in the same position as the American farmer. Our cattle would be scheduled and our cattle raisers ruined. These are a few of the important lines in which the Canadian farmer is largely interested. In every one of these lines we are brought into direct competition with the American farmers, and they are brought into direct competition with us. Before sitting down I would like to say a few words in answer to the hon. member for King. The hon. member for Annapolis last night, in what I think the House recognised as a fair explanation of the condition of the farmers in the fertile valley of Annapolis, read the reports of agricultural committees. At the time he gave these reports, he reminded the House that the gentlemen who composed those agricultural societies represented both sides of politics, that there were a large number of Reformers as well as Conservatives in those societies. The hon. member for King's (Mr. Borden), in endeavoring to minimise the force of this argument said that the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) had read long reports from those agricultural societies, but that it was nothing but apples, that it seemed to be composed of apples from first to last. Surely the hon. gentleman will acknowledge that the member for Annapolis spoke not only of apples but of cattle, potatoes, oats, hay, and almost every line representing the agricultural interests of that productive valley, and that he read not only the report of one agricultural society but of a large number of them, and that he had in his hand and spoke of no less than ninety-two of them from the Province of Nova Scotia. Was not that likely to be an index to the condition of the agriculturists of that Province? He read those reports fairly, he gave very valuable information to the House, information which would prove to the members of this House and to the country that, notwithstanding all that has been said of her unfortunate condition, the Province of Nova Scotia is in a healthy condition and her people are peaceful and prosperous. The hon. gentleman from King's (Mr. Borden) said that some one in his part of the country had purchased a farm in 1866, the year after the abolition of the old Reciprocity Treaty, for $15,000, and had sold it to the hon. member for only $2,000 a short time ago. If that hon. gentleman had been fair, and had drawn the proper deduction from this, he would have told the House, and through the House would have told the country, that the value of farms at that time was largely enhanced, owing to the important market we had at that time in the United States. Some hon. gentleman will say that was by virtue of the Reciprocity Treaty.

Mr. SPROULE.

No, it was just after the Reciprocity Treaty had expired, but it was just at a time when everything we had to spare was bought up by the United States, it was at a time when 3,000,000 of the people of that country were taken away from their ordinary pursuits, from agriculture and from manufactures, and from other lines of business, and everything that we could sell brought a high figure in that market. I was living in the United States at that time, and I know that we have had to pay for pork 20 cents a pound, for beef 15 cents a pound, for a suit of clothes $85, for a pair of pants $25, for a pair of boots $15. That was in 1865, the last year of the American war, and all over the Province of Ontario we had not only Americans, but Canadians, buying up our sheep in thousands, to put on the prairies in the west in order to re-establish their agricultural industries after the disastrous effects of their very long and disastrous war. We had the sheep, and the pork, and the grain, and the coal of our country bought up at fabulous prices and taken over there, not as the result of the Reciprocity Treaty or of the negotiations of 1854, but as the result of the destruction of the agricultural pursuits of the people of the United States on account of that great civil war which lasted from 1862 to 1865. Everyone of those hon. gentlemen has called attention to the very glorious times which existed in this country from 1854 to 1866, during the time that the Reciprocity Treaty was in operation, but they never tell the people that we had the Russian war in 1855, the very year after the treaty was accomplished, and that, on account of that, the Canadian farmers' wheat sold for $2 50 a bushel. I remember selling 200 bushels of wheat in 1855 for $2 50 a bushel. That brought nearly three times the amount it would to-day, and yet hon. gentlemen compare those times with times of to-day, when the American is only able to sell his wheat for 75 cents a bushel. I remember when a pair of cattle were sold for $175, and beef was proportionately high, and everything that went to foreign countries that would bear long transport was sold for equally high prices. After the Russian war had passed over, we had the building of the Intercolonial Railway, the Northern Railway, and the Grand Trunk Railway. These great works were going on and large amounts of money were brought to the country; and afterwards, when times got harder, we had the great disastrous civil war which commenced in 1862, and we felt the beneficial effects in this country, as far as the enhanced value of farm products were concerned, up to 1869 and 1870, and therefore we had good times, the farmers enjoyed good times; but, while those were partially, but only to a small degree, attributable to the Reciprocity Treaty, they were largely due to the fact that so many of the agriculturists of the United States were taken away from their peaceful pursuits in order to defend their country, and our Canadian farmers had to fill the place. Therefore it is unfair to say that, if you give commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity, you would bring back the glorious times we enjoyed during those years. If we had unrestricted reciprocity, I believe it would be a disastrous blow to the farmers of this country. I believe it would kill out the manufactures of this country, I believe it would destroy the commerce of this country. We have in this Dominion a territory of more than 3,500,000 square miles. We are expecting to go on and develop that country, we have the resources which nature has given us to supply the wants of our people. We have not only the resources on the top of the ground in the shape of timber, but we have the resources below the ground in the shape of minerals. We have the fish in the ocean and in the lakes. We have the minerals in the ground, and we have manufactures springing up and giving employment to the people of our country. We have those vast and fertile fields of the west raising vast quantities of wheat every year. As they grow older, they will supply us with the wheat which we require, and we will supply them with the manufactured goods which they need. We will keep our people at home and we will keep our money at home, and the people here and in the eastern Provinces, when they cannot buy a farm in this portion of the country for the amount of money which they can command, will go out to that western country and get their farms for nothing. I heard a gentleman say that the farms have depreciated in value, and he gave the reason, that we had not unrestricted reciprocity. Those gentlemen forget to tell you that we have added that vast area to this country within a few years Manitoba, the North-West Territories and British Columbia, and that our farmers have been going in large numbers into that western country. Are we any worse off in that respect than the American farmers, if you take the return which they get for their labor? The apostle of commercial union, himself, Mr. Erastus Wiman, states that the price of a barrel of flour in New York is from $2.65 to $3.50. In what part of Canada do you find any such price? If the American can only get from $2.65 to $3.50 for his flour, and it is selling in my part of the country, where they raise flour, for $4.10, and has been all the winter, is it likely that the American will not throw that into Canada and get the enhanced price paid for it here? But is the Canadian farmer in the east any worse off than the American farmer in the east? We hear hon. gentlemen in this House talking about the population growing less in Ontario, less in New Brunswick, less in Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia, less in Quebec, and they say it is because the people are driven out of this country owing to the high tariff. Now, I have here a clipping from the Boston Provincialist, which tells us that the very same condition of things is going in the Eastern States of the Union. It says:

"What advantages are there in the New England States—over Nova Scotia and New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island? We see the statement made, that the young people leave their provincial homes by the score to seek employment in 'the States.' But to these young people 'the States' mean a very few centres of business, and outside of these centres there are as many deserted farms and tenantless houses, and as great a dearth of young people, in Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, and other New England States as can be found in the Maritime Provinces, in proportion to the population. Take Massachusetts even—the Mecca for most provincials—and two evils are met by all—intensely close competition, in the cities, and 'no business' in the country. The exceptions to this are about the same in the two countries under comparison. Let any who doubt this take a trip to Cape Cod, or down New Bedford way, or through the central and western counties of the State. Who has not read of Fairhaven and Nantucket, the once greatest whaling ports in the world? but now almost unknown. And wise people say that Gloucester and Provincetown and other such places are going the same way. There are thousands of deserted farms in New England to-day—the owners having moved to Boston or other large cities."

Now, I say, that proves that the very same condition of things that is to be found in our country to-day, is found in the Eastern States. The people are going westward. It is said, that "westward the course of Empire takes its way." A great many young people take Horace Greely's advice and go west, where they can make homes for themselves, and start anew in the operations of life, with all the energies of young people, with all the prospects of a long future before them that their fathers enjoyed when they were young. Then, I say that Canada is in no worse position than the United States. We find that the same operations are going in both countries, and a fair comparison of the condition of the farmers in both lands will unmistakably show that our Canadian farmers, man for man, are better off to-day than the American farmers. Remembering this, I come to the conclusion that this resolution would result in great disaster to the people of Canada, to the great agricultural class of this country, and remembering this, I can only tell the hon. gentleman opposite, that I am not only disposed to vote against his resolution, but I am disposed to fight it inch by inch, in every part of the country, wherever I may be brought face to face with the people. I can tell him that when both sides of this question are before the farmers of this country, it will not take long to show on which side the great majority rests, and these hon. gentlemen will be as unfortunate when they appeal to the people again on the strength of this resolution as they were in 1878, as they were in 1882, and as they were again in 1887. They will not only find themselves, as they are to-day, leaderless in this House, with scarcely more than a corporal's guard to support them, but they will find their party entirely snuffed out of existence, and we will have but one party in this country, the Liberal Conservative party, the party which has always shown a commendable desire to work for the good of the people. That party has always been ready to come to the defence of the farmer. When combines are alleged to exist, a committee is appointed to ascertain whether the allegations respecting them are true, and if so, that party provides legislation to choke them off. And as long as we keep up that barrier line, we keep those combines at bay, and when they come within our territory we can control them by law. We do not want any great monopolies here, we want no Vanderbilt monopoly, we want no Jay Gould monopoly, in our country; but when a monopoly does come here, we can legislate to take away its injurious effects. I do not care what class of the country requires attention, whether it is the farmer, or the miner, or the shipowner, or the fisherman; as soon as there is a want apparent, the Liberal Conservative party are ever ready to come to the defence of the people of the country and provide legislation that will do them good. Remembering this, I am prepared to oppose this resolution, and to support the National Policy, that has done so much for every class in the country but more especially for the agricultural class, who are in truth the backbone of this country.

Gen. LAURIE. I feel that it would not be right for me to give a vote on this question without laying my views before the House. During the first 15 years that I lived in this country I was a free trader, but I found reason to change my views. After having seen what was going on in our own country, and especially after visiting the great Centennial Exhibition in Philadelphia, I came to the conclusion that it was to protection that the United States owed the progress they had made, and that if we were to make similar progress, under the conditions that surrounded us, we must copy their example and introduce a National Policy. The hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) has pointed out that the right hon. gentleman, the leader of the Government, in 1877 and 1878, was ready to go any length for reciprocity. I think he stated that the right hon. gentleman was ready to go any length for a reciprocity of trade or a reciprocity of tariff. But we have also been told by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones), that the utterances of our public men in the discussions of the National Policy in this House, and afterwards in the country, caused much irritation in the United States, and did more than even the National Policy itself to embitter public sentiment in the United States, and the minds of leading statesmen in Congress, against the people of this country. If that is the case, and if the statement of the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) is true, then it is clear that it was not the utterances of the right hon. gentleman and his party that embittered our friends across the border against us, but the utterances of hon. gentlemen of the Opposition, such as I read for the information of the House. We thereby learn what the utterances must have been if the view of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) be correct, that the utterances embittered our neighbors across the border. But what do we find in the discussion on the National Policy? I read this:

"No person will assert it is proper to project industries that are not naturally adapted to the country, but when they are suited to the land it is the duty of the Government to foster them. Arts and manufactures do not spring up on a virgin soil. In the first place, trade has a tendency to remain in beaten tracks. Then the advantage is on the side of a nation in which manufactures are established, because money is more easily obtained there than in a new country. I believe that the interests of the nation at large would be promoted by protection, and that the manufacturer being brought to the door of the farmer would afford a market for a great many articles of produce that would not be saleable if the market were 3,000 miles away. With a home market of this kind established by protection to manufacturers, the agriculturist can benefit his soil by producing a rotation of crops."

That came from the hon. member from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton); it did not come from any hon. member supporting the Government. If that is not enough what have we here?

"The American Government, always alive to the interests of their people and all that relates to the prosperity of their country, have recently passed a Treasury order, increasing very considerably the drawback on white refined sugar, the result of which, I learn, has been that the great bulk of that quality now used in Canada comes from that quarter, and their manufacture is entirely abandoned at Montreal, where formerly large quantities were made; hence it follows that if our trade with the West Indies is to be encouraged or sustained, such exceptional legislation as I have referred to must be met by corresponding legislation on our part."

He goes on to say—and this has a bearing on the present case:

"Such a system could not continue very long, for in a short time, when the Americans found that they had destroyed our trade, they would dictate their own terms, and that it would be seen how disastrous the present (Grit) policy was."

By whom were these sentiments uttered? They were uttered by the very hon. gentleman who from his place in this House a few nights ago assured this House that the discussion of the National Policy embittered the Americans against us and did more to interfere with our obtaining reciprocity than even the National Policy itself. If that be the case, then I say it was hardly fair for that hon. gentleman to throw that as a charge against us and assume that the supporters of the Government were to blame, that it was the National Policy party who were to blame, when the very sentiments he himself enunciated were the sentiments that did the most to embitter our friends across the border against us. But our friends on the Opposition benches in the course of their arguments have dwelt at length on the great prosperity of the United States. They have shown that the United States, not so favorably situated agriculturally, commercially or minerally with ourselves, is very prosperous and we in Canada are suffering from depression; although it is evident from the evidence that they have adduced that they have not shown that we have superior natural advantages to what the United States enjoy. Have not those hon. gentlemen proved a little too much? Have they not proved that in this case, if our neighbors across the border, with natural advantages, have prospered more than we have, there must be a cause for it. What is that cause? We, who have supported the National Policy, have maintained that it is protection to manufacturers, that that was the cause of the great prosperity in the United States, and that we are proceeding to follow that example. Let the hon. gentlemen say what they like. I have heard it stated this evening from the Opposition benches that if the National Policy has not already developed our manufactures into such a complete state as to enable them to compete with the manufacturers of the United States, then it was a failure. It was hardly fair to assume that our manufacturers can be developed in ten years and placed in as perfect a condition as the manufactures of a country that have been fostered during seventy or eighty years. I say that our friends on the Opposition benches have proved too much. Then, what is the object of the resolution placed before the House? There must be a definite object in it. Is it to increase our exports or our importations? If it is to increase our imports, that is a question we will consider presently. If it is to increase our exports, on what description is the increase proposed to be made? I hold in my hand the tariff submitted by the Committee of Ways and Means of the House of Representatives of the Fiftieth Congress, and what do I find? Let me here say that while it must be acknowledged that raw materials are the main product we can export profitably, I find in the new tariff submitted to Congress and which may very possibly be passed this session, or if not this session it will be ready to be brought forward immediately after the Presidential election that nearly every material in which the vast mass of our people are interested as exporters is to be removed from the list of articles subject to duty and is to be placed on the free list. Surely, then, if the United States Congress are prepared to meet us in that way, if the Government of the United States, represented by that legislative body, are prepared to deal with us in this way, is it wise for us at present to go into these details, and describe how this country is suffering? What did the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) say the other evening? Did he not say that it was unwise for us to discuss the matters relating to the fishery negotiations, and I take it that what applies to the Fisheries Treaty would apply equally to the subject now before the House. The hon. gentleman said that our neighbors at Washington would watch the discussion, and he was unwilling that any language should be spoken that might be used against us in regard to that question. Practical negotiations must follow any proposition made by us for reciprocity. Certainly hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have used much language that may be fairly used against us in any negotiation on which we might enter. Hon. gentlemen of the Opposition have assured the country that the Dominion cannot go on any longer in its present position.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Gen. LAURIE. While the hon. gentleman takes that view, the large body of the House take the opposite view, and we are prepared to justify that view. We do not merely state it, but we hold to it and we give our reasons. We are told it would be proper for us not to seek to promote inter-provincial trade for the interchange of the products of each part of the country, but that we should look to the natural market to the south of us, and that that was the object of the reciprocal arrangement. In regard to the natural market I do not hesitate to say that the natural market is thoroughly fallacious. I am not prepared to recognise that those markets are in any sense natural markets to us for those markets were artificially created. We have heard from the hon. gentleman from King's (Mr. Borden) of the great value and the large amount of produce that could under favorable circumstances be exported to New England. We have heard of the large market there and the very large amount of goods that the people of the United States were ready to purchase. But why are they ready to purchase that and what has put them in a position to do so? Is not that country able to raise products for its own ordinary consumption? Undoubtedly I claim it is. But protection has artificially created large cities and large centres of population. Those in no sense are natural markets; they are artificial markets created under a system that we desire to adopt and which we desire in our own way to promote our own market. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Ellis) stated that the British market being far away from us was of little value and that the West India market had practically become valueless. On this question, other members from the Maritime Provinces and myself, I am happy to say, are prepared to join issue, and at the same time he assumes that the only market left to us is the market to the south because the United States are nearest at hand. I claim, Sir, if a market near at hand is the only market desirable for us that it will be better still to carry out the view of the promoters of the National Policy, and, under the same system as our American neighbors, increase our own home market.

It the argument of the hon. the member for St. John (Mr. Ellis) is good for anything that the nearer a market is to us the better for us, then I say to him the home market that we have at hand is better still and therefore out of his own mouth and by his own argument I desire to prove my case. I will deal with the remarks he made and I will dispose of them. Another point that he raised was when he said: "It was hardly fair to consider that sugar sent from the Maritime Provinces to other Provinces was a product of the country." In one sense, Sir, it is not a product. He disputed the fact whether that raw material being imported, the manufactured article produced from that raw material is a product of the country. There again, Sir, I join issue with him. The article that we have by labor changed from an article of small value to an article of much higher value, to my mind, is a product of the country, as our mechanics and laborers have reaped advantage thereby and as money has gone into the hands of the people of the country. It is a product which we have handled and passed out to other markets, and in that sense it is a product of the country. Gentlemen on the other side of the House, in their desire for unrestricted reciprocity, speak as free traders, but as a matter of fact the apostle of this commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity, whichever it may be called, or whether it be both, distinctly tells us that he supports it because it is protection in a marked and more extreme form and likely to make protection more permanent than ever, even as it is at present. At present, Sir, we have a committee investigating combines and if this be the case, is not this the most gigantic combine that has been proposed? We are asked that the two nations should combine to hold all the consumers of those two nations in the hands of the manufacturers, and for this purpose I assume that Canada is a nation. Comparing the prospects of countries which are following out the free trade policy, we find that the exports from Great Britain have diminished largely the world over. I find that in ten years the export from England to Germany have decreased £10,000,000 sterling; the exports from England to Holland have diminished from £16,000,000 to £9,000,000; the exports from England to the United States from £33,000,000 to £27,000,000, and the exports to Belgium from £7,000,000 to £6,000,000, and yet, Sir, we are told that a free trade country is better for the manufacturer than a protected one. That hardly appears to be the case, and those figures are from Mr. Giffen, who is, above all things, an apostle of free trade. The English manufacturers lately raised their hands in astonishment when a large contract for locomotives, by one of the large railway companies of England, was given to a firm in Belgium, where strict protection and a very high tariff is granted to the manufacturers, and highly protected Belgium was able to compete with free trade England in free trade England itself. This shows, Sir, that protection there has developed manufactures and enabled manufacturers to manufacture cheaply when they once got fairly started and under way. Again the great argument which has been used is that the farmers are suffering, and that the farmers will suffer under the protective system. I hold in my hand, Sir, a paper elaborated by Sir James Hare who is a strong apostle of free trade in England. He has considered this question, and has examined the reports in the United States and he has come to the conclusion that value in agriculture is enhanced by increase of a non agricultural population. As shown by a table prepared in the agricultural department it appears that the States in the Union were divided into four classes. The first had a population of only 18 per cent. engaged in agriculture, the second with 42 per cent., the third with 58 per cent., and the fourth with 77 per cent. In those States that had 18 per cent. only employed in agriculture the value of the land was £7 14s. an acre, and the wages of the agricultural laborer was £5 a month. In the second class, where 42 per cent. were employed in agriculture, we find that the value of the land diminishes by £1 10s. an acre, and that the monthly wages have also diminished. In the third class we find that 58 per cent. of the population are employed in agriculture, the land is only £2 14s. an acre and the wages of the agricultural laborer £3 10s. a month. In the fourth class, where 77 per cent. are employed in agriculture, we find the land but worth £1 sterling an acre and wages of the agricultural laborer £2 10s. a month, just half what it is in the district where only 18 per cent. of the population are employed in agriculture. This shows, Sir, if proof goes for anything, and by the evidence of the United States returns, that the less of the population employed in agriculture the greater the value of the agricultural land and the greater the returns to the agricultural laborer. But, Sir, we are told that if we adopt commercial reciprocity with the United States, we shall prosper. Now, Sir, what are the views of the statesmen of the United States? I will read an extract from a letter addressed by Mr. Frelinghuysen, the secretary of the late Republican Government, to Senator Miller, Chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, in which he says:

"Any increase of our trade with foreign countries commensurate with our industrial development and requirements can only come through our commercial relations with countries inferior to us in wealth and population."

Now, Sir, that is the position of the republican statesmen of the United States, and I think it will be found that the Democratic party take the same view. They say that reciprocity with nations equally developed with themselves would be no reciprocity whatever. They want to establish reciprocity, if they establish it at all, with such nations as will sell them their raw material, and in return take their manufactures. He sums up his argument by saying:

"It follows that the superior nation which aids in such development can monopolise the greater portion of the import trade of each and all."

That is the position the United States would take if we adopted such an arrangement as that proposed by the hon. member for South Oxford. I had a little personal experience of this very thing two years ago. Duty took me to the south of Europe. I there found a young and struggling nation with vast natural resources—Serbia. Serbia is held in subjection to Austria-Hungary, and is bound under treaty to send her raw material to that country; but she is not permitted to send her manufactures there. Theoretically she is permitted, but practically the superior advantages held by the more advanced country ensure that Serbia with its great natural resources shall only send its raw material into Austria-Hungary, and any attempt on its part to send manufactures is at once crushed out. I saw the discontent and hopelessness in which the people of Serbia lived, and I must say that if any argument were necessary to prove to me that the proposition held out to us should not be adopted by this House, it would be the case of Serbia, which has tried the same system and failed. I should be very sorry to see Canada placed in the condition of that country, and therefore I shall do my utmost to oppose the proposition made by the hon. gentleman. Our attention has been called to the great exodus that has gone from this country. I heard the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I., say that Prince Edward Island was almost depopulated. I can almost say that there is also a great exodus from the Province from which I come—a very great exodus.

Mr. KIRK. Hear, hear.

Gen. LAURIE. The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear." If that hon. gentleman were an employer of labor, I do not think he would say "hear hear." I am an employer of labor, and it is almost impossible for us to get the labor we require. Therefore the people do not leave because they cannot get work. There was a time when work was not plenty in this country, and when men had to go to the United States to get work. They then established relations in that country, and now having relations there and wishing not unnaturally to see the world, they go, and the result is that it is almost impossible to obtain the necessary supply of labor in Nova Scotia. Last winter it was most difficult to obtain the labor we required, and now when spring has opened it is still more difficult. Therefore while our industries are promising, we have not sufficient labor to cultivate them. The hon. member for Queen's stated that many of those who left Prince Edward Island sent remittances home to pay for the farms they purchased. Fortunately that shows that they have some desire to go back, and intended to do so. But I am sorry to say that is not my experience. I have known a large number to go away in the spring and come back in the autumn; when they come back they have a good suit of clothes, but instead of bringing any money in their pockets, they come to live on the old people during the winter. It is not the case with us that they bring back large sums of money. The hon. member for Halifax was astonished the other evening at my saying "hear, hear," when he pointed out that it was impossible last summer for owners of vessels fitting out for the fisheries to obtain crews, because the young men had gone to the States. Why, that was an argument against himself, because it showed that while there was work, the people were not there to do it. Therefore it is not anything connected with our industrial system that has caused this exodus. I am not prepared to say what they go for, but I say they do not go because they cannot get work. The hon. gentleman who introduced this resolution expressed his belief that this country will suffer terribly if the present system of government is continued, and he told us that unrestricted reciprocity is the only thing that will put Canada on her feet again. He told us also that England is friendless, and he dwelt on the isolated condition the mother country occupied. But he assured us that if unrestricted reciprocity were adopted immediately by Canada, England would make friends again, and Ireland would be conciliated. I have seen posted on the walls everywhere Radway's Ready Relief and Johnson's Liniment, as cures from all diseases, and it appears to me the hon. gentleman's prescription is not merely to help Canada but it is a panacea for all evils, and all ailments are cured by this wonderful remedy. The only salvation if unrestricted reciprocity should be introduced—and God forbid such a thing should ever happen—the only salvation from direct taxation would be the placing of a duty on the patent medicine which the hon. gentleman is trying to palm off on us, and in so doing we might raise revenue enough to enable us to manage without direct taxation. I will not go into all the arguments brought forward by hon. gentlemen on this side to show how our trade will be reduced under unrestricted reciprocity and how the imports of the United States coming in here to the exclusion of the imports from other countries, we will be compelled to resort to direct taxation. I do not think I should reiterate the arguments advanced in support of the contention, for there can be no doubt that the position thus set forth will be one from which we cannot escape. The hon. gentleman went on to say that the present system would become a great strain on his loyalty. Of course, Sir, loyalty is a sentiment. Each man is his own lord in the matter of sentiment, and no one can prescribe what sentiment another should hold. The hon. gentleman holds his sentiments, I hold mine, and each of us is entitled to hold his own; but I have never yet been able to understand the peculiar position he gives his loyalty. He says that whilst his forefathers were loyal and made great sacrifices, he now considers the debt of loyalty is paid. His forefathers were right in doing what they did, but his duty is to strike out for himself. The debt is paid and squared. His loyalty was a limited liability affair, and he is now free to act independently of it. As an illustration of another species of loyalty which is not a limited liability concern, I will read a few words of a letter that I received from one of my electors "I have the honor to represent. He says:

"I hope the Fishery Treaty will hasten a free market for our fish, which without a doubt, we need, but not at a sacrifice of Canada's rights and honor."

The writer of that letter is only a poor fisherman, but I am prepared to put his view of loyalty alongside of that expressed by the hon. gentleman opposite who introduced this resolution, and I am confident the hon. gentleman will admit that the writer of this letter gave a better idea of loyalty in the few words he expressed than did the hon. gentleman in his speech and resolution. I have heard the phrase as used, in connection with the proposal of the hon. gentleman, describing this proposal as "a heroic remedy." I demur to that statement. I conceive that true heroism consists in making a sacrifice of your own interests for the benefit of others. But as I understood the proposal of the hon. gentleman, his idea of a heroic remedy is to sacrifice other people's interests to his. That is not the interpretation that I should be inclined to give to the term "heroic remedy." I heard the hon. gentleman state that if it was a question whether he lost his nationality or his property, he would rather lose his property. The hon. member for Queen's stated that, and the reply was flung across the floor that that was a foolish speech to make, that it would be far better to lose one's nationality than one's property. But is it not possible, if this unrestricted reciprocity were brought into force, that we might lose both nationality and property? That is certainly a danger that I dread. I am sorry to see the hon. member for Halifax is not in his place, because I would like to comment on a few points with which he dealt. He remarked among other things on the difficulties our fishermen had to meet when they carried their fish to American markets, in not being able to bring back their supplies. I can assure the hon. gentleman that there is no difficulty in this regard. If our fishermen go to the port of Boston to sell their fish, they can bring back Canadian produce in bond and at as cheap prices as they could American produce. All of us who have visited the eastern portion of the States, know that wheat does not grow in any quantity around Boston. New England is not celebrated for her growth of cereals. These products come from the far west, and the distance is just as far from the wheat producing districts of the United States as from those of Canada, and the products are as easily taken from the one place as from the other. Our people have found that out. At first there was a great deal of nonsense talked about Canadian flour being no good to make bread with, and our people would only use American flour, but after a while they discovered that this theory was absurd, and the consumption of Canadian flour has steadily increased. In 1886 we imported 213,000 barrels from the United States, in 1887 we imported 172,000 barrels, while in Nova Scotia we find we have reduced our importation from 15,000 in 1886 to 10,000 in 1887. Therefore it is evident we can use Canadian flour and do as well by buying it, though of course, it entails the purchase by earloads and not by single barrels; but if a fishing vessel can bring home 120 barrels of flour, it is not likely to come home with one barrel. One of the grievances of the National Policy is the sugar grievance. We are told that we are playing into the hands of the manufacturers in the case of sugar, and that sugar is worth 16s. 6d. per cwt., whilst in Canada the consumer had to pay three and a half cents per pound higher than in England. The hon. gentleman who made this statement, forgot to mention the price of sugar in New York. That would be a fairer comparison than to compare Canada with free trade England. Had the hon. gentleman for South Oxford given the comparison with the country south of us, it would have been sufficient for all practical purposes to arrive at an opinion on his resolution. Supposing we took the duty off sugar, what do we come back to? We come back to direct taxation. If the duty is taken off articles that we consume, we must admit the fact that to raise a revenue, we must have recourse to direct taxation. He tells us that the refineries of Montreal are making $7,000 a day profit. The shareholders will be glad to hear that, but I doubt if it is really the case. He also undertook to tell us something in regard to the catch of mackerel. He says our fishermen must take their mackerel to the United States. Well, it is very true that, to a certain extent, the United States is the market for our mackerel, but is that an unmixed hardship, that our fishermen should take their mackerel to the United States? I think, when we consider the large protection we have afforded to our fisheries, while, as he says, that is, on the one hand, our market, on the other hand he forgot to tell the House that our fisheries are the source of supply to the United States, that they have to get their fish from us, and therefore the price of the fish going to the United States is largely fixed by the quantity we send them. It is true that a duty of $2 a barrel is charged, but, if our mackerel were admitted free, the price would come down. As long as the duty is kept up, the fisherman in the United States gets that benefit, but our fishermen do not suffer. I will show the great change which has taken place in the mackerel trade owing to the protection of the fisheries. In 1880, at Gloucester, the principal entrepôt for mackerel, the total catch was 190,000 barrels; in 1881, the catch was 163,000 barrels; in 1882, 170,000 barrels; in 1883, 108,000 barrels; in 1884, 223,000 barrels; and then we come to a different state of things. We come to a comparison between the catch of mackerel which the United States fishermen made when they were allowed to go where they liked to fish, and when they were restricted. In 1885 the catch was 157,000 barrels, but in 1886, when they were kept out of our fishing grounds, the catch was only 58,000 barrels, and there was consequently a market for our fishermen; and in 1887 their catch was again reduced to 44,000 barrels, showing that practically we hold the supply of the fish in our own hands, and, if we hold the supply, the consumer is dependent upon us, and we fix the price and not the Americans, and consequently the duty is paid on these fish by the man who wants to buy them. An illustration was given of the hardships our people suffer in connection with fishing, by the description which was given of the work of a fishing vessel in one summer. As I understood it, the statement was that, in 1885, a fishing vessel was on her fishing cruise from the 1st June to the 30th September, and the catch that was sold amounted to 800 barrels of mackerel, and all the fishermen realised for the season's work was $30 apiece. This may be so. The hon. gentleman has stated it, and that ought to be sufficient, but it is a very curious fact in connection with this that the whole catch, less duty, must in that case have been sold for $1,200, or $1.50 a barrel, and that is a low price. Even with the duty added, it would be only $3.50 a barrel. I hold in my hand the report of the Boston Official Bureau of Statistics for 1885, and the statement made by the secretary of that Bureau is that Nova Scotia mackerel at that time sold for from $6 to $8 a barrel. It is odd that our people, who, as I said before, are fairly hard-headed, should, when the price ranged from $6 to $8, have accepted only $3.50. But there are ups and downs even in the mackerel fishing. I met a young man this year, during my canvass, who had been in the mackerel fishing in the United States. He had been urged to go there by those who said there was no chance of getting a living here, and so he had gone to the United States. I asked him what success he had had, and he told me he had made $1 for his work during this year from the Gloucester fishing. I do not think he had been paid better than if he had remained in this country, even if, as the hon. gentleman says, he had got only $3 instead of $1 for his season's work. I do not think that those who told him it was better for him to go to the United States advised him well, and I think there are people who lead others astray sometimes, as they did in this case. I think the hon. gentleman stated that those of us who believed in the National Policy had been dangling it before the eyes of a deceived people for political purposes. Might not that be considered a fair description of the resolution which the hon. gentleman himself has submitted for the consideration of this House, that he is holding it before the people and dangling it before the eyes of a deceived people for political purposes? A complaint was made that, while we professed under the National Policy to discriminate in favor of English trade, the average duty on the imports from Great Britain was 21 per cent., and on those from the United States only 16 per cent., so that we were discriminating against the mother country and in favor of the United States. But surely the hon. gentleman knows that the large proportion of our raw material comes from the United States, and that comes in free of duty in order to stimulate and encourage manufacture in this country, and, by encouraging these industries and helping our products of the soil, the fishery, the mine and other industries, we employ more people, and the more people we employ, the more money we have, and the better market we have for everything we have to sell. The hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) showed that England had a large trade with India, and he said that was natural because that was a dependency. The Indian Government some years ago found it necessary to protect their manufactures, and they increased the wealth of India to such an extent that now that country is able to consume a large amount of those manufactures, which, not being indigenous to India, would never have been established but for that policy. The people, in working up the material which they have, have so increased in wealth that they are able to utilise a much larger portion than before of the manufactures of England. He told us how much the progress of Michigan was greater than the progress of Ontario. Why, Sir, possibly because Michigan has been longer living in a state of protection, possibly because Michigan has been in a position to make a market of her products to a non-agricultural and non-lumbering population. Her goods have sold more readily. He made out, if I understood him, that the crops of 1887 were much reduced compared with those of 1882. I cannot conceive that this is a charge against the National Policy. I do not know that unrestricted reciprocity would give us larger crops, it depends very much on the season. Now, I have pointed out that in the Tariff Bill submitted to Congress by the Ways and Means Committee, is found a large proportion of these articles that we are so anxious to send into the States, on which we now have a duty, and for the remission of which duty we are so anxious that we are prepared, almost, to sacrifice anything and anybody but our own selves, and to throw our manufacturers to the wolves. Whilst we are doing this we find that at Washington they are prepared to take the duty off most of these articles. It is true the duties remain on some others, but it will be found that of the articles on which duties remain we export already more than $13,000,000. The hon. gentleman gave us at length a statement showing how 97, 98 and 99 per cent. of various products went to the States. They do, Sir. How will unrestricted reciprocity make more than 100 per cent. of those articles go to the States? Therefore, what benefit are we going to gain, commensurate with the sacrifices we are asked to make, in simply sending one or two per cent. more of those articles to the States?

Mr. DAVIES. It doubles the quantity of consumption.

Gen. LAURIE. But if the quantity is not available. If we have no more barley, for instance, to sell, it will not double the consumption. Then the hon. member for Halifax mentioned that Nova Scotia exported fruit. He said that had nothing to do with the National Policy, and that was the view taken by the hon. member for King's county (Mr. Borden). Now, I am inclined to think that is a little wide of the mark. I think the duty imposed on potatoes going into the United States has improved the farms of King's county very materially. As a matter of fact those properties were being considerably run down by the export of potatoes, without any fertilisers being used to supply the exhaustion of the soil. I am aware that Prince Edward Island also sends a great many potatoes to the States. But in the case of King's county the advantage has been that when that particular article was low, the farmers fed their potatoes to their cattle and made beef, and in making beef they furnished fertilisers to their land, consequently they have been able to increase the product; and I believe the product of fruit has also largely increased, owing to the fact that the farmers were not at all times able to export their potatoes and deprive their farms of fertilisers. But the potato market is not closed in the United States. There is a duty, but last autumn a very large amount of the potato product was sent to the United States. Whenever the article is wanted it goes there, when it is not, it is used at home, and the farmer benefits. I believe that in the matter of fruit export the retention of the duties in the United States has really not injured that district to the extent that is assumed. Now, the hon. member for Halifax was rather jocular—at least I assumed that was the line he took in the description he gave of my visiting Shelburne county during my last canvass. I will read what he says:

"I would like the hon. the Minister of Marine to go along our coast when he visits Halifax next year, instead of allowing his gunboat to go down the shore electioneering in the county of Shelburne, instead of sending her down there to sound along every little harbor in the county of Shelburne, but of course not to make promises. Oh, no; we have the word of the gallant member for Shelburne (Gen. Laurie), that he made no promises. I do not say he did, but I say that, when he went down on board that Dominion gunboat, with the Dominion flag flying over his head, and the so-called engineer going into every port along that coast and sounding, and saying this would be a nice place for a wharf, and that would be a nice place for a breakwater, and you must require a lighthouse here—I do not say he made any promises, but the inference would be natural."

Now, am I to understand that is a correct statement of what occurred?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Gen. LAURIE. Well, I say distinctly it is not.

Mr. JONES. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask whether that lightship did not carry him down to his election in the county of Shelburne.

Mr. THOMPSON. That is not the point.

Gen. LAURIE. The hon. gentleman asks me what did occur, and I will tell him. I think it would have been better if the hon. member for Halifax, in this statement, had not, by innuendo, implied that I had stated what was not the case. The hon. member for York asked me a question in this House the other day, and he told us something about the promises made in the election. I answered that question, I thanked him for asking the question and giving me an opportunity to make the explanation.

Mr. JONES. You did not answer the question.

Gen. LAURIE. The gunboat did not go into every harbor along the coast, did not go electioneering, did not go into every port, there was no engineer going sounding along that coast and saying this would be a nice place for a wharf and that would be a nice place for a breakwater.

Mr. JONES. Did she carry you down?

Gen. LAURIE.

Gen. LAURIE. Yes, and I will tell you how she carried me down. Domestic affairs took me home during the elections. Shelburne is deprived of the privileges of a railway. We have 66 miles to travel by stage and it only travels in the night. It does not suit me to travel in a coach at night if I can help it. It would take me two days to arrive at Shelburne, and I had appointments there. I found that this vessel was going down with some stores to supply a lighthouse, and I telegraphed to the Minister of Marine asking if I might get a passage in her. I obtained passage in her, and according to the usual rule on board those vessels, I paid for the three meals that I had on board. I left Halifax in the middle of the day and arrived at Shelburne at 8 o'clock the next morning, and left the vessel there. Now, is that going into every port along the coast? But there is something more. I met the President of the Yarmouth Steamship Company who complained to me that the passage at Barrington, entering into the channel, was very bad, and he wanted a wharf there. I said: Yes, I knew they wanted a wharf. But I want you to understand, Mr. Speaker, that the president of this Yarmouth Company does not reside in my county, and he has no vote there. A petition was sent in last spring signed by both political parties urging that a wharf should be built at Barrington. When it was found impossible that a lightship could be built at Shelburne—hon. gentlemen will try to make something out of that—it happened that the Newfield was around there. I telegraphed the Minister of Marine, asking if, as the vessel was engaged in the lightship service and being on the spot, she could not be employed in ascertaining where the best place would be for the wharf.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). We are getting at it now.

Gen. LAURIE. You are going to get the whole of it. I went to Barrington and saw the Collector of Customs, and asked him to select two gentlemen, one on each side of politics, so that there should be no politics in it, to go and see the captain of the vessel and show him where, in their view, would be the best place for him to examine.

An hon. MEMBER. Before the election?

Gen. LAURIE. Certainly before the election.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). How many days?

Gen. LAURIE. I would ask whether the description given by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) of the gunboat going into every port along that coast and saying this would be a nice place for a wharf and that would be a nice place for a breakwater, and you must require a lightship there, is a fair description of what I have stated. I would ask, Mr. Speaker, whether when the vessel was on the spot and it was known that it was desirable to ascertain where the right place for this wharf would be—which is to accommodate steamers which cannot at present get up there, but have to lie up—I say it was a desirable thing that this should be done, and I particularly explained that I was most anxious there should be nothing connected with politics in regard to it. I wish further to say this: I do not know why the hon. gentleman should be surprised that when I went on board of the Dominion gunboat there should be a Dominion flag floating over her head. What flag would he like to see floating?

An hon. MEMBER. Pull down the flag.

Gen. LAURIE. So long as I live in Canada I hope the flag of Old England will float over us; so long as Canada remains as she is I trust the flag of Canada will remain what it now is. I wish to have this matter explained, because it is most desirable that this story that this vessel was round there canvassing with me, that she visited every harbor, should be contradicted. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) has himself stated it, so that I am able to contradict it; before this time I had no opportunity.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). You corroborate it.

Gen. LAURIE. I beg your pardon. I distinctly stated the vessel being there I asked that she might sound one harbor, and that she did. If that is not a different thing from the colored statement of the hon. member for Halifax, then I am not able to understand English; but I am glad I have noticed it because hon. gentlemen will now understand how everything is colored for political purposes. In reply to an enquiry as to how it is proposed to obtain unrestricted reciprocity the hon. gentleman says we should make overtures to a friendly nation—they have shown themselves so friendly in the past. I have no better friends in the world than the friends I have in the United States, but to speak of them as a friendly nation, to speak of their Government as acting on high principles, especially in regard to their treaties, is to give them a character I do not think we are warranted in giving them. What happened in regard to the Treaty of Washington in 1873? It was provided that the products of our fisheries should enter the United States duty free. On a quibble they made the products of the British Columbia fisheries pay duty during the whole term of that treaty, on the plea that a proclamation had not been issued bringing British Columbia into the Union. Under the same treaty a similar question was raised in regard to certain kinds of fish entering from the Maritime Provinces, and they imposed a duty of one and a-half cents on each can containing canned fish entering the United States. That is another illustration that it is not wise for us to put ourselves too much into their hands. What has the Minister of Finance been doing lately? Has he not been at Washington negotiating a fresh treaty in place of a treaty made by our Government, the Government of England with the United States, to which they acknowledged they were bound by law but in regard to which they said it was not applicable to the new system of morality among nations. If they are able to shift their ground and change their views in regard to treaties, in what position would we find ourselves as a nation of five millions against sixty millions, or in that proportion if, in the event of any arrangement being made, they declared after it had been in operation for some time that it was not in harmony with modern ideas and, therefore, they declined to be bound to it any longer. It seems to me that in view of our experience we had better be careful in dealing with them in the future. The hon. member for Halifax pointed out that it was a ridiculous argument to use that it was unfair to discriminate in regard to goods against England and in favor of the United States when we had already discriminated against England in favor of Canada, and he thought the cases were similar. I hardly think that is the case. We were legislating for our own people, and within our own boundaries. We have a right to decide how to raise our revenue, because we have undertaken the burdens that our revenue is intended to meet, and consequently we have a right to impose taxation. The amendment moved by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones), expresses a most desirable proposition, that it is desirable that we should obtain the coasting trade of the United States if possible. Undoubtedly it is desirable, and if the hon. gentleman had moved it as a separate resolution, I would have been one of the first to support it. Of course it is desirable, in fact there is a great deal that is desirable that we should obtain. It is desirable that we should obtain reciprocity in natural products. Tacking it on to the resolution which is hostile to our country, which is opposed to the policy under which we believe we are thriving, has neutralised its effect, and has prevented it from being acceptable to many members. Speaking for myself, I am satisfied that I cannot vote for it. I believe that a great many who approve of the principle of the motion, are, like myself, compelled to oppose it, because they believe it is tacked on to a proposition that we cannot support. As it is late to-night, I will touch upon another question very briefly. I asked just now what the object of this proposal was? Was it to increase our imports or to increase our exports? I assume, Sir, and I hope that it is intended to increase our exports, to benefit our products, and in benefiting our products to afford more employment within our borders. It seems to me the right chord was struck by hon. gentlemen from the Maritime Provinces when they said that we should not look only to the United States as the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright, proposes, but that we can look to other countries as well; we can look to the West Indies, to the Brazils and to South America for a large trade, and I think we may reasonably look, in an especial degree, to those islands under our own flag, and under our own Queen. If we want to enter into commercial relations to a larger extent, as is proposed by the hon. gentleman, I think it would be better for us to initiate proposals for commercial relations with the islands of the West Indies rather than with our friends to the south of us. Much as we love them, much as we respect them, I can see that we will be in a false position if we are placed in competition alongside of them. We are not sufficiently advanced to hold our own against them yet, and many of our industries would go to the wall. In the West Indies we have a population—in Jamaica—of 600,000. They are consuming mainly the products which we produce, and they produce what we desire to consume. It is true we would lose three and a half millions of our revenue on the imports from the West Indies, for we should lose the whole duty on raw sugar, although we might reasonably expect a balance against that, which our increased trade would give us. If the hon. gentleman's argument is worth anything, when he says that we can afford to abandon seven millions of dollars duty to improve our trade with the United States, I think we might more reasonably propose to abandon three and a half millions of duty to improve our trade with the West Indies, especially when in studying the statistics we find the West Indies consume what we produce and that they produce what we consume. The United States are competitors with us, they are customers and we can find markets in other directions for what we want to sell. We need not alone look to what has been described as a market of 60,000,000 people in the United States, for have we not New Mexico, California, Arizona and the Carolines to trade with? It is true, of course, there is a market in the border country, there is a market in New England, there is a market in the lake cities and there is a market in Minnesota for our wheat, but this market for our wheat is simply that it may be manufactured and sold in its manufactured state to those who otherwise would be customers of ours. Why, instead of sending over millions of bushels of our wheat to Minnesota to be manufactured, should we not manufacture it ourselves. And now as regards the cattle of our own North-West. Is there any need of sending herds of cattle to Chicago to be put into cans and sent back to the North-West for consumption; would it not be a wiser way to stimulate our industries there, if we could prepare our meat at home for consumption by the people of our country and for exports to all parts of our own Dominion. Go where you will you see canned meats, always with the Chicago brand. You will hardly see in the Eastern Provinces and certainly not in the North-West any prepared meat without the Chicago brand. Let us not destroy the National Policy which we have been at some pains to build up, but so far from destroying it let us try to add to it and improve it. I think this is within our power to do. I feel satisfied that the members of this House will not be recreant to the duty imposed upon them to build up this country and faithfully continue in the good work which they have begun. I am satisfied that in the period of years of an ordinary man's life they will see the good results of such a course and that we shall be able to carry, not the scalps of hon. gentleman who now vote against us, but as a result of our policy that these hon. gentlemen will be the first to approve of the course which we have taken. Let us vindicate this principle which we laid down in 1878, which we endorsed again in 1882, and let us confirm it by our votes in this House in 1883.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, at this late hour I will only detain the House a few minutes, as it is no doubt weary of this discussion and of the very long speeches we have had on this question. The hon. gentleman from Shelburne (Gen. Laurie), who has just resumed his seat, took a long time in describing the fact that it was not our fishermen that paid the $2 duty on the mackerel that went to the United States. If that be the case, I would like to ask what is the reason that this very Government granted a large sum of money to indemnify the fishermen in Prince Edward Island for duties which they paid to the United States on the mackerel? If our fishermen did not pay this duty, then this Government did wrong in refunding it. That is the only answer I will give to that argument of the hon. gentleman. He also says that our people who go from the Dominion to the United States do not emigrate at all, but that they go there to visit their friends. There must be some emigrants there, because they had friends there before them, whom they went to see, and those friends must have emigrated from Canada some time. I will speak of the Maritime Provinces principally, because I know nothing about Ontario and the west. I would like to hear hon. gentlemen come down to the Maritime Provinces and make such a declaration as he has made in any settlement or section of the country down there. Why, Sir, he would be laughed at. I have travelled among the farming community down there and I know what I am speaking of. There is scarcely a house that you go into, in which you will not find that one, or two, or three members of the family are in the United States. Why is this the case? Because they have left the country and they have gone to the States in order to earn a little money and they send considerable sums back to assist the people they have left behind them to maintain an existence in this country. I shall make my arguments as short and endeavor to limit them as such as possible without making any repetition. But repetitions must be inevitable in such a discussion as this which has taken such a wide range and upon which so many speeches have been made. When my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) addressed this House and pointed to the exodus from the country, showing that the lands had depreciated in value in our Island at all events, and in the Maritime Provinces generally, that our trade had disappeared from the country, that our shipping had disappeared and that prices had been lowered for produce, he was replied to by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries with the argument that this was utterly impossible, because he said: "Look at the state of the country, look at the savings bank returns, and in the year 1874 you will find that the savings bank deposits were $336,000, while in 1887 they were $2,200,000. He says this is the most conclusive evidence of the prosperity of the people. That argument has been used here before; but he was answered, that in place of being an evidence of prosperity it is an evidence of depreciation of trade in the country, because the money has been withdrawn from industry or from other banks and placed in the savings bank for safety. Since the adoption of the National Policy one of our oldest and most substantial banks has gone to the wall, and a large number of people who put their money in other banks withdrew it and placed it in the savings bank in order that it might be safe. Before the National Policy was adopted, and when we had reciprocity with the United States, our farmers, instead of depositing their money in the savings bank used to buy farms with it for their sons and establish those farms, thus building up the country, increasing its population and making it prosperous. But the same sons, who in better times used to get farms of their own, are now leaving the country and going to the United States. Then, we have heard about inter-provincial trade. I reply to the statement that there has been no trade established between the Maritime Provinces and Upper Provinces of the Dominion, the Minister of Marine said that there has been. He said that he found a statement that $12,000,000 had been sent by the Province of Nova Scotia to the Upper Provinces to buy manufactured goods. If $12,000,000 went from Nova Scotia, there would be $8,000,000 or $10,000,000 from New Brunswick and $3,000,000 or $4,000,000 from Prince Edward Island, and that is the very thing we complain of, that the large manufacturing provinces do not take any of the products we have to dispose of in return for what we buy from them. We are forced by the National Policy to purchase our supplies from the Upper Provinces, and we have to send them the cash. They do not take anything from Prince Edward Island at any rate, unless it be a few barrels of oysters. The result of fostering these manufactures is that the manufacturers are encouraged to produce materials of inferior quality, and can force us to buy them. Now, when the National Policy was adopted, we were told that everything was going to be lovely; tall chimneys were going to rise in every village, and everybody was going to become rich at everybody else's expense, and the people in Prince Edward Island were induced to vote for that policy in the expectation that these things would come. But they did not come, and in place of times becoming better and farmers getting better prices for their produce and becoming wealthier, everything has been growing worse; and to-day, I say it without fear of contradiction, the depreciation of real estate in the Province overbalances five times the deposits in the savings banks. I know this to be the case. I do not come here to say what I do not know and do not see. I am in the habit of talking to the farmers, and I see and hear of these things every day, and I do not come here to mislead the House. But this depreciation exists, and we believe it is going to get worse. We are told by hon. gentlemen opposite: "Why you must not say anything about it; the man who does so is disloyal to his country." Although the depreciation is going on, they say we must let it go on and say nothing about it. I would like to ask this question before the free trade policy was established in England, when Cobden and Bright and their confrères saw their country becoming poorer, their poor-houses filling up and times getting bad, did they hide the facts? Did they not get commissions sent to investigate the state of affairs and supply the remedy, which was free trade. Now, it is free trade we want in the Maritime Provinces. When we had free trade there before, we prospered. Our farmers were able to purchase more lands and they got better prices for their produce, and they believe that if they get free trade again, they will prosper again. I would like to ask, are we more disloyal on this side of the House than the hon. members on the other side? All we ask for is friendly trade relations with our neighbors, not a political union at all. Now, I know that the House is tired of figures, but you will permit me to read a few relating to our own Province, in order to show how its condition improved while we had reciprocity with the United States. Our Island is not as old as the other Provinces, its settlement dates back only between eighty and a hundred years. I take the decade before we had reciprocity, and I find that our imports and exports were as follows:—

| Year. | Value of Imports from United States. | Value of Exports to United States. |
|-----------|--|--|
| 1844..... | $ 7,160 | $ 6,285 |
| 1845..... | 14,105 | 15,325 |
| 1846..... | 20,320 | 6,635 |
| 1847..... | 35,325 | 4,105 |
| 1848..... | 81,905 | 6,420 |
| 1849..... | 82,580 | 32,410 |
| 1850..... | 41,600 | 55,385 |
| 1851..... | 87,430 | 109,340 |
| 1852..... | 171,290 | 141,850 |
| 1853..... | 187,915 | 120,500 |
| 1854..... | 195,836 | 81,880 |
| 1855..... | 216,202 | 161,305 |
| 1856..... | 174,580 | 90,075 |
| 1857..... | 251,480 | 212,260 |
| 1858..... | 210,020 | 319,100 |
| 1859..... | 310,280 | 439,990 |
| 1860..... | 282,145 | 392,025 |
| 1861..... | 216,050 | 233,875 |
| 1862..... | 234,660 | 217,235 |
| 1863..... | 423,880 | 528,670 |
| 1864..... | 418,300 | 387,210 |
| 1865..... | 464,000 | 604,640 |

That finishes the period of Reciprocity Treaty. You will notice that in the previous decade our imports exceeded our exports, but under the reciprocity our exports increased very largely, and every year exceeded our imports, showing we had the advantage, and the balance we received in cash;

| Year. | Value of Imports from United States. | Value of Exports to United States. |
|-----------|--|--|
| 1866..... | $370,930 | $108,315 |
| 1867..... | 242,600 | 185,955 |
| 1868..... | 350,038 | 239,392 |
| 1869..... | 279,131 | 236,815 |
| 1870..... | 227,942 | 403,548 |
| 1871..... | 230,000 | 410,000 |
| 1872..... | 250,000 | 450,000 |
| 1873..... | 275,000 | 470,000 |
| 1874..... | 394,803 | 198,571 |
| 1875..... | 345,603 | 362,900 |
| 1876..... | 337,967 | 217,710 |
| 1885..... | 230,019 | 479,340 |
| 1886..... | 179,775 | 679,886 |

Ten years after the Reciprocity Treaty had been abrogated, we did only about one-third the business we did during the last year of reciprocity. Take 1886, our exports only exceed by a few dollars the exports of the last year of reciprocity. This shows how important it is for us to have reciprocity with the United States, if it can be arranged, as we believe it can be, should the Government only take the proper steps. I hope to see reciprocity brought about in a short time, and that the Government will take the proper steps in the matter. In the Maritime Provinces we were under the impression that the upper Provinces were in love with the National Policy and would not help us to get reciprocity even if the United States were disposed to grant it, but I am glad to see, since this discussion began, that in the other Provinces the same feeling exists as exists in the Maritime Provinces, and that we all look with hope to reciprocity. Were it established in the Maritime Provinces we could treble our exports to the United States. Take the article of potatoes. In Prince Edward Island, if the duty of 15 cents per bushel were removed, in place of a 1,000,000 bushels we would send 2,000,000 or 3,000,000, which it would be just as easy to raise as 1,000,000. What were the serious objections raised against the adoption of a free trade policy by hon. gentlemen opposite? The first is that since we have adopted the National Policy the Government has appealed several times to the country and have always been sustained, and the Government are not slow in boasting of their success. But there is a little lesson to be learnt even by the Government from the elections. In 1878, you will remember, Sir, the Government appealed to the people on the National Policy, but in our Province we were told the National Policy was only a means to an end, and that end was reciprocity with the United States. We returned the Government to power with a majority of 70 to 80. Four years later they came back again, and neither on this occasion did they preach the National Policy purely and simply. They said we have not reciprocity, but give us a little time. The people renewed their confidence in the Government and returned them with a majority of 60 or 70. Then they came back last year, but the people had learned a little in the meantime. Yet with the assistance of the Gerrymandering Act, the Franchise Act, and other Acts, they came back with a reduced majority of 15 or 20. Even that should be a caution to the Government, because there will be another election in four years, and if their numbers are reduced in the same proportion, they will be back here in the minority. The next objection is the charge of disloyalty. Do hon. gentlemen opposite seriously mean to say that we are less loyal than they? Do they mean to say that the Liberal party are more disloyal or less loyal than the Conservatives? I may refer to an incident which took place in the little village from which I came. When the North-West Rebellion started, the Minister of Militia called upon the volunteers throughout the country, and the section of the country from which I come is composed almost entirely of Liberals. We have there a volunteer corps which is made up five-sixths of Liberals. The Minister of Militia had ordered them to be ready to start for the North-West, and every man, without exception, volunteered his services. Even men who did not belong to the company asked that they might be allowed to go in the place of any who were missing. He telegraphed to the Minister of Militia that he had his quota of volunteers all ready, and they were nearly to a man all Liberals. I know of another company not far away, composed of men who are nearly all Tories, and, when the captain of that company sent for them to come in, he only got three men to come in. I do not know where they were, but the captain could not find them. The charge of disloyalty which has been thrown across to this side I hurl back. It is no disloyalty for any Government or any people to ask that the trade of their country shall be made by the adoption of any particular policy. The next serious objection they bring up is in regard to the revenue of the country. They say, if we adopt a free trade policy, or reciprocity with the United States, we shall lose $7,000,000 a year. I was not in the House at the time, but I am in the habit of reading a little, and if I remember aright, the present Finance Minister declared, when Mr. Mackenzie was in power, when he was explaining why there was required a revenue of $23,000,000, that it was a million too much, and that the Government expenditure should be covered by $22,000,000. Well, now that expenditure is $36,000,000. Taking the story which they told us then, that the country could be governed for $22,000,000, we have a large margin, we have a margin equal to nearly double the amount they say we are to lose by this union with the United States, and, if the country is economically governed, the saving could be made in the Government of this country, and there would be no necessity for any change in the taxation or for any resort to direct taxation, which they hold up as a bugbear to the people, but which is not necessary at all. I think it was Mr. Gladstone who was talking about the temperance question in England, when certain gentlemen said to him: You will lose so much revenue that you cannot afford to adopt temperance principles in this country," and Mr. Gladstone replied: "Give me a sober people and I will find the revenue." Well, Mr. Speaker, give us a prosperous people, and there will be no trouble about the revenue. The fourth objection is, that this discriminates against Great Britain. Perhaps it may, but what does this Government do, and what does the National Policy do? Has it not been discriminating against Great Britain ever since it has been established, and, if you carry out the National Policy to its legitimate end, you will stop all importations from Great Britain and from every other country, and then where is the discrimination? It is too absurd to talk about it. The fifth objection, and the real objection they bring is that this will injure the manufacturers. That it will injure some manufactures is undoubtedly true, but, if we as a people or if this Government or this House are going to maintain a handful of manufacturers, and to make them millionaires in this country, at the expense of the trade and at the expense of the good of the whole country, then I believe our Government is getting back to the old feudal times, and, if we are to be governed by a few manufacturers, we will be in a short time in the same position as the people of Ireland are in regard to their landlords. It is very peculiar in regard to hon. gentlemen opposite that, while arguing against free trade with might and main, they almost all wind up by saying they are ready for greater commercial relations with the United States. The only conclusion to be drawn from that is that they are afraid to go to their constituencies on this point. They are the servants of the manufacturers, but they are afraid of their constituents. The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) and the hon. the Minister of Interior told us that we should have nothing to do with the Yankees at all, that the Yankee farmers are poorer than our farmers. If that is so, that is an argument against hon. gentlemen opposite, because, if the Yankee farmer is becoming poorer in the same way that our farmers are, the sooner they come together the better. If it means anything, it is an argument against any protective policy at all. I think I could show, if I were not afraid of detaining the House too long, that the United States was proceeding faster under a revenue tariff than she has been under a protective policy. If the Minister of the Interior had taken up the subject and made a speech on the results of protection in the United States, I think it would have been much more effective than the speech he delivered the other night. Now, I have only this to say. As far as we are concerned in the Maritime Provinces—and I am sorry to say it—if the state of affairs which has existed for the past eight years is to continue for another eight years, the first thing the Government will find there will be such an agitation for repeal that the Province will be severed, because, unless they do something for us in this regard, and in regard to our winter communication, we will have to sue for repeal, and to see if we cannot work our own affairs better, as we did in the old times and as we can do in the present time. The hon. gentleman who leads the Government pictured the condition of the country well, when he compared it to the monkey in the tree, shaking the fruit to the hogs. It was an ugly picture, but it was a true one. It reminded me of a man who had a picture in which Old Nick was represented urging him on. All the boys took a pick at him, and he got no sympathy, so he took the picture to an old elder of the church, and showed it to him and the elder said: "It is a very ugly picture, but it is a true one." The picture the Prime Minister drew was very ugly but it was very true, and, if we are to be governed by combines like this, if we are going to be feeding these hogs, the yeomanry of this country, as well as those of the North-West, will rise and tell the right hon. gentleman to get out of this country, both himself and his hogs.

Mr. KENNY moved the adjournment of the debate.

Vol. XX.

Ottawa, Friday, March 23, 1888.

No. 22.

NOTICE TO MEMBERS.

Necessary corrections to Members' Speeches, for the bound edition, must be forwarded to the Debates Office within twenty-four hours after the printed copies of the speeches have been circulated, as after that time the contractors may print the copies for the bound edition without further delay.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 23rd March, 1888.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

ELECTORAL RETURN.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have received the certificate of the Returning Officer at the last election for the Electoral District of the County of Prince Edward, that John Milton Platt, Esquire, was duly elected for said Electoral District.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved that it be resolved that in admitting John Milton Platt, Esquire, to represent the Electoral District of the County of Prince Edward upon the production of the certificate of the Returning Officer, this House still recommends a strict adherence to the principle of requiring the production of the usual return.

Mr. MITCHELL. Might I ask what the meaning of that is? Have the strict rules of the House not been complied with?

Mr. SPEAKER. For some reason the certificate has not been before the House.

Motion agreed to.

MEMBERS INTRODUCED.

The following Members, having previously taken the oath according to law, and subscribed the roll containing the same, took their seats in the House:—

JOHN MILTON PLATT, Esquire, Member for the Electoral District of Prince Edward, introduced by Hon. Mr. Laurier and Mr. Charlton.

WILLIAM F. ROOME, Esquire, Member for the Electoral District of West Middlesex, introduced by Sir John A. Macdonald and Hon. Mr. Foster.

REPRESENTATION OF KENT.

Mr. WELDON (Albert), moved the adoption of the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections respecting the West Kent election.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think there are portions of this report in which we cannot concur, but I have no desire whatever to delay the issue of the writ, and therefore the report may be adopted, I suppose, on a division.

Motion agreed to on a division.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 61) respecting the St. Catharines and Niagara Central Railway Company.—(Mr. Rykert.)

Bill (No. 62) to incorporate the Grenville International Bridge Company.—(Mr. Shanly.)

Bill (No. 63) to amend the Acts relating to the Wood Mountain and Qu'Appelle Railway Company.—(Mr. Perley, Assiniboia.)

Bill (No. 64) to incorporate the Chatham Junction Railway Company.—(Mr. Weldon, St. John.)

Bill No. 66) to incorporate the St. Lawrence and Adirondack Railway Company.—(Mr. Bergeron.)

TREATY BETWEEN HER BRITANNIC MAJESTY AND THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. THOMPSON. In the absence of Sir Charles Tupper I beg leave to introduce Bill (No. 65) respecting a certain treaty between Her Britannic Majesty and the President of the United States. The Bill was ready for introduction when the notice was placed on the paper. That was done with the expectation that the Minister of Finance would be able to introduce it at an early day. It is desirable that it should be before the House at as early a date as possible, and at his request, I make a motion for its introduction. It is thought more proper that its introduction should have been expedited, in consequence of the publication of the Bill in the papers of the country. I may state, by way of explanation to the House, that its publication was evidently through a breach of confidence in some of the persons connected, in all probability, with the printing of the Bill, and not in any way owing to the fault of those who had it in charge for the Government. It is unnecessary that I should explain the Bill at any length, because it simply gives the effect of the treaty before this House.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

WRIT FOR KENT ELECTION.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Before you call the Orders of the Day, I would like to enquire, Mr. Speaker, what is the position now with regard to the issue of a writ for the election in the County of Kent. I understand, Sir, that you issued your warrant some time ago, and we were informed to-day in the Committee of Privileges and Elections, at the time that report was up for consideration, that the reason why no writ had issued was that the Government had declined as yet to appoint a returning officer, or had failed, at all events, to appoint a returning officer, and that there was no one to whom that writ could be addressed. Now that this permission has been obtained, I suppose it is unnecessary you should issue a second warrant, but that the Government can appoint a returning officer to whom the writ for holding the election might be addressed. I would like to know exactly what the position is, as I think, the House having determined that the election ought to take place immediately, it would be well to know precisely the position of the matter at the present time.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think the position stands thus: Mr. Speaker having received the report, should issue his warrant.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). He has issued it. I understand that Mr. Speaker did issue his warrant.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is what I said. He did issue his warrant, but, looking at the report, I took the liberty of thinking that I should report that it should remain with the House to order the writ. On communication with Mr. Speaker, the question seemed to be of so much doubt that I understand Mr. Speaker had withdrawn his warrant.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I did not so understand it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. So I understand it. If it had not been withdrawn the practice would be to move for a writ of supersedeas as to the previous warrant. Now, as I understand it, a warrant must issue—a new warrant must issue unless it is considered that the old warrant was effete. I think so beyond a doubt. At all events, I think a new warrant should be issued, and a writ of supersedeas could be moved for unless it is held that Mr. Speaker has withdrawn his warrant; if he has, of course a new warrant is necessary.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). With the permission of the House I would say that I understand the warrant of the Speaker was issued, and that the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery took no action upon that because there was no returning officer appointed to whom the writ could be addressed. The issue of the warrant and the proceedings upon that warrant have not been stayed by any action of the House. The House simply referred it to the Committee of Privileges and Elections to enquire into the matter as to the propriety of the issue of the warrant under the existing circumstances. But the regularity or the validity of the warrant was not, it seems to me, questioned by any action that has taken place in this House. That warrant has been issued and is in force. It is the duty of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to obey it and act upon it as soon as the Government appoint a party to whom the writ can be addressed. That is precisely as I understand the matter to stand at the present time.

Mr. SPEAKER. The writ has not been withdrawn, that is it has not been formally withdrawn, although it is understood that the Clerk in Chancery would not act upon it until the House had decided. I suppose a warrant for a writ of supersedeas would do.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would move for a writ of supersedeas to that warrant. It was issued at a time it ought not to have been issued. I think if the hon. gentleman will look into the practice he will find that this is the practice. There may be a question of the legality of the issue, and the seat of the elected member, whoever he may be, might be challenged on the ground that the writ was issued on a warrant which was illegal, because it was issued before the House had declared its will in the matter. I now move:

That the warrant of the Speaker issued for the election in Kent be withdrawn.

Motion agreed to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved:

That the writ for a new election in the riding of Kent be issued.

Mr. LAURIER. There was another point suggested by my friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills). Even if the warrant of Mr. Speaker had issued legally, there was no returning officer. When the warrant does issue it is the duty of the Government to appoint a returning officer, and I suppose they will attend to that promptly.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Oh, yes. The facts were simply these: the Clerk of the Crown Chancery, when he received the Speaker's warrant, informed the Government of it and asked for the name of a returning officer. When that came to the Government I was acting as Minister of Justice, in the absence of my hon. friend behind me, and, looking at the Judge's report, I was of opinion that the House only could take action in the matter. I communicated that to Mr. Speaker, and it was understood the whole thing should stand over till the House met.

Mr. LAURIER. But there were some instances where there was no reason of this kind and the Government did not act promptly, as in the case of Dorchester.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Oh, we gave it every consideration.

RECIPROCITY WITH THE UNITED STATES.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Richard Cartwright:

That it is highly desirable that the largest possible freedom of commercial intercourse should obtain between the Dominion of Canada and the United States, and that it is expedient that all articles manufactured in, or the natural products of either of the said countries should be admitted free of duty into the ports of the other (articles subject to duties of excise or of internal revenue alone excepted). That it is further expedient that the Government of the Dominion should take steps at an early date to ascertain on what terms and conditions arrangements can be effected with the United States for the purpose of securing full and unrestricted reciprocity of trade therewith.

And on the motion of Mr. Foster in amendment:

That Canada in the future, as in the past, in desirous of cultivating and extending trade relations with the United States in so far as they may not conflict with the policy of fostering the various interests and industries of the Dominion which was adopted in 1879 and has since received in so marked a manner the sanction and approval of its people.

And on the motion of Mr. Jones (Halifax) in amendment to the amendment:

That in any arrangement between Canada and the United States providing for the free importation into each country of the natural and manufactured productions of the other, it is highly desirable that it should be provided that during the continuance of any such arrangement the coasting trade of Canada and of the United States should be thrown open to vessels of both countries on a footing of complete reciprocal equality, and that vessels of all kinds built in the United States or Canada may be owned and sailed by the citizens of the other and be entitled to registry in either country and to all the benefits thereto appertaining.

Mr. KENNY. Mr. Speaker, before proceeding to deal with the resolution which is now under consideration in this House, I deem it my duty; as one of the representatives of the Province of Nova Scotia in the Commons of Canada, to refer to what I consider a very remarkable and very improper statement which was made in this House on Thursday of last week. On that day, Sir, the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) stated in the course of his address that the Government majority in the Province of Nova Scotia had been secured by promises to railroad companies. I am not disposed, Sir, to cavil at anything my hon. friend from Queen's may say. During my brief parliamentary career, I have noticed that that hon. gentleman seems privileged to indulge in the wildest flights of fancy. In that role he is quite unrivalled and quite inimitable. But, Sir, when a gentleman occupying a prominent position in this House and in this country, leads in a debate like this, one of the parties in this country, as the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) does, I think the observations of that gentleman claim attention. On the occasion to which I refer, the hon. member for South Oxford, referring to the remarks of the hon. member for Queen's which I have quoted, stated that "they (the electors of Nova Scotia) offered themselves to us, but Mr. Blake was too honest to buy them." Now, Sir, as a representative from Nova Scotia, I confess that I felt humiliated when I heard that remark, and infinitely more so when I saw it recorded in Hansard. That statement, Sir, is now historical; these words are indelibly inscribed on the parliamentary records of Canada; and coming from a trained parliamentarian, from a gentleman who weighs his words, I regret to have to say that in my opinion they are insulting to the people of Nova Scotia. I know, Sir, that my opinion on such a matter is of slight importance to the hon. member for South Oxford; I recognise fully, Sir, the great disparity which exists between our positions in this House; but, Sir, as a representative of the people of Nova Scotia, sent here by the metropolitan constituency of Halifax, I tell that hon. gentleman that while the people of Nova Scotia may not be so gifted in the wealth of this world as their fellow-countrymen in some of the other Provinces in Canada, yet, man for man, in manliness of character, in uprightness of conduct, in a high sense of honor, I claim that we are second to none in this Dominion or out of it; and I tell that hon. gentleman—and I am glad to be able to do it here in vindication of the good name of the Province of Nova Scotia—that the gold has never been found that can buy the people of Nova Scotia. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am as anxious as any man in Canada can be to see a fair and honorable measure of reciprocal trade established between the people of Canada and the kindred nation to the south of us with whom we have so much in common. I am in favor of a very extended measure of reciprocal trade with the people of the United States, as great a measure as would be compatible with the interests and self-respect of the people of Canada. I have the greatest admiration for the people of the United States, and I have given as tangible proof of that as any man can give. I would consider it my duty here or elsewhere to do anything that a man fairly can do to unite the great English-speaking races all the world over in the closest bonds of comity and friendship. I fear, Sir, that the course we are now pursuing may actually thwart the object which I believe the people of Canada and their representatives here so much desire to attain—some reciprocal trade between the United States and this Dominion. The hon. member for South Oxford has introduced a resolution in favor of what he is pleased to term unrestricted reciprocity. Sir, I can understand reciprocity, or I remember what we understood it to mean a few years ago. I have some idea of what commercial union may mean; but, Sir, I must proclaim that, in my opinion at least, unrestricted reciprocity is not within the domain of practical politics. The suddenness of the apparition of unrestricted reciprocity is most startling, and induces one to enquire whence it comes. I find, Sir, that it emanates from a party which only a short year ago in the general elections held in this Dominion, raised every cry, made every appeal, advanced every argument that human ingenuity could devise; and yet, Sir, we never heard of unrestricted reciprocity until it suddenly bounced on this Table. Are we to attribute it to the emphatic expression of the opinions of the people of Canada as given at that election? Are we to attribute it to what the proposer of the resolution, in a moment of exuberant candor, was pleased to call “our friends of the Quebec conference?” Are we to attribute it to what some gentlemen call “our friends on the other side of the border?” Are we to attribute it to the amiable American gentlemen who, so charitable in thought any intent, have been visiting Canada during the past few months and interesting themselves in all that concerns the affairs of Canada? That apparition, Sir, is so sudden that instinctively one is reminded of the well-known lines:

Bring with thee airs from heaven or blasts from hell,
Be thy intents wicked or charitable,
Thou comest in such a questionable shape
That I will speak to thee!”

I find, Sir, that the result of the late election is the primary cause of the apparition. I believe, Sir, that the utter helplessness and hopelessness hon. gentlemen opposite had of ever obtaining power in this country, and the taunts of their followers that they had no policy, have made them reckless, and out of sheer desperation they have resorted to this expedient. They know, Sir, that Canada looks favorably upon a fair and honorable arrangement with our neighbour to the south of us; but in order that political capital may be made, a great commercial question has now been prostituted for party purposes. The condition of the Opposition is so desperate that they have come to the conclusion that they must have some cry, so they shout “unrestricted reciprocity.” I do not believe hon. gentlemen are sincere in the course they are now taking. They know that their present course is more likely to retard than to advance our chances of trade relations with the people of the United States. I hold that I can prove that from their own utterances. Have these hon. gentlemen forgotten that Mr. Mackenzie, when he led the Government of Canada, told us it would be unworthy of ourselves to go cringing to the people of the United States. Has the hon. member for South Oxford forgotten his own utterances, when in a position of responsibility in this country, he said:

“They say we must have reciprocity and we cannot live without it. For the Dominion of Canada I take exception to that statement. While reciprocity is desirable, we are not in such a state of subjection to the United States that we cannot live without it. We have men and ships and will carry the war into Africa. We will find new markets for ourselves and cut them out. There is nothing better calculated to prevent the bringing about of reciprocity than to tell the Americans we cannot live without them. It would induce them to believe they had the power to drive us to their own terms.”

Have hon. gentlemen opposite forgotten the utterances of their own press, which I have in my hand, but will not delay the House with reading. I find that my hon. friend whose absence I regret to-day, the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones), is reported in the Morning Chronicle of July 18th, 1884, to have stated in a meeting of the Chamber of Commerce that “he thought it would not be well to appear too anxious about the matter, and there was no doubt the Dominion Government (the same Government that we have to-day) were willing to have reciprocity, but nothing was to be gained by seeming over-anxious.” The correspondence between Mr. Bayard and Sir Charles Tupper shows that the Canadian plenipotentiary expressed his readiness to confer with a representative of the United States at any time. Our Government is prepared at any day to discuss the question of our commercial relations with the representative of the United States. I have amply proved from the utterances of the hon. gentlemen opposite and from the writings in their press, that the line of conduct they are now pursuing is not calculated, even in their own opinions, to promote the cause of reciprocity. It is one which they themselves have pronounced unwise and undignified. I can say, therefore, that having gone back on their record, having contradicted themselves and having proved their insincerity, I cannot attach the slightest consequence to their utterances, nor do I believe, will the country. This important question of our commercial relations with the United States is to be made by them a foot ball for disappointed politicians. What is contemplated by this policy which hon. gentlemen opposite call unrestricted reciprocity? Mr. Longley, of Nova Scotia, who is an authority, does not attempt to conceal the full force of the meaning of commercial union. “It implies,” he admits, “the establishment of a common tariff against the rest of the world;” and with the greatest frankness he adds: “Let no person be deceived. This will mean that we will have to adopt the American tariff against Great Britain.” Further on he says, “I cannot ignore the fact that commercial union involves to a close degree the relationship between Canada and Great Britain herself." But we have an authority across the line from which to quote, Mr. Butterworth, who has stated that he is opposed to any measure which does not contemplate a Customs union. We are forced, therefore, to the conclusion that what hon. gentlemen opposite contemplate is a Customs union. Now, what are we to get in exchange for such an arrangement. In order to arrive at an estimate of the position we occupy in regard to the United States, we have to consider our trade relations with that country. I find our importations are $45,000,000, and our exports $37,000,000; thus the balance of trade is against us. Of the $37,000,000 exports, $11,000,000 is on the free list, and it is proposed, in the contemplated changes of the tariff in the United States, that $9,000,000 shall be added to the free list. That would leave $16,000,000 to be accounted for. Now, I have examined what these $16,000,000 are composed of. $13,000,000 are composed of articles of which the total importation into the United States is only $14,743,000, so that if we acquire the whole additional trade it would only amount to $1,600,000. These $16,000,000 of dutiable articles are chiefly made up of the following:—

| | Imported from Canada. | Total U. States Imports. |
|------------------------|--------------------------|-----------------------------|
| Horses | $ 2,300,000 | 2,464,000 |
| Sheep | 1,100,000 | 1,183,000 |
| Barley | 6,171,000 | 6,173,000 |
| Hay | 789,000 | 790,000 |
| Malt | 150,000 | 153,000 |
| Cattle | 883,000 | 979,000 |
| Coal, Bituminous | 1,422,000 | 2,715,000 |
| Wheat | 218,000 | 218,867 |
| Oats | 27,600 | 29,500 |
| Butter | 38,000 | 38,100 |
| | $13,100,000 | $14,743,000 |

So that out of a total import of $14,743,000 by the United States, Canada furnishes the whole amount with the exception of $1,600,000 worth. Take out the article of coal and you will find Canada does within half a million dollars of all the business the United States desire to do in these articles with countries outside of themselves. There is still three million dollars to be considered, and this consists of different articles which may possibly be put on the free list, but in any case the amount is insignificant. It is admitted on both sides that, as the result of unrestricted reciprocity, the loss to the revenue of Canada on our present importations from the United States would amount to $7,300,000. But under commercial union, another serious loss stares us in the face, and that is the duties on importations from Great Britain which amount to $9,300,000, or $8 per head. We pay $8 per head, on importations from Great Britain, and the people from the United States pay $2 per head. Under any new arrangement, therefore, the result of the commercial relations between the two countries, under a common tariff, would be that Canada would lose not only $7,000,000 but $14,000,000. Therefore, under this arrangement or even under unrestricted reciprocity, if it is practicable, we would have to resort to direct taxation, and the Provincial subsidies must cease to exist. As authority for that statement, I shall quote an article which appeared in a leading Liberal paper in the Province of Ontario. It says:

"The inhabitants of the Maritime Provinces are probably men of common sense. They understand that a fellow 'cannot eat his cake and have it.' They are supposed to favor reciprocity with the United States. A good many of them are believed to be free traders. The abolition of the Provincial subsidy would help them get what they want. Why, then, should they not consent to it?"

Then, I will quote the Halifax Morning Chronicle, which says, as recently as December 2nd, 1887, that commercial union is a Customs union; and on December 3rd the same paper makes this announcement:

"It is gratifying to learn definitely and authoritatively, from his own lips, that Mr. Jones is not only favorable to commercial union, but sees no difficulty in working out a practical scheme on that basis."

Mr. KENNY.

Therefore it is evident that hitherto all these hon. gentlemen have contemplated commercial union. Now, I wish to place on record some more figures as regard the trade of the United States. On examination it will be found that of the whole importations from the United States, 66 per cent. come from the port of New York, and 8 per cent. through the port of Boston. I refer to that because, undoubtedly, under a commercial union these two cities would become the distributing points to Canada. Great stress has been laid, by hon. gentlemen opposite, upon the great exodus that is going on from Canada, and they never seem to be as happy as when they are referring to the fact that a number of Canadians are leaving their own country; they seem positively to gloat over it. The westward flow of emigration has been going on for many years. It went on just as much under the Grit régime as during the subsequent period of our history. The same thing is noticed in the Eastern States, and even in the agricultural portions of the State of New York, and considering the manner in which a great party in this Dominion have been constantly belittling and traducing their own country, the only surprise is that more people do not go away. When it was suggested the other day that an additional number of Hansards should be issued containing this debate, I could not help thinking that some of the numbers would doubtless find their way to our friends across the border, and I could not help wondering what the American statesmen and politicians would think of us as they read some of the speeches. If there is one trait more than another in the American character which is estimable and admirable, it is love of country. They all unite in praising their own land, and the riches of the English language are exhausted in finding words of eulogy. We know that, in the United States, the political differences are great and the political knife makes incisions which are deep and broad, but there is one point on which they will always rally and in regard to which you will always find them together, and that is in lauding their own country. Nothing has contributed more to their great importance and their great success than their love of country. It is much to be regretted that this feeling does not exist with us to the extent it ought. Its existence I acknowledge, but it does not exist to the extent it ought in the Dominion of Canada. However, in order to show that the exodus which has been going on for so many years, from the western flow of emigration, is no greater from our own territory than from certain of the Eastern States of America, I will read a statement of which a portion, I think, was read the other day, and which I may say, for the information of hon. gentlemen opposite, was prepared by one of their own political supporters. That document reads:

"The growth of the population during a decennial period may be influenced by transient causes, but if we take a period of fifty years and compare the growth of one country with another, during that period, we shall be able to determine pretty accurately which country has within it the greatest elements of progress. The New England States afford a fair field for comparison with the old Provinces of Canada. This is what the census reveal:

|----------------------------|-----------|-----------|--------------------------|
| Maine | 1,953,717 | 4,010,026 | 2,056,309 |
| New Hampshire | | | |
| Vermont | | | |
| Massachusetts | | | |
| Connecticut | | | |
| Rhode Island | 1,065,215 | 4,141,424 | 3,076,200 |
| Ontario | | | |
| Quebec | | | |
| New Brunswick | | | |
| Nova Scotia | | | |
| Prince Edward Island | | | |

While the New England States have merely doubled their population in fifty years, the older Provinces of Canada have nearly quadrupled theirs in the same period."

I do not think that is very discouraging. It may not be very gratifying to hon. gentlemen opposite, it is true, but there are the figures, and, if they are not true, they can be contradicted. It is not fair to ourselves, it is not doing justice to our own land, or to those people who are to come after us, that unfair and misleading statements should go abroad.

"Dropping Ontario from the comparison, let us see how Maine, New Hampshire and Vermont—the States that lie immediately on our borders, whose soil and climate are similar to ours—have grown in population during the past fifty years compared with Quebec and the Maritime Provinces:—

| | 1830-1. | 1880-1. | Increase in 50 years. |
|-------------------------------|---------|-----------|-----------------------|
| Three New England States..... | 949,435 | 1,327,713 | 378,278 |
| Four Canadian Provinces..... | 828,513 | 2,227,961 | 1,399,451 |

"In other words, while the increase of population in the New England States on our borders in fifty years has been only 38 per cent., the increase in the four Provinces has been 169 per cent. Figures like these require no comment.

"If we drop Quebec out of the statement and compare the growth of the Maritime Provinces with that of Maine, which lies immediately on our borders, the result will be found hardly less remarkable:

| | 1830-1. | 1880-1. | Increase in 50 years. |
|-------------------------|---------|---------|-----------------------|
| Maine..... | 399,455 | 648,436 | 248,981 |
| Maritime Provinces..... | 275,379 | 869,495 | 594,116 |

"In other words, while the increase of Maine in population in fifty years has been only 62 per cent., the increase of the Maritime Provinces in the same period has been 212 per cent.

"Let us limit the comparison between Maine and the Maritime Provinces to a period of twenty years, and exclude Prince Edward Island, and we shall have a still better opportunity of judging of the comparative growth of two pieces of territory differing but little in soil or climate and where the natural advantages are nearly equal. The following table speaks for itself:

| | 1860-1. | 1880-1. | Increase in 20 years. |
|------------------------------------|---------|---------|-----------------------|
| Maine..... | 628,279 | 648,436 | 20,157 |
| New Brunswick and Nova Scotia..... | 582,940 | 761,714 | 178,774 |

"Maine which twenty years ago had 45,000 more people than New Brunswick and Nova Scotia combined, now has 113,000 less; and while Maine in that period has only added to her population by 3 per cent., New Brunswick and Nova Scotia have increased in population more than 30 per cent."

I know that these statistics are very tedious and tiresome, and I shall be as brief in reading them as possible. But they are important, and I consider it a matter of duty on the part of every true Canadian, of every man who loves his country, to put the true condition of the people before them, and before the world. Now, for the benefit of hon. gentlemen opposite, let me read what this Grit editor says:

"Some people are never tired of telling us that if Canada had been annexed to the United States its progress would have been greater than it has been; others when they cross the line from even the least progressive of the New England States into Canada, profess to be struck with our want of progress and lament that the influence of monarchical institutions should so depress a people. The true test of the value of this kind of talk is in the census returns, and we propose to use them for the purpose of showing that people who employ such language do not know what they are talking about, and are only repeating the ignorant chatter which they have heard used by others who are as ill-informed as themselves."

These extracts are taken from the St. John Telegram, of November, 1881. Now, as regards this exodus, which seems to delight hon. gentlemen opposite, and which they are so fond of attributing to the National Policy,—why, Sir, what took our people away years ago? It was because they could not find employment in their own country, it was because we had no manufactures. Now that factories have been established all over the land, people find employment in their own country and are able to live happily here, and their labors add to the national wealth. I hope hon. gentlemen will bear in mind that, after all, we have held our own as regards population, when we compare our position with that of the neighboring States. I find that the population of Nova Scotia in 1860, was 330,000; in 1870, 387,000; in 1880, 440,572. Now, as regards the position of our working classes, I regret exceedingly that the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) is not in the House when I speak of this matter, because I cannot do so in the same manner that I should have done if he were here. But I find that we have had the usual professional wail over the condition of the poor man. The condition of the laboring classes in a country like ours is one that concerns the public, and is of public interest. The Government have exerted themselves in every way to improve the condition of our working classes. Now, I would like to see what my hon. colleague says about the working classes and the workmen in Nova Scotia. I find on page 271 of the Hansard, that he makes a reference to Canadian girls, and this is what he says:

"Why, one of our Nova Scotian or Canadian girls who goes to the United States as a domestic servant, is able to earn from $14 to $20 a month with her board, while a poor girl in the Province of Quebec who, perhaps, cannot leave her home, is laboring there for $3.50 a month and paying her board.

Now, I do not know what may be the conditions of labor in the Province of Quebec, but I do know that in Nova Scotia one of the great difficulties we have in housekeeping is to get domestic servants. For that I am disposed to blame the National Policy. Formerly, for labor of that class, there was little employment in Nova Scotia, and they either had to take positions as domestic servants, or more frequently they left Nova Scotia altogether, alienated themselves from their home associations, from home ties, and sought that work in the United States, in the mills at Lowell, which they could not obtain in their own country. But since factories have been established in the Maritime Provinces and all over Canada, that class of labor finds employment in these factories. I am quite satisfied that when the Labor Commission examines into the condition of the operatives in the city of Halifax, the results will be most satisfactory to those who take an interest in the welfare of their fellow-citizens, I speak from my own knowledge when I say that whilst that factory has not been remunerative to its own shareholders, it has been a great boon to the poor people and to the working people of that community. It is true that as a result we have greater difficulty in getting domestic servants, but I never heard of a domestic servant in Nova Scotia earning only $3.50 and paying her board. I do not know, as I said before, how it is in the Province of Quebec, but I must do my hon. colleague the justice to say that while his accuracy is most commendable, he has been careful not to describe this lowering of wages in respect to the girls of Nova Scotia, and for that much in their behalf I thank him. As regards the condition of the laboring classes, I find that while my hon. colleague has not given us the benefit of his knowledge, and as no man in Nova Scotia is better informed on that point, whilst he has indulged in the usual doleful wail over the condition of the poor man, I will do him the justice to give you the views of a leading gentleman as to the condition of the laboring classes in Nova Scotia, and I ask the attention of the House seriously to what I am about to read; I ask hon. gentlemen on both sides to treasure in their minds what that hon. gentleman said a few years ago as regards the condition of the laboring classes in Nova Scotia. I find in the Morning Chronicle of 18th May, 1834, the following report of his speech:—

"He was of opinion that Halifax laborers had no good reason to be dissatisfied" * * * He believed that a laboring man who is sober and industrious can get along, in Halifax as well as in any part of the world. * * * He was glad to know that laborers were living much more comfortably now than they did in the past. * * * He could recollect when wages were 75 cents a day, and flour was from $12 to $14 a barrel; now it was $6.25 per barrel, with tea, potatoes, cotton and almost all the other necessities of life as cheap as ever they were, with wages at $1.25 a day."

It is not fair to give a quotation without giving the author. The gentleman who made that statement, which is recorded in the Halifax Morning Chronicle of May, 8th, 1834, is now the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones). Now, I have done that hon. gentleman the justice which he refused to do himself. I have given you, Sir, his calm deliberate opinion upon the condition of his fellow-countrymen, when he was far removed from his recent surroundings, when he was not entangled by the exigencies of party, when he could give to you such an utterance as I am sure will have infinitely more weight than the excited speech he has made in this House. I am quite sure it would be difficult, it would be impossible to find in the annals of our parliamentary records or in the outside political utterances of our public men, a greater tribute to the National Policy than has been paid in these words by the senior member for Halifax. The hon. gentleman in the course of his speech—and I very much regret his absence, because I shall have to curtail my remarks very much in this connection in consequence—wished we had the happy days gone by. The happy days of Grit politicians, when flour was from $14 to $16 a barrel, and wages were 75 cents a day—those were the happy days! The laboring man is now to be appealed to, he is to be called into line, we are going for the farmer and for the fishermen and for the laboring man. But the laboring men of this country are not likely to forget that when the hon. gentlemen who now profess to be their friends were in positions where they could have helped them, when the laboring men of Canada asked them to frame a tariff which would enable those laboring men to live at home with their families and keep them about them in their own country, what did they give them in answer to that application? They gave them soup kitchens, and now they offer them direct taxation. As regards the condition of the laborer I think in Nova Scotia, at least, I have given you as high an authority as hon. gentlemen opposite could possibly expect me to give them. But to arrive at the true position I will, in order to be explicit,—and I must ask the House to give me a little time in this matter—place before hon. members a record of the deposits in the savings banks in Nova Scotia, extending over some years. It has been attempted to belittle the importance of these savings banks returns, and it has been said they are not indicative of the prosperity of a country. Hon. gentlemen, in fact, have gone so far as to say that these savings banks returns are no indications of individual or national prosperity. This is a very startling proposition, but it is quite in keeping with the whole line of argument we have heard from the other side. The fact is these hon. gentlemen have so bad a case that in their efforts to defame their own country every principle of morals and ethics has to be subverted to suit the case. I am disposed to attach very great importance to the savings banks returns as indicative of a very happy state of things. The deposits in the savings banks in 1867 were $614,687, in 1881 they amounted to $1,530,981, in 1878 they had reached $2,210,000, in 1883, $5,790,733. During the Grit régime the increase was $679,034, but the increase from 1883 to 1887 was $3,274,096, the deposit in 1887 amounting to $9,064,829. That has been the increase during the last four years under this terrible National Policy which is ruining the country. My hon. colleague from Halifax (Mr. Jones) desires that the people should have money in their pockets, it is his most happy condition of things; but the people have not only the money in their pockets to gratify their ordinary requirements, they are not only by his own word, proved from his own mouth, more comfortable and more happy than they ever were before, but they have been actually able to pile up this enormous surplus of savings. The people are better housed, they are better fed, they are better clothed and better educated than ever before, and they have been able to put away this large sum. Those people who are able to do that must have had money in their pockets. We have heard something about the flour trade, and we have heard that the people of Nova Scotia were paying 50 cents a barrel more than they should pay on flour. Now, Sir, I remember very well in the discussion that took place in this House last year, in which I took a very subordinate part, it became my duty to say that flour was passing over the Intercolonial Railway through Halifax for Newfoundland, and was competing with American flour started on its Atlantic journey from Boston or New York; in other words, by the arrangement made over the Intercolonial Railway the Newfoundland market was secured for Canadian millers. Now, we all know that the duty in Newfoundland is precisely the same on American flour as on Canadian flour, and therefore if Canadian flour was not cheaper it would not secure the market. I will quote a still better authority than the senior member for Halifax in defence of Canadian flour and in contradiction of his statement that Nova Scotian people are paying this 50 cents on their flour. The hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) is reported to have made a speech at Halifax in 1878, when he made the following remarks:—

“Now, when your leaders come down here they declare, as Dr. Tupper did the other day, that the tax on flour would not raise the price one cent, and Dr. Tupper quotes me as an authority for that statement. Well, I do believe in it. I do believe that no tax would affect the price of a commodity of which we produce a surplus.”

Now, Sir, that is an answer, I think, to the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) as regards flour, but in order to give him a reply nearer home I will quote him, with the permission of the House, what was said by one of the gentlemen who occupies a position in our Local Legislature, and who, in politics, is a political associate of the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones). I will quote what Dr. Haley, member of the Local Legislature for the County of Hants, said:

“The duty has not increased the price of Canadian flour one fraction of a cent. We import it in bond, and can do so via Boston by packet cheaper than we can by railway.” “But do you not find a great deal more inconvenience in getting Canadian flour than American?” “Not the slightest. It comes to Boston by the railroad, in bond. It is just exactly as easy to get as the American. It is just as cheap, and, I think, just as good. The duty has not increased the price, but, flour being our chief import, and Boston being the city from which we can import at the lowest rates of freight, the duty has enabled us to obtain, via that city, the flour that we formerly bought in New York and Boston, when we had to pay higher rates of freight for bringing it here.”

Here, then, is a complete refutation of the statement of the member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) that our people were paying 50 cents a barrel more for flour. Now, Sir, we have been treated, also, to a dissertation about the coal trade, and hon. gentlemen have tried to show the very great disadvantages that important industry is laboring under in the Province of Nova Scotia. The hon. the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) favors us with a letter from Mr. Lithgow, and Mr. Lithgow is a recognised authority on all matters connected with the coal trade. But, Sir, thanks to the member for Pictou (Mr. C. H. Tupper), who has been very diligent, we have ascertained that this letter was written in 1879. I think, Sir, that if the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) had been sincerely desirous of enlightening us as to his knowledge of the conditions of that trade, and as to the wishes and views of those who are engaged in it, he would have given us an extract from the Halifax Morning Chronicle, of December 1st, 1887, when that gentleman, in reply to a reporter, states the following in reference to the coal trade. He says:

“Our coal owners, to my surprise, are, I understand, not anxious to have their coal admitted free to the United States to be followed, as a matter of course, by the abolition of duty on our side, apprehending, I believe, that the Americans are strong competitors in our western markets, notably Montreal and Quebec. They do not think that the northern markets of the States would take our coal to the extent they did under the old treaty.”

Well, now, Sir, if that hon. gentleman had been anxious to convey to the Parliament of Canada the very latest information which he had upon that important industry, I think it would be better for him to have given us the views which he knows are entertained by coal owners in 1887, rather than to travel back to an old letter of 1879. But, Sir, the statistics of the coal trade in the Province of Nova Scotia are most instructive. We find, Sir, that of the coal raised in 1886, Nova Scotia consumed 460,000 tons, Quebec consumed 539,000 tons, New Brunswick consumed 176,000
